KAHN v. WILSON. (Sac. 308.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 28, 1898.)

APPEAL—JUDGMENT ROLL—NEW TRIAL—QUESTIONS IN REPLY BRIEF.

1. Notice of an intention to move for a new trial is not part of the judgment roll, and, in order to predicate error on the absence thereof, the record must affirmatively show that no notice was given.

2. New questions cannot be raised by an appellant in his reply brief, unless, upon leave of the court, for good cause shown.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county.

Action by Charles Kahn against R. M. Wilson, executor, to foreclose mortgages. There was a decree of foreclosure as to one, and the action was abated as to the other. Defendant appealed from an order granting a new trial thereon. Affirmed.

J. L. Maddux, for appellant. Reinstein & Eisner and W. H. Hatton, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to foreclose two certain mortgages. The court below rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff, foreclosing one of the mortgages, and directed that the action abate as to the other mortgage. Upon motion of the plaintiff the court granted a new trial, and from the order granting a new trial the defendant appealed.

There appears in the transcript a "bill of exceptions on motion for a new trial." To this there is attached an acknowledgment of service by the counsel for defendant, in these words: "Service of above-proposed bill of exceptions and motion for a new trial herein, in due time, is hereby acknowledged;" and there is also attached a certificate of the judge of the lower court "that the above and foregoing bill of exceptions is true and correct, and the same is hereby settled and allowed as true and correct." There is no copy of the notice of the motion for a new trial in the record, and the sole point made by appellant in his opening brief is that the record does not show that any notice of intention to move for a new trial was ever given, nor the grounds for any motion for a new trial, and that, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction over the motion for a new trial. This contention cannot be maintained. The Code does not make a notice of motion for a new trial a part of the judgment roll, nor does it require that said notice shall appear anywhere in the record; and it has been definitely settled by this court that "the notice of intention to move for a new trial is not a part of the record on appeal, and need not appear therein." Pico v. Cohn, 78 Cal. 384, 20 Pac. 706; Gage v. Downey, 79 Cal. 140, 21 Pac. 527, 855; Scott v. Wood, 81 Cal. 398, 22 Pac. 871; and Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, 105 Cal. 84, 38 Pac. 627. If, as a matter of fact, there was no notice as a basis of the motion in the court below, that fact must be affirmatively shown by the appellant, and he must cause it to be included in a statement or proper bill of exceptions. This proposition was thoroughly discussed and settled in Pico v. Cohn, and has been frequently approved by this court in other cases. In what is called "Appellant's Brief in Reply," the point above stated is substantially conceded, and appellant proceeds to argue other questions. Respondent objects to the consideration of these new points thus made; and we think that his objection is good, and that the said reply brief cannot be considered. We do not mean to say that an appellant might not be allowed, in exceptional cases, to discuss new questions in his final brief. He might be allowed to do so upon an application showing meritorious reasons why the points were not made in the opening brief. Such application might be based upon sickness, inadvertence, or other excusable neglect. But in the case at bar no reason whatever is given for this departure from the ordinary method of presenting a case in this court. If the practice were allowed without any substantial reason, it would lead to great irregularity and delay. In such event the respondent, of course, could justly demand the right to file an additional brief, and the course of the argument by brief would be radically changed. The order appealed from is affirmed.

APPEAL — RECORD — ADVERSE POSSESSION — COLOR OF TITLE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 950, providing that any statement used on motion for a new trial may be considered on an appeal from a final judgment, what purports to be an engrossed statement on motion for new trial cannot be considered, it not appearing that any motion for a new trial was made.

2. Where defendant in an action to recover real estate held the property by adverse possession for more than five years before suit, claiming under decrees of distribution and partition, it is immaterial that the decrees were erroneous.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Placer county.

Action by Mary A. Brind, administratrix of James Gregory, deceased, against John H. Gregory and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James Gartlan, for appellant. F. P. Tuttle, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff as administratrix of the estate of James Gregory, deceased, to recover possession of certain described lands alleged to belong to the estate of said Gregory. There are several defendants. In their answer they deny all right of possession of plaintiff, and each one of them sets up ownership to a part of the land in contest. Each defendant avers that he has been in the exclusive and adverse possession of the part of the land claimed by him for more than five years before the commencement of the suit, and pleads the statute of limitations. Judgment went for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

There appears in the printed transcript what purports to be an "engrossed statement on motion for a new trial," and appellant contends that he has a right to have this statement considered on this appeal from the judgment under the provisions of section 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But that section merely provides that any statement "used on motion for a new trial" may be considered on an appeal from a final judgment. In the case at bar it does not appear that any motion for a new trial was ever made or passed upon by the court; and therefore it does not appear that the statement printed in the transcript was ever used on motion for a new trial. It does not come within the provision of said section 950, and on this appeal we can look only to the judgment roll. The judgment roll makes a very meager presentation of the case, and it is somewhat difficult to discover what the points upon appeal are. But the court found that each of the defendants had been in the actual and adverse possession of the portion of the land claimed by him, asserting the title thereto, and holding it against all the world for more than five years before the commencement of the suit; and there is nothing in the record which shows this finding to be erroneous. It seems that the respondents originally claimed under certain decrees of distribution and partition, and appellant now contends that these decrees were invalid. But, whether or not these decrees were erroneous at the time they were entered, they certainly afforded the foundation for the acquisition under them by respondents of title by adverse possession, and we see nothing in the record to warrant us in overruling the finding of the court to that effect. The court also finds that in 1891 the present plaintiff, and others joined with her as plaintiffs, brought a suit against the defendants in this case to have it adjudged that they, the plaintiffs therein, were the owners and entitled to the possession of certain undivided interests in the land described in the complaint in the present action; that said action was determined against the plaintiffs therein; that on an appeal to this court the judgment therein was affirmed, and that the plaintiff herein was thereby estopped from maintaining this present action. That case, entitled "Gregory v. Gregory," is reported in 102 Cal., commencing at page 50, 36 Pac. 364, and from the record in the present case it is difficult to say what effect that decision had upon the case at bar. As an authority, however, it seems to have determined that the land in contest here does not belong to the estate of James Gregory, deceased, and that the present respondents have a good title to the land by adverse possession. But it is not necessary for the purposes of the present case to determine whether or not the decision in Gregory v. Gregory strictly estops the plaintiff from maintaining this action. We see nothing upon the face of the judgment roll in the case at bar—in view of the principle that all presumptions are in favor of the judgment—that would warrant us in disturbing the judgment herein. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

TRUETT v. ONDERDONK. (S. F. 587.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 9, 1898.)

SETTING CASE FOR TRIAL—UNREASONABLE DELAY—FRAUD.

1. Where consent to the dismissal of an action is filed, but no judgment of dismissal has been entered, the action is still pending; and on a subsequent motion for plaintiff to set the case for trial, supported by an affidavit in which plaintiff asks to be relieved from the obligation of his consent to a dismissal, the case may be set for trial.

2. Where, after an action begun to wind up a partnership and obtain a settlement, the parties agree, before trial, to abide by the decision of an arbitrator, and the plaintiff files his consent to a dismissal, a motion made by the plaintiff, 14 years afterwards, to set the case for trial on the ground of fraudulent representations made by his co-partner to the arbitrator, should be denied, if the evidence in support of the motion does not prima facie entitle the plaintiff to relief, or if the discovery of the alleged fraud could have been made sooner by the use of due diligence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco. J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Miers F. Truett against Andrew Onderdonk. The action was dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellant. Fox, Kellogg & Gray, for respondent.

VAN FLEET J. This action was commenced on March 18, 1890, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, to secure an accounting and winding up of the affairs of a partnership alleged to exist between the parties as contractors for the construction of sea walls, grading of railroads, filling in, extension, and widening of streets, and works of a similar character; the complaint specifying in detail a large number of contracts for work of the character indicated as being in a state of completion or partial completion by said partnership, and alleging that a large sum of money was due plaintiff from defendant on account of such work. It was alleged that defendant had assumed and taken control of the work of said partnership, and all of the affairs thereof, to the exclusion of plaintiff; refused him access to, or an examination of, the books of the concern, or to further recognize him as a partner in the business; and, generally, as "wrongfully carrying on the said business without any regard to the rights of this plaintiff." Summons was issued and served on the day the complaint was filed. Within a few days thereafter the parties came together, and entered into a written agreement for the settlement and adjustment of their difficulties, whereby it was mutually stipulated that, to avoid litigation and publicity in regard to their differences, the same should be submitted to one Thomas W. Scott, as arbitrator, with full power to arbitrate and finally adjust all claims, demands, and matters of controversy, of every nature, existing between them; that each would "fully and faithfully keep, observe, and perform the award to be made by said Scott"; that said Scott should make his award within two days thereafter, and that the defendant, Onderdonk, should pay the amount of the award within 24 hours after notice thereof; and that thereupon this action should be dismissed. Scott accordingly proceeded and made his award as such arbitrator, finding that there was due the plaintiff the sum of $32,000. This amount was at once paid by Onderdonk, and Truett thereupon executed to him a full and complete release of all matters of difference between them, and thereafter, on March 26, 1880, caused to be filed in the action, by his attorney, this direction: "Let the above-entitled action be dismissed, and the clerk of the court is hereby authorized and directed to enter dismissal thereof without further notice. Hosmer P. McKoon, Attorney for Plaintiff." No judgment of dismissal, however, was entered upon said direction; and there the case slumbered until November, 1894,—a period of more than 14 years. In the latter month the plaintiff appeared in said court, through other counsel, and gave notice of a motion to have the cause set for trial, and to have a day fixed for the trial thereof. In support of this motion, he filed the affidavits of himself, said Scott, and one Martin. In the first, after stating the general nature and purpose of the action as alleged in the complaint, and that since said settlement Onderdonk had been continuously, with the exception of a few days, absent from, and a nonresident of, this state, these facts are set forth: That plaintiff was induced to enter into said settlement, and to authorize the dismissal of said action, by "a material suppression and misrepresentation of facts by the defendant," "by means of which plaintiff was greatly prejudiced by his consent to said dismissal, if the same shall be effective to dismiss the action." "That, among other suppressions and misrepresentations, the defendant caused to be represented to plaintiff that a contract regarding the construction of a section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in which plaintiff and defendant were mutually interested, and which had been obtained by defendant for the benefit of said firm, had been sold a short time prior to that, and for which nothing whatever had been realized for the benefit of said firm; the only consideration being that defendant was to receive a monthly salary as superintendent. That affiant, believing said representation to be true, made said settlement, and his attorney filed said paper authorizing dismissal accordingly. That within a few weeks last past the plaintiff has learned that said representation regarding said Canadian Pacific Railway contract was totally false; that the defendant had not disposed of the same for the consideration above named, as represented to plaintiff, but still retained an interest in said contract, out of which he subsequently realized a very large sum of money, amounting to several hundred thousands of dollars. That if plaintiff had known the facts regarding said contract, and that the same had not been disposed of as stated by defendant, plaintiff would never have consented to any settlement or dismissal of said action. That no part of said profits of said Canadian contract have ever been paid over to plaintiff, and, upon a just and fair accounting, defendant would be indebted to plaintiff, as plaintiff is informed and believes, in a very large sum of money."

Touching the manner and circumstances of his discovery of the defendant's alleged fraud, the affidavit states: "In the spring of 1894 there was published in the daily papers of San Francisco an account of the notorious actions of one Shirley Onderdonk, a son of the millionaire contractor, Andrew Onderdonk, of Chicago, the defendant herein, which article fell under my eye, and was read by me. The perusal of this article set me to cogitating, and to conjecturing how said Andrew Onderdonk had become a millionaire. Shortly after this I met a man whom I had casually known, and who had previously applied to me for a clerical position on the railroad which I was then engaged in building from Manzanilla to Colima, in Mexico. This man knew that Onderdonk and myself had been engaged together in building the sea wall in San Francisco, and spoke to me of the article or articles published about Onderdonk's son. We discussed this matter, and conversed about Onderdonk, and he then informed me that he had been engaged in some clerical capacity—bookkeeper, as I now remember—on the Canadian Pacific Railroad, at a place called 'Lyttons,' as I now remember. I do not remember whether his employment was with Onderdonk himself, or with some of the subcontractors on the work. At any rate, he was engaged upon the work. In this conversation this gentleman informed me that Onderdonk was very wealthy, and had made hundreds of thousands of dollars on the Canadian Pacific Railroad contract; that is, the contract obtained by said Onderdonk for the benefit of the firm of which I was a partner with said Onderdonk, referred to in my said affidavit. I have not seen my said informant since the aforesaid conversation, and I cannot at this moment recall his name. He knew me better than I knew him, and, although I well remembered him at the time of our conversation, I was unable then, and am now, to recall his name. Reflecting upon what I had learned from this man, and believing that he was in a position to know something as to what Onderdonk had realized out of said contract, I began to make inquiries of different parties, but gained little information. Finally, it occurred to me to call on O. B.

Martin, of San Francisco, who, as I recollected, had also been employed on the Canadian Pacific Railway; and from him I learned that the said Andrew Onderdonk had an interest in the profits of the contract, namely, the contract for the benefit of said firm as aforesaid, besides a salary of $1,000 a month. Pushing my inquiries further, Mr. Martin, at my solicitation, went to see a Mr. McLaren, who was likewise employed on the work, and Mr. J. McMullen, a subcontractor on said work, both of whom informed Mr. Martin, as he stated to me, that Andrew Onderdonk had an interest in the profits over and above the salary paid him. This information was obtained by me from Mr. Martin, and through him from Mr. McLaren and Mr. McMullen, the latter part of October, 1894. * * * The amount of the profits realized by said Onderdonk out of said contract, according to my information obtained as aforesaid, was several hundred thousands of dollars; exceeding, I believe, half a million of dollars. The information so obtained as aforesaid was definite and positive, and I verily believe the same to be true." The affidavit further stated the fact that no judgment of dismissal had ever been entered in the action, and that, upon discovery of the said fraud, plaintiff had retracted and withdrawn his consent to the dismissal of said action; and the affidavit closes with the prayer that an order be entered authorizing the withdrawal and retraction of said dismissal.

The affidavit of Scott states that, after the commencement of the action, he undertook the settlement and adjustment of the controversy between the plaintiff and Onderdonk; that, in the performance of said undertaking, affiant had a number of interviews "with said defendant or his agent, and negotiated with him, on behalf of said plaintiff, for an adjustment of their accounts and a settlement of their differences involved in said action; that in said negotiation said defendant gave affiant the items constituting the assets and liabilities of said partnership between plaintiff and defendant, for the purpose of forming the basis of settlement between them; that in discussing the terms of such settlement, and arriving at a conclusion, and in making of such settlement, the defendant, Andrew Onderdonk, stated and declared to affiant that he and plaintiff had obtained a contract to build a section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but that it became necessary to relinquish the same to other parties, inasmuch as defendant could not otherwise procure the necessary financial assistance to carry out said contract"; that Onderdonk further represented to affiant that he had retained no interest in said contract, and that the only benefit he would receive therefrom was a salary which he was to get as engineer in the construction of said section of railway, and that, beyond such salary, he had no interest growing out of said contract.

And it is also stated that in making the settlement said Canadian Pacific Railway contract was not taken into consideration as an asset of said partnership, by reason of the facts represented by defendant as aforesaid. The affidavit of Martin is simply to the effect that affiant had heard read the affidavit of plaintiff, Truett, and "that in so far as the same refers to him [affiant], and to things and matters learned through this affiant, the same is true."

With these affidavits, plaintiff also filed this paper, signed by him in person: "Now comes the plaintiff, Miers F. Truett, in the above-entitled action, and withdraws and retracts the order or authorization for a dismissal of said action filed herein by his attorney, Hosmer P. McKoon, on the 26th day of March, 1880. Dated November 1, 1894."

At the hearing of plaintiff's motion in February, 1895, counsel specially appeared for the defendant for the purpose of opposing the same, and to urge a counter motion on behalf of defendant, that a judgment of dismissal be entered as directed by plaintiff in his authorization filed March 26, 1880. The motions were heard together, and the facts shown on the hearing were as above stated. Thereafter, on February 27, 1895, the court made an order denying plaintiff's motion, and granting that of defendant, and judgment was thereupon entered dismissing the action. Plaintiff appeals from said order, and from the judgment.

Certain objections are urged by respondent which would preclude an inquiry into the merits of the real question presented by the appeal, but we deem them untenable. The motion, although technically to set the case for trial, fairly involved the further relief asked by plaintiff's affidavit, that he be relieved from the obligation of his consent to a dismissal. Nor had the court lost jurisdiction to entertain the motion. The action was still pending. It had not been dismissed, for the reason that no judgment of dismissal had been entered as required by the statute. Acoc v. Halsey, 90 Cal. 215, 27 Pac. 193; Brady v. Times-Mirror Co., 106 Cal. 56, 39 Pac. 209. Nor can there be any question of the power of the court, if the circumstances justified it, to relieve plaintiff from the obligation of his order of dismissal. It was, in its nature, but a stipulation; and it is always competent for the court to control such conventions, in the interest of justice, where for any reason they have been improvidently entered into. Robinson v. Exempt Fire Co., 103 Cal. 1, 36 Pac. 955. The material question presented, however, is whether, upon the showing made, assuming all the material statements of fact to be true, it was the duty of the court to grant plaintiff's motion, and its refusal to do so was an abuse of discretion. The purpose to be subserved by the motion may be regarded as analogous, in a sense, to that of an action to reopen an account upon the ground of fraud, or to rescind a contract upon that ground; and assuming, for the purpose of coming to the merits, that such a question may be presented by mere motion, and upon affidavits, the facts relied on should obviously be at least such as, if proved in such a case, would prima facie entitle a plaintiff to relief. We are satisfied that the facts here relied on do not meet that requirement.

In the first place, it may be seriously questioned if the facts tend sufficiently to establish any fraudulent act on the part of the defendant. There are some general statements in the affidavits of plaintiff, which, standing alone, would have that tendency, but it appears that those statements are not made from any positive knowledge, but from information derived from others; and, when the source of such information is given, it is seen to rest solely upon some vague, general, second-hand statements of third parties, one of whom plaintiff cannot name, and two of whom he did not himself see, and with no attempt made to state the source or character of knowledge upon which his informants based their alleged statements of facts. For all that appears, the entire fabric of plaintiff's information may consist of the idlest and most unfounded rumors. The affidavit of Martin does not state that he knows anything of the facts. All his affidavit may be taken to substantiate is that he told plaintiff certain things himself, and interviewed McLaren and McMullen on the subject, who made certain statements to the affiant; but as to the truth or authenticity of his own statements, or those of McLaren and McMullen, he does not pretend to state. The affidavit of Scott states the only tangible fact in the whole showing,—that defendant did represent that the Canadian Railroad contract had been disposed of without profit to the partnership. But there is nothing which competently negatives the truth of this statement, or which necessarily shows that, if defendant did thereafter in fact make money out of that contract, it was not under some subsequent arrangement, and in a manner entirely in consonance with the truth of his representations. We do not think that the court was bound to base a finding of fraud for any purpose, or to any extent, upon such evidence. The presumption is always against fraud,—a presumption approximating in strength to that of innocence of crime; and it should not be deemed overcome, even prima facie, upon a showing so intangible and shadowy. Heller v. Manufacturing Co., 116 Cal. 127, 47 Pac. 1016; Ex parte Fukumoto (Cal.) 52 Pac. 726.

But in the next place, assuming that the evidence was sufficient to make a prima facie case of fraud, there is an absolute want of any showing of diligence in the plaintiff in moving for relief in the premises. Plaintiff was aware, at the time of the settlement, of the existence of the railroad contract, and that it had been taken in behalf of the firm.

He so states in his affidavit. The parties in that settlement were dealing at arm's length,—in the face of litigation,—and yet the plaintiff took no measures whatsoever to verify the statements of defendant as to the actual facts with reference to this contract. He rested supinely and in blind confidence, so far as appears, upon those representations, notwithstanding the conduct of the defendant had been such, as alleged in the complaint, to arouse his just suspicions, and put him upon inquiry as to the defendant's good faith. There is nothing shown to indicate that defendant in any way prevented an independent inquiry by plaintiff into the facts as to the status of that contract. It is to be presumed plaintiff knew, because he does not negative such presumption, the source or channel through which the contract had been secured, and there is nothing to show that the slightest inquiry at that source would not have disclosed whether defendant's representations were true or false. It does not even appear that plaintiff examined the books of the partnership to ascertain what there appeared as to this contract. They might themselves have shown the truth or falsity of defendant's claim. It is not alleged that he was denied access to the books in the making of the settlement, and yet there is nothing to show what appeared therefrom. There is no claim that they had been in any way falsified or tampered with for the purpose of covering up the true status as to this contract. Notwithstanding these facts, neither then, nor for more than 14 years thereafter, did plaintiff make the slightest effort to probe the truth of defendant's representations, and there is not the faintest effort to show why he did not. It was certainly not by reason of the confidence reposed, or which he had a right to repose, in the defendant. That, as we have suggested, is negated by the averments in his sworn complaint. This lack of diligence is as fatal to the relief here sought as it would be in a direct action to recover for the fraud. Equity abhors a stale claim, and it was incumbent upon plaintiff to show facts excusing his long delay in asserting the fraud. It is not enough to assert merely that the discovery was not sooner made. It must appear that it could not have been made by the exercise of reasonable diligence. And all that reasonable diligence would have disclosed, plaintiff is presumed to have known; means of knowledge in such a case being the equivalent of the knowledge which it would have produced. Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135; Teall v. Slaven, 40 Fed. 774. Under the circumstances, we think the court below was fully justified in denying plaintiff the relief sought, and that plaintiff got all he could reasonably ask, in having the judgment entered without prejudice to another action. The order and judgment are affirmed.

In re WEED'S ESTATE. (Sac. 379.)

RESIDENCE—LOSS BY LEAVING STATE.

1. Whether a person is a resident of the state is a mixed question of law and fact, to be determined by the court.

2. Pol. Code, §§ 52, 1239, provide that a person's residence is the place where he remains when not called elsewhere for labor or other temporary purpose, and to which he returns in seasons of repose, and in which his habitation is fixed, and to which he intends to return when absent; but, if he removes to another state with the intention of remaining an indefinite time, he loses his residence, notwithstanding his intention of returning at some future time. Held, where a husband and wife remove from the state for a temporary purpose, intending to return within a year and a half or two years, and take all their property with them, and remain away nearly five years, although the work which called them away is completed several months previous to their return, that they lose their residence upon leaving the state.

3. Where a husband and wife have lost their residence in this state, the wife cannot regain her residence immediately by returning to the state on the death of her husband.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

H. C. Duncan and Mary L. Goldy each filed a petition asking to be appointed administrator of the estate of Theodore E. Weed, deceased. From an order appointing H. C. Duncan administrator, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, Mary L. Goldy appeals. Affirmed.

White & Seymour, for appellant. Byron Ball and J. C. Ball, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. Theodore E. Weed died, intestate, in the county of Yolo, in this state, on the 26th day of March, 1896, being at that time a resident of said county, and leaving an estate therein, consisting of real and personal property, of the value of about $20,000. He left no wife or children and no next of kin residing in this state, unless the appellant, Mary L. Goldy, was so residing. On April 2, 1896, H. C. Duncan, the public administrator of the county, duly filed a petition praying that letters of administration upon the said estate be issued to him; and thereafter, on the 13th day of the same month, Mary L. Goldy filed her petition, stating that she was a niece of said decedent, and praying that letters of administration upon the estate be issued to her. The two petitions were heard together, and thereafter, on June 5, 1896, the court made and filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and ordered and adjudged that letters of administration on the estate be issued to the petitioner H. C. Duncan. The court found "that the petitioner Mary L. Goldy was not a bona fide resident of this state at the time her petition was filed herein; nor was she a bona fide resident of this state at the time of the trial"; and, as a conclusion of law, that she was not competent or entitled to serve as administratrix. There are two appeals in the case. The first was taken August 3, 1896, and is from the order granting the petition of the public administrator for letters of administration upon the estate of said deceased, and refusing appellant's application for such letters; and the second was taken February 7, 1897, and is from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

Appellant contends that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and whether they were justified or not is the only question which need be considered. At the hearing, J. W. Hughes was called as a witness for appellant, and testified that he had been the legal adviser of the said deceased for many years, and at the time of his death had in his possession many of his papers. He then stated: "Upon the death of Mr. Weed, I telegraphed the fact to his relatives at Stamford, Conn., and for some of them to come out and take charge of the estate. In response to my telegram, a brother of Mrs. Goldy came out immediately. He had never been in California before. I learned from him that his sister, Mrs. Goldy, had some years before lived in California; and, in response to telegrams, she came out, and, on arriving at my office in Sacramento, signed her petition for letters of administration herein. Several telegrams passed between us. I can produce them." On objection of counsel for appellant, the telegrams were excluded by the court. S. N. Goldy, the husband of appellant, was called as a witness, and testified, in substance, that his business was that of a civil engineer, and that he and his wife came to San Francisco in 1889, and rented a furnished flat at No. 180, Clinton Park, in said city, where they lived until the summer of 1891, when they went East; that, when he came to San Francisco, he established an office on California street, in that city; and, when he went East, he did so for the purpose of perfecting an invention on which he was then at work, and obtaining patents thereon; that he then expected it would require eighteen months or two years to perfect his invention and obtain patents thereon, and intended, as soon as that should be accomplished, to return to San Francisco, and establish a business there in connection with his invention; that his invention was a machine for cutting and polishing hard woods, making chair rounds, wagon and buggy spokes, fancy house furnishings, moldings, and picture frames, and working up all character of hard wood requiring a high polish, and that the Pacific Coast, and particularly San Francisco, was peculiarly adapted to the establishment of such a business; that in 1890 he registered and voted in San Francisco, and ever since he moved there, in 1889, he had always considered, and still considered, that city his home, and had no other plans than to reside there, and carry on the business above described; that, while in the East, he registered at hotels as from San Francisco, and spent most of his time at Bridgeport, Conn., where he had a friend engaged in the foundry and machine business, whom he employed to construct the greater portion of the castings and other parts of his invention which were made of iron and steel, and could be constructed more cheaply there than in California. On cross-examination, the witness testified that he arrived in Sacramento the day before the trial, and that he had not been in San Francisco since he left there, in the summer of 1891; that he completed the construction of his machine five or six months before he heard of the death of Mr. Weed, and had not made any preparation to return to California. He was then asked by counsel for respondent: "Q. If your machine can be more economically constructed in the East, and the hard woods procured there in large quantities, what reason can you give for saying that you intended to return to California? A. Well, I expected to go into the business of fruit raising with Mr. —, who was to furnish the capital. Q. Where did you expect to locate your fruit farm? A. At Redding, California. Q. Where is Mr. —? A. He is dead. He died about two years ago." Mrs. Goldy was also called as a witness in her own behalf, and testified substantially as her husband did in regard to their coming to San Francisco in 1889, residing there until 1891, and then returning East. She said: "During all the time of our absence, I considered California as our home, and intended to return to this state. I might not have returned so soon if it had not been for the death of my uncle." And on cross-examination she said: "When we went East, in 1891, we gave up our rooms, and took everything we owned with us." "While in Bridgeport, we rented rooms already furnished, * * * where we lived for over two years. We were living there when we heard of uncle's death. My husband always returned to Bridgeport when away on business." "I would not have returned to California when I did had not uncle died. I came out to administer on his estate, and signed the petition for administration the day I arrived in Sacramento, before I went to San Francisco. When we heard of uncle's death, my brother started for California, expecting to administer on the estate. * * * After my brother arrived in California, we found out that he could not administer on the estate; and, as I had at one time lived in California, they had me come out to administer on the estate. I am living in the same rooms in San Francisco that we occupied at No. 180, Clinton Park, in 1890. I found them vacant, and rented them by the month, already furnished."

The above was, in substance, all the evidence given at the hearing, and the question is: Does it appear therefrom that appellant was a bona fide resident of this state at the time she made her application for letters, or at the time of the trial? If not, she was, under our statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1369), incompetent to serve as administratrix, and her application was properly denied. Whether appellant was a bona fide resident of the state or not was a mixed question of law and fact to be determined by the court. We have no statute declaring what acts are necessary to constitute a bona fide residence in this state, but there are several provisions in the Codes in relation to residence and nonresidence. Among others are the following: Section 52 of the Political Code, under the heading: "Person Composing the People of the State," provides: "Every person has, in law, a residence. In determining the place of residence the following rules are to be observed: (1) It is the place where one remains when not called elsewhere for labor or other special or temporary purpose, and to which he returns in seasons of repose. (2) There can only be one residence. (3) A residence cannot be lost until another is gained. * * * (5) The residence of the husband is the residence of the wife. * * * (7) The residence can be changed only by the union of act and intent." Section 1239 of the same Code, in regard to the residence of persons claiming a right to vote in this state, provides: "(1) That place must be considered and held to be the residence of a person in which his habitation is fixed, and to which whenever he is absent he has the intention of returning. * * * (6) If a person remove to another state with the intention of making it his residence he loses his residence in this state. (7) If a person remove to another state with the intention of remaining there for an indefinite time, and as a place of residence, he loses his residence in this state, notwithstanding he entertains an intention of returning at some future time." We see no conflict in the above provisions, and they are therefore to be construed together as parts of the same statute. Pol. Code, § 4480. And, in accordance with the law as thus declared, Mr. Freeman, in his note to Berry v. Wilcox (Neb.) 48 Am. St. Rep., at page 714 (s. c. 62 N. W. 249), states the rule to be as follows: "If a person actually removes to another place with an intention of remaining there for an indefinite time, and as a place of present domicile, it becomes his place of residence or domicile, notwithstanding he may have a floating intention to return to his old residence at some future time,"—citing several cases.

The question, then, is: Did Goldy and his wife lose their residence in California when they moved East, taking with them all of their property, and established a residence there which they maintained for nearly five years? That their return to the East was for an indefinite time was shown by the fact that it was to perfect an invention and construct a machine, which he expected would require eighteen months or two years, but which was not in fact completed until five or six months before he heard of the death of Mr. Weed; and, after it was completed, he made no preparations to return to California. At the commencement of his testimony, Mr. Goldy stated: "I reside at 180 Clinton Park, San Francisco, California, and have resided there since the year 1889." But this was evidently a mere fiction of the imagination. Further on, he stated that, as soon as his invention should be perfected and patents obtained therefor, he intended to return to San Francisco, and "to introduce and establish a business in connection with said invention." But this was inconsistent with other portions of his testimony, and particularly with his statement that, as a reason for returning to California, he expected to go into the business of fruit raising at Redding with a man who had been dead for two years at the time of the trial. Mrs. Goldy came back to California to administer on the estate, and, on the day of her arrival in the state, she signed her application for appointment as administratrix. She left her husband at their home in the East, and would not have come at that time if her uncle had not died. But her husband's residence was her residence, and, if he then had no bona fide residence in this state, we fail to see how she could have had. To be a bona fide resident of the state, one must really and in good faith have established a home or place of residence therein, where he lives, and to which, when away on business or pleasure, he returns. We conclude, therefore, in view of all the evidence, that both Mr. and Mrs. Goldy lost their residence in this state when they left the state, in 1891, and went East to live.

But it is urged that, conceding appellant lost her residence in California when she went East with her husband, she regained it immediately upon her return to the state, and became therefore entitled, by her new residence, to letters in preference to the public administrator. Counsel say: "From the moment she set her foot on California soil, in April, 1896, and declared her intention to be a resident of the state, and to remain permanently within its borders, she became a bona fide resident of California, just the same as though she had been born here, and never passed beyond its limits." This theory cannot, in our opinion, be sustained; and in effect a similar theory was, in the case of In re Donovan's Estate, 104 Cal. 623, 38 Pac. 456, held untenable. It results that both of the orders appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, both the orders appealed from are affirmed.

FOX v. HALE & NORCROSS SILVER-MIN.
CO. et al. (S. F. 683).<sup>1</sup>

FRAUD—COMPLAINT—RETRIAL AFTER APPEAL—ISSUES—EVIDENCE—AMENDMENT—ANSWER—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—REVIEW.

1. In charging fraud, a complaint must state the facts constituting the fraud,—at least, in a general way; and such facts must be alleged with sufficient distinctness to enable the adverse party to come prepared with evidence on the general questions of fraud which will be raised.

2. When, on appeal, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed as to one cause of action, and reversed and remanded for a new trial as to another cause of action, all the issues involved in the cause of action remanded must be retried, though the appellate court deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the judgment of the trial court on one of the issues.

3. When defendants are charged with a fraudulent conspiracy for two purposes, and it is proved for one purpose, the presumptions are still in favor of the innocence of defendants of conspiring for the other purpose.

4. Fraud cannot be conjectured from the fact that defendants have been guilty of other independent frauds. The evidence must be satisfactory, within the rule stated in Code Civ. Proc. § 1833, defining "prima facie evidence" as that which suffices for the proof of a particular fact until contradicted and overcome by other evidence.

5. The admissions of questions and answers of witnesses in evidence, which assumed that certain samples of ore were fair samples, and that assays thereof were fair assays, without proof that such was the case, when the question at issue was whether they were fair samples, and whether they were properly assayed, is error.

6. When the complaint is amended in any material respect, so as to present new questions, on which issue may be taken, defendant may answer, as of course; and in such case the court cannot limit the defenses which may be interposed.

7. Some of defendants were sued by fictitious names, but the summons was personally served on them. The complaint was afterwards amended so as to properly name defendants. Held, that defendants were made parties, within the statute of limitations, when the summons was served.

8. On the first trial, evidence was taken of plaintiff's right to bring the action as a stockholder of a corporation, and the court found facts authorizing plaintiff to sue in behalf of the company. Defendants did not except to the sufficiency of such evidence, or present the question thereof on appeal. The case was affirmed on appeal as to a certain issue, and remanded for retrial as to another issue. Held, the findings being sufficient to show the right of plaintiff in that regard, that the issue as to the right of plaintiff to bring the action as stockholder was not open for investigation in the second trial, either as to the issue on which a new trial was denied, or as to that on which a new trial was awarded.

9. Where a judgment is affirmed as to certain issues and reversed and remanded for a new trial as to other issues, it is a modification of such judgment, and such action is within the province of the supreme court.

McFarland and Garoutte, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by M. W. Fox against the Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company and others.

For opinion on rehearing, see 53 Pac. 169.

Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. F. Herrin, Lloyd & Wood, Garber, Boat & Bishop, Bishop & Wheeler, W. E. F. Deal, and Ed. R. Taylor, for appellants. W. T. Baggett, L. D. McKisick, E. S. Pillsbury, and W. H. H. Hart, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought by plaintiff, as a stockholder in the corporate defendant named, against the corporation, the directors thereof, and various other persons; charging a fraudulent conspiracy between the directors and others to cheat and defraud the corporation. Among other preliminary allegations, the plaintiff charges that Hayward and Hobart were largely the owners of the stock in the Nevada Mill & Mining Company, and controlled and managed the Mexican Mill, and that they conspired with other persons to defraud the Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company. For that purpose they procured the control of the last-named corporation, and, by certain practices set forth, caused certain persons named as defendants to be elected directors of said corporation. It is charged that said directors were at all times controlled by said Hayward and Hobart in all official acts; that they all conspired to cheat and defraud the corporation by various cunning and fraudulent acts, practices, arts, and devices, intending by them to have the effect of increasing their own gains at the expense of the corporation and its stockholders. Certain devices and practices are then stated, from which it is alleged damage resulted to the corporation. Without attempting to set them out, they may be indicated thus: (1) Refusing to report to stockholders assays of the ores taken from the mine, that the conspiracy and combination to defraud might be carried out more easily and successfully. (2) Mixing low-grade ores with the high-grade ores, to increase the amount of ore to be milled, and the profit of the mill, and for the purpose of hiding and concealing the true value of the high-grade ore. It is charged that the corporation suffered damage from this source to the amount of $500,000. (3) They caused false and fraudulent assays to be made of the pulp at the mill. (4) The fourth is as follows: "As another of the acts, practices, arts, and devices concocted in aid and furtherance of said fraudulent conspiracy and combination, the said persons and corporations as aforesaid, so controlling and directing the affairs and management of the said mills, and the agents and employés thereof, caused and directed all of said ores to be handled or managed by a fraudulent system of imperfect milling or reduction, intending thereby to leave in the tailings, slimes, and residues a large portion of the gold and silver contained in said ores, which tailings, slimes, and residues plaintiff is informed and believes were afterwards worked over for the joint benefit of the aforesaid conspirators, and to the great damage and loss of the said mining company and its stockholders, to wit, about one million one hundred thousand ($1,100,000) dollars. (5) Alleges excessive charge for milling. (6) The sixth alleges that 6,000 tons of ore, worth $280,000, were sent by the conspirators to the Choller and Nevada Mills, which were wholly lost to the corporation. It is then charged that the directors, knowing all the acts, practices, and devices of said conspirators to cheat and defraud the corporation, combined with said persons to cheat and defraud said corporation, and did cheat and defraud said mining company, "through said conspiracy, combination, acts, practices, arts, and devices, of large quantities of bullion and money, the property of said mining corporation, to wit, about two million one hundred thousand dollars ($2,100,000)."

All the material allegations were specifically denied by the appellants, but the court upon the first trial found in substance for the plaintiff upon all the issues. The only damage found, however, was for the overcharge for milling, and that resulting from the alleged fraudulent and imperfect milling of the ores. Upon the last-mentioned issue, as to fraudulent and imperfect milling, the findings were as follows: "That the defendants Alvinza Hayward, W. S. Hobart, the Nevada Mill & Mining Company, and H. M. Levy, by and with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the defendant trustees, and for the purpose of consummating the fraudulent conspiracy and combination to cheat and defraud the Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company and its stockholders, did cause and direct all of said ores to be handled and managed by a fraudulent system of imperfect milling, whereby there was left in the tailings, slimes, and residues of said ores a large portion of the gold and silver contained in said ores, which tailings, slimes, and residues were the property of the Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company, and a portion of which tailings, slimes, and residues were afterwards worked over by said conspirators, who took, carried away, and appropriated the gold and silver extracted therefrom for the benefit of themselves, to the damage and loss of the said Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company and its stockholders." "That during all of the times from about March 1, 1887, until July 1, 1890, an unlawful and fraudulent combination and conspiracy existed by and between the defendants Alvinza Hayward, W. S. Hobart, the Nevada Mill & Mining Company, and H. M. Levy, and the defendant directors, and others, which unlawful and fraudulent combination and conspiracy was organized and conducted with the intent and for the purpose of wrongfully and unlawfully diverting valuable property, consisting of ores, residue of ores, and bullion, belonging to the Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company and its stockholders, from said corporation and its stockholders, to the use and benefit of the members of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, and said unlawful and fraudulent combination and conspiracy, organized and conducted with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the said defendant directors, for and during all the time that each was a director or trustee of said Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company; and there was wrongfully and fraudulently diverted, taken, carried away, and converted by said defendants, by and through said fraudulent and unlawful combination and conspiracy, valuable property, consisting of ores, residues of ores, and bullion, belonging to the Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company and its stockholders, to the damage and loss of said corporation and its stockholders, in the sum of $789,618, and the further sum of $222,217, caused by the fraudulent, excessive, and exorbitant charge for crushing and milling said ores, making an aggregate loss to the said Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company of $1,011,835. That all the defendants herein except the Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company are, and were at various times between the 1st day of March, 1887, and the 1st day of July, 1890, members of the said unlawful combination and conspiracy."

An appeal from that judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial, was taken to this court by the present appellants and others; and a full statement of the facts of the case, and of the issues involved, may be found in the opinion then rendered. 108 Cal. 369, 41 Pac. 308. The effect and meaning of that decision and opinion are of prime importance in the determination of this appeal. The following is a summary of the conclusions reached, and of the judgment rendered: "(1) That the defendants Hayward, Hobart, and Levy formed a fraudulent combination and agreement for mining and milling the ores of the Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company, but that the other directors of the mining company were not parties to this agreement, but were merely negligent in the performance of their duties, and are therefore chargeable only with such negligence, and are not chargeable with any actual fraud. (2) That the Mexican and Nevada Mills were under the control of Hayward, Hobart, and the Nevada Mill & Mining Company, but that it is not shown that the Vivian Mill was under their control. (3) That Hayward, Hobart, and Levy, with the acquiescence and consent of the officers of the Hale & Norcross Company, controlled the affairs of that company. (4) That Hayward, Hobart, and Levy, in pursuance of their agreement aforesaid, caused a quantity of inferior and worthless ores to be extracted from the mine, and to be milled, after being mixed with ores of a higher grade. (5) That the Hale & Norcross Company paid $7 per ton for milling said ores; that the actual cost of milling the same was about $4.50 per ton; that, by reason of their fraud as aforesaid, the said defendants were entitled to receive only the actual cost of milling said ores; that, by reason of having been required to pay $7 per ton for milling said ores, the Hale & Norcross Company had sustained damage in the amount of $210,197.50. (6) That the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the Hale & Norcross Company had sustained damage, by reason of the improper milling of the ores, in the amount of $789,618, and that the actual amount of damage sustained thereby cannot be determined from the findings of the court. (7) That the Nevada Mill & Mining Company, not having been served with process, was not before the court as a defendant. The cause is therefore remanded to the superior court, with the following directions, viz.: The judgment appealed from is set aside, and the superior court is directed to enter a judgment, as of the date of its former judgment, against Alvinza Hayward and H. M. Levy, for the sum of $210,197.50, with interest from that date, upon the issue presented by the claim for having paid an excessive price for milling the ore in the Mexican and Nevada Mills, and upon that issue the order denying a new trial as to these appellants is affirmed. As to the other appellants, except the Nevada Mill & Mining Company, the order denying a new trial as to this issue is reversed, and a new trial thereon ordered. Upon the issue presented by the claim for damages sustained by reason of the imperfect and fraudulent milling, the order denying a new trial is set aside as to all the appellants; and the court is directed, upon the evidence already taken in the case, and such other evidence as may be presented by either party, to make findings in accordance with the views hereinbefore expressed. Upon the amount, if any, of such damage sustained by the Hale & Norcross Company, in addition to finding the value of the ore delivered to the mills, the court is directed to find the amount and value of the bullion that should have been returned therefor. The court should also find what amount of this value of the ore delivered to the mills was necessarily lost in working, or would not, under fair milling, be separated from the baser matter, and also the amount of the money, if any, received by the mills from the working or sale of the tailings or residue of the ores."

From this it appears that the former judgment gave damages to the plaintiff only upon two claims made in the complaint: (1) For the difference between the charge for milling the ores and the actual cost; and (2) for damages sustained by reason of imperfect and fraudulent milling of the ores. As to the first of these, the order denying a new trial was affirmed. As to the second, the order was reversed, and a new trial granted, and upon that new trial the court was directed to find upon certain specific questions. The other issues, in regard to alleged frauds, from which no damage was shown or claimed to have resulted, were regarded as immaterial. The ground upon which this court sustained the finding as to the alleged excessive charge for milling the ores is plainly stated. It was, to restate it plainly and briefly, because it appeared that Hayward and Hobart, or their agents, had bribed Levy, the real manager of the mining corporation, to give the mills controlled by them the milling of the ores. They did control the mining corporation, as to that contract, and therefore their relation to the company was that of trustees, and they could not be allowed to make a profit out of a contract so procured. The corrupt arrangement entered into between Hayward and Hobart, on one part, and Levy, on the other, is called a "conspiracy," in the complaint, and also in the former opinion of this court, and a great deal seems to be made out of the epithet. It seems to be understood that it tends to prove a continued concert of action to cheat and defraud the mining corporation. The facts shown do not really establish a conspiracy. The whole arrangement,—so far as the proof goes,—at the worst, shows that the president, who was in fact sole manager of the corporation, was bribed to give them the milling of the ores. There is no proof that the arrangement between the defendants, bad as it was, went beyond this. If metal was by design sent into the tailings, to enrich them for the advantage of the mill owners, or if bullion was to be feloniously abstracted, Levy, so far as the proof shows, would not profit thereby; and this limitation upon the so-called conspiracy is clearly shown in the opinion rendered on the first appeal. After calling attention to the fact that the contract was simply that Levy should share in the profits of the milling done by the mills controlled by Hayward and Hobart, the opinion proceeds to state how far the corrupting influences of this illegal contract would naturally go. It is said: "It is next contended that the finding to the effect that Hayward, Hobart, and the Nevada Mill & Mining Company, in conjunction with the other defendants, controlled all the business affairs of the Hale & Norcross Company, is against the evidence. This finding is material only so far as it relates to the mining and milling of the Hale & Norcross ores, and as to those matters the evidence fully warrants the conclusion that a majority of the directors were, as above stated, simply acquiescent or passive, and that Levy did as he pleased. Whatever inference, therefore, as to participation by the mill owners in the control of the mining company may be legitimately drawn from the existence of the unlawful contract for a division of the profits of the milling, or from the manner in which the ore was milled, or from an inadequacy of returns of bullion, or neglect of proper precautions in behalf of the mining company, is to be considered as a fact proved. Undoubtedly, the existence of the contract supplied a motive to both parties to increase the amount of milling by the extraction of low-grade ores; and it may fairly be argued that it also afforded an inducement to Levy to connive at a careless and inefficient system of milling, by which a larger number of tons would be milled at the same cost, and consequently at a larger profit. But proof of a motive to commit a wrong is scarcely sufficient, by itself, to prove that the wrong has actually been committed; and it remains to be considered whether there was any other substantial evidence of the mining of the low-grade ores, or of imperfect milling." According to the evidence, the understanding between Hayward, Hobart, and Levy was that, if Levy would retire from the contest in the election of directors, he should have one-eighth of the profits of the milling of all ores from the mine which was done at their mills. Afterwards it was conceded that he might be a director, and still retain his interest in the contract; and finally he became president and the sole manager of the mine and of the corporation. It is quite conclusively shown that all he did receive was a share in the profits of milling the ore at seven dollars per ton. There is nothing which even tends to show that there was a conspiracy to purloin the bullion, and divide profits so made. Nor is there any allegation in the complaint of any fraud of that character, or of damages so resulting. Yet the last judgment is necessarily and admittedly based upon that very proposition. It is conceded, as is also shown by the opinion of the learned judge of the trial court, that the amount of the judgment was reached in this way. The true value of the ore sent to the mill was estimated as nearly as practicable. The defendants were then given credit for the estimated value of the slimes and tailings (that is, of the residue after milling), also for an estimated amount of moisture in the ore. This was deducted from the estimated value of the ore, and the difference is the amount of bullion which should have been returned. Of course, if that value in bullion was obtained from the ore, and false returns were made, the portion not returned to the mine was stolen by some one. The judgment, in effect, charges Hayward, Hobart, and Levy with the larceny.

It is strenuously contended by the appellants that no such fraud is charged in the complaint, and no damage from any such source claimed. The finding, it is said, is not responsive to any issue made in the case. It is quite obvious that, so far as the pleadings are concerned, this position is sound. The charge of damage resulting from an alleged system of fraudulent and imperfect milling is specific. It was done with the intent of unduly enriching the slimes, tailings, and residues, which it is charged were afterwards worked over for the joint benefit of the conspirators, to the damage of the mining corporation in the sum of about $1,100,000. This means, and was understood to mean, that the ores were intentionally so milled as to leave a large portion of the gold and silver in the residues, which by fair milling would have been extracted and returned to the mining company. Eliminate this charge, that the so-called conspirators purposely left a portion of the valuable metals in the residues, and there is no allegation in the complaint of any fraud with reference to the milling or of any resulting damage. Fraud is a conclusion of law, and, when made a ground of action, the facts constituting it must be stated. The law upon the matter is stated by Bliss, in his work on Code Pleading (section 211), as follows: "In alleging fraud, it will not suffice to say that the party fraudulently procured or fraudulently induced or fraudulently did this or that, or that he committed, or was guilty of, fraud. The facts which constitute the fraud must be stated. Fraud is a conclusion of law. A statement that defendants, in 'concert, did, by connivance, conspiracy, and combination, beat and defraud the plaintiff out of,' etc., does not state the facts that constitute the cause of action. It does not appear what they did. The legal conclusion—an epithet only—is applied to their acts, without knowing what they were. Fraud is not a fact. It is a name given by law to certain facts, to certain conduct of the accused party. The fact may be misrepresentation, deceit, specifically stated, and the term 'fraud' is the legal epithet applied to such facts. It is not the fact, not the thing done, but only a conclusion from the thing done. The term 'fraud' or 'misrepresentation' may not be used at all, if the facts appear." Unless the facts are stated,—at least, in a general way,—no cause of action is stated; and this court has ruled that the facts must be alleged with sufficient distinctness to enable the adverse party to come prepared with evidence upon the general questions of fraud which will be raised. Capuro v. Insurance Co., 39 Cal. 123. See, also, Taylor v. Bidwell, 65 Cal. 489, 4 Pac. 491; Herron v. Hughes, 25 Cal. 556; Gray v. Galpin, 98 Cal. 635, 33 Pac. 725; People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488; Meeker v. Harris, 19 Cal. 279; Triscony v. Orr, 49 Cal. 612. The answer to this proposition contained in respondent's brief is that this court at the former hearing declared "that there was an issue fairly and properly made by the complaint, which this court declared to be 'an issue presented by the claim for damages sustained by reason of the imperfect and fraudulent milling of the ores of the Hale & Norcross Mining Company by the defendants,'" and that the trial court was directed to take additional evidence and make findings upon that issue. This certainly is no answer to the argument. No one disputes that there is an issue made by the pleadings upon the claim for damages resulting from the alleged fraudulent and imperfect milling of ores. The question is, simply, what is that issue? No fraud or imperfection in the milling is charged, except that a portion of the valuable metals was purposely left in the ore, and sent into the tailings, to be, and which was, thereafter appropriated by the alleged conspirators. That the writer of the former opinion understood that such was the issue presented by the pleadings, and which had been tried, and upon which a new trial was asked, clearly appears from the opinion. The issue is plainly so stated: "That said mill owners, in furtherance of the objects of the conspiracy, caused all of said ores to be handled by a fraudulent system of imperfect milling, intended to leave in the tailings, slimes, and residues a large portion of the gold and silver contained therein, which tailings, slimes, and residues were afterwards worked over for the joint benefit of the conspirators, to the damage of said mining company and its stockholders in the sum of about $1,000,000." 108 Cal. 381, 41 Pac. 310. Again, on page 400, 108 Cal., and page 317, 41 Pac.: "The next, and by far the most important, exception to the decision of the superior court, relates to the various findings to the effect that Hayward, Hobart, Levy, and other defendants worked the ores of the Hale & Norcross Company by a fraudulent system of imperfect milling, by which a large portion of their value was left in the slimes, tailings, and residues of the mills." The court then proceeds to consider at some length the evidence upon which the court had found that the ores had been fraudulently milled, and the damage ascertained, and finally says that the value of the silver bullion was incorrectly determined, and that for this reason alone a new trial must be had. Then occurs the passage, much relied upon by the respondents, as to the proper method of determining the damage. This amounts really to nothing more than the statement that, when the court shall determine the amount of bullion which should have been returned, the value of that wrongfully retained in the slimes and tailings should be estimated as stated. And the court proceeds to say that, since a new trial must be had upon the question of damages, it is unnecessary to discuss the evidence offered to corroborate the general charge of fraud in the milling, by showing how it was possible to debase the battery samples, or to run the value into the tailings by improper amalgamation, or to abstract the amalgam or the bullion; and the opinion proceeds: "All these things have their place as tending more or less to corroborate other evidence of improper milling, and are entitled to such weight as the trial judge may think belongs to them when considered with the more direct evidence of the assay value of the ores, the bullion returns made, percentage that ought to be returned with correct milling." It is then stated that the trial court concluded that, inasmuch as the proper return of bullion was not made, a large part of the ore was improperly run in to the tailings, and consequently the tailings did not belong to the mill company. All this clearly indicates that the court understood that a new trial was granted upon the entire issue as to damages claimed for fraudulent and imperfect milling, including the issue whether the milling was fraudulent and imperfect, as well as to the amount of damages. It must be remembered that "whether the evidence is sufficient to establish the fact is a question of fact, which must be determined by the tribunal to which it is submitted. A declaration by the appellate court that it does establish the fact would be outside of its functions, and would not be binding upon the trial court." Wallace v. Sisson, 114 Cal. 42, 45 Pac. 1000. Had the supreme court said that it was proven that there had been a fraudulent and imperfect milling of the ore, but that the amount of damage could not be ascertained, and therefore, as to the issue in which such damage was claimed, a new trial was ordered, the trial court would not be bound by the statement as to the facts, but would be required to try the whole issue.

The order refusing a new trial upon the issue raised upon the claim for damages alleged to have resulted from a fraudulent system of imperfect milling was reversed. This, of itself, granted a new trial upon that entire issue, and not as to the amount of damages only. The language of the judgment is sufficient to identify the issue upon which a new trial was granted, and that is all that was necessary. Upon a part of that issue (that is, as to the amount of damage, "if any"), the court was directed to find upon certain special matters. This itself was equivalent to saying that, if there had been a fraudulent milling of the ores as charged, and damage had resulted therefrom, then the court should find as directed. It was not intended to limit the inquiry to these matters, however. The required findings are probative, and all have a bearing, not only upon the amount of the damage, but upon the question as to whether the ores were fraudulently milled in order to run the gold and silver into the tailings for the advantage of the mill company. The court was directed to find, upon these points: (1) The value of the ore; (2) the amount which would have been returned by fair milling; (3) what could not have been separated from the ore by fair milling; and (4) how much the defendants had realized by working over or selling the residues. All these inquiries have a direct bearing upon the question as to whether the ore had been fraudulently and imperfectly milled, with intent to enrich the tailings, slimes, and residues; but it is difficult to discover any reason for requiring a finding upon all these matters, if the new trial was only to ascertain the amount of damage, and this was a direction as to how that was to be determined. Counsel for the respondent say that they do not know why the court was directed to find how much the defendants realized from working the tailings, unless that amount was to be added to the damages ascertained by the other process, by which the court found what ought to have been returned. Of course, that would have been absurd; for when the court determined the amount of metal in the ore, and how much was in the tailings, slimes, and residues, and concluded that the difference showed what had been extracted, evidently there could be no further damage, if, as now found, the milling was perfectly done. It was not intended that the court should determine the damage by either any or all the processes indicated, to the exclusion of other methods; nor was it supposed or indicated that necessarily any question as to the amount of damage would be tried at all. Not only is the presumption very strong that the new trial granted was that which was asked for and had been denied upon an issue then in the case, but it is not to be believed, unless indicated by language to which no other construction can possibly be given, that the supreme court sent the case down with directions to try a question which was not before in the case, and which would award to the plaintiff damages for which he had not asked. Perhaps the statute of limitations had then run against the claim, and the defendants were thereby prevented from pleading it. The issue was twofold: Was there a fraudulent conspiracy to imperfectly mill the ores, as charged, and were the ores so milled to the injury of the mining corporation? If this be answered in the affirmative, the question then is, how much has the plaintiff been injured? Upon the first part of this inquiry the presumptions are with the defendants all through the case, both as to the existence of fraud, and the extent of it. The presumption of innocence is one of the strongest disputable presumptions known to the law. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subs. 1, 19; Hunter v. Hunter, 111 Cal. 261, 43 Pac. 756. The fraud being proven, upon the question of damage only are the presumptions against the wrongdoers. It is evident that the court entered upon the retrial upon the theory that the question of fraud had already been determined against the defendants, and that such finding had been affirmed by this court. It is entirely evident that there was no attempt to try the issue made by the pleadings, which was a claim for damages for milling the ores under a system of fraudulent and imperfect milling, which was intended to, and which did, run into the tailings, slimes, and residues a large portion of the gold and silver contained in the ore, and which, by fair and honest milling, would have been extracted and saved for the benefit of the mining corporation. Practically, though not formally, the court found that the ores had been properly milled, when in its computations it gave defendants credit for the ascertained value of the tailings, slimes, and residues, and charged them with the ascertained value of metal contained in the ore. Necessarily this would be, when formally stated, a finding in favor of the defendants upon the issue as to fraudulent and imperfect milling which is made by the pleadings.

But suppose the respondent's position can be maintained, that under the general allegations of fraud, notwithstanding the averments of particular acts, and of damages resulting from such acts, the plaintiff could maintain a claim for false returns made by the mill, and the purloining of bullion, still it is evident that the case was tried upon a wrong theory, because, as already stated, it was assumed that the alleged conspiracy was not only proven, but that the new and unpleaded charge of stealing the bullion was within the conspiracy. Respondent, in his brief, claims that such was the fact, and that the action of the court is to be judged from that standpoint. If it were so found in the first trial, and had this court decided that the finding was fully sustained by the evidence, yet the order granting a new trial would have set the whole matter at large. This court would then only have said that there was evidence sustaining the finding, not that it was sustained by the preponderance or the weight of the evidence. But this court did not say anything of the kind. Denying a new trial upon the issue as to the alleged overcharge for milling did not imply anything of the kind. That was based upon the proposition that Hayward, Hobart, and Levy controlled the mining corporation, and contracted with themselves for milling its ores. How they got control of the corporation was utterly immaterial upon that issue. Had it been gained in the most honest and honorable manner imaginable, the result would have been the same. Nor did the judgment imply, nor did the evidence show, that the defendants had wronged the corporation out of a dollar. The corporation paid them what it would have been compelled to pay any other mill for the service. It could not have had the work done cheaper. That large judgment is sustained, not because the corporation was cheated out of the money, but under a rule of public policy which declares illegal contracts made by a trustee with himself, whereby he makes a profit, and compels him to pay over all the profit to his beneficiary, even though the beneficiary was not injured, and the profit would have been a fair profit but for the disability. But, if that finding were based upon a fraudulent conspiracy, it would have no bearing upon the question as to whether there was a further illegal agreement to defraud the corporation by making false returns of the bullion obtained from the ore, and by feloniously abstracting the bullion. The presumptions upon such further issue would still be in favor of the alleged conspirators. The burden of proof as to the whole issue is still with the plaintiff. In Conard v. Nicoll, 4 Pet. 291, the supreme court of the United States laid down certain rules as to proof of fraud, which have been often followed since: (1) Actual fraud is not to be presumed. (2) If the act may be attributed to an honest motive, equally as to a corrupt practice, the former is preferred. (3) "If the person against whom fraud is alleged should be proved to have been guilty of it in any number of instances, still, if the particular act sought to be avoided be not shown to be tainted with fraud, it cannot be affected by those other frauds, unless in some way it be connected with, or form a part of, them." See, also, Estate of Kidder, 66 Cal. 487, 6 Pac. 326; Paxton v. Boyce, 1 Tex. 319.

It is presumed, even in favor of a trustee, that he has done his duty; and when he has rendered an account of his stewardship, which appears to be sufficient and fair, the account is presumed to be correct. In order to charge him with fraud or unfaithfulness, the beneficiary must falsify the account by evidence which does more than raise a suspicion. The evidence must be satisfactory, within the rule stated in section 1833 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It cannot be conjectured from the fact that the defendants are bad men, and have been guilty of other, independent frauds. I do not think guilt can be properly found from a comparison of a number of conjectures, or the addition of various approximate estimates, by which the court ascertained the value of the ore only "as nearly as practicable," when in the same finding the estimates upon which reliance is placed are shown to be 28 per cent. above the real value. By deducting from this estimate the amount of gold and silver which was estimated to have passed into the slimes, tailings, and residues, and making another deduction for moisture, which certainly was simply guessed at even by the witnesses, the court found the amount of bullion which ought to have been returned, and determined that the difference between that sum and what was actually returned was purloined by the defendants in pursuance of a conspiracy to cheat and defraud the mining corporation. And it must be remembered that there does not appear to have been any suppression of evidence. This point is discussed on the first appeal, and it was so held there. But upon the last trial the employés of the mill were subjected to cross-examination, and answered fully, and with apparent candor. The books were produced, with clerks and bookkeepers, and the fullest scope for the investigation allowed. Hayward's private books were produced, and Hayward, Hobart, and Levy have been upon the stand. All the employés who worked in the mill testified fully, and to the effect that every ounce of bullion which was extracted from the ore (except, perhaps, that recovered from the concentrates, which the mill company claimed) was honestly accounted for, and returned to the mining company. Nothing of an inculpatory character was found in the books. Under such circumstances, nothing is to be presumed against the defendants as to this charge. And in weighing the evidence upon this charge the court should, at every step, have adopted the view which was consistent with innocence, unless the evidence to the contrary clearly preponderated. But what is the evidence which implicates Hayward, Hobart, or Levy in the supposed theft? There is certainly no evidence proving an express agreement or conspiracy to so defraud the mining company. In the absence of such proof, it must be shown that Hayward, Hobart, and Levy personally participated in purloining the bullion; that they in some way aided, abetted, or at least that some of the fruits of the fraud were received by them. This could be shown by circumstantial evidence. I have not been able to find in the record, including that upon the first appeal, a scintilla of evidence which tends to prove anything of the kind. The only evidence that bullion has been purloined is the discrepancy between the value of the ore as found, and the return made by the mill. Conceding that the discrepancy proves that some of the metal extracted was not returned, who took that which was not returned? It is conceivable that the employés could have taken and applied it to their own use. Indeed, if they did take it under circumstances that would subject them to a prosecution for felony, it would be strange that they would do it for the profit of others. Hayward and Hobart were not there. It is not shown that the defendants knew of or countenanced such theft, but, so far as their testimony and that of their employés could prove it, the contrary is shown. Not a pound of the bullion which is supposed to have been stolen has been traced to them, or to anyone else. One of the difficulties in the plaintiff's case is the number of confederates the conspirators would have been compelled to employ to enable them to carry out such a scheme. It is hard to believe that so many people, many of them well-to-do in the world, would have conspired to commit such a felony, or, if they did, that they would have trusted so many people with a secret which, if known, would consign them to the penitentiary. Another difficulty is in believing that about $500,000 worth of bullion, consisting of 60 per cent. of silver and 40 per cent. of gold, was feloniously abstracted under such circumstances, and by the most thorough and searching investigation not one pound of it can be traced to any one. The mill corporation would perhaps be responsible if the bullion was shown to have been extracted from the ore. But the defendants are not even sued as stockholders in the corporation. Proof that they controlled the corporation would not make them liable as conspirators. Stockholders have a right to control the corporation of which they are constituents. This would not make them personally liable for thefts committed by their employés. To make them so responsible, guilty knowledge and participation must be shown, and much more so when they are simply charged as conspirators.

Probably, when the action was commenced plaintiff hoped to be able to prove the fraudulent milling of the ores as alleged. Had he been able to do so, it would have been easy to believe that the fraud was perpetrated in pursuance of the same understanding or conspiracy under which the defendants obtained control of the mining corporation. It would also have proved a fraudulent appropriation of the property of another; that is, a taking under color and pretense of right, rather than an unblushing larceny, of which the defendants were in fact found guilty. It would also have been such a taking as would imply guilty participation on the part of the managers of the milling corporation. Their corrupt gains would be acquired only as stockholders. The control of the mining corporation, that there might be no complaints of ineffectual milling, and the participation of Levy in the profits derived from the slimes and tailings, if it could have been shown, would have favored the idea of a conspiracy. But when the plaintiff found that the milling had been thorough and efficient, and he was compelled to wage his battle from a new base, there were no facts so strongly favoring the idea of a conspiracy. In fact, the charge of a conspiracy was entirely irrelevant to the claim that bullion had been converted. If proven, conspiracy would have had no other effect than to connect the individual defendants with the trespass. The cause of action was the conversion. The conspiracy, if proven, was evidentiary merely. And then, if the bullion was converted by a larcenous taking, there is no presumption that it was done for the corporation or its stockholders, or even for the benefit or with the knowledge of those who, as owners of large amounts of stock, controlled the corporation. The great discrepancy between the mining-car assays and the return of bullion made is the only evidence upon which is based the finding that bullion has been converted. Does that fact tend to show that the conversion was in pursuance of a preconceived design on the part of Hayward, Hobart, and Levy? The learned trial judge says it is beyond question that the battery assays are false, and remarks that for no single month from January, 1887, to July, 1890, during which time more than 80,000 tons of ore were milled, did the percentage equal the car-sample assay, and adds: "Considering that all assays are somewhat speculative, and never absolutely exact, the fact that in all this mass of ore there was scarcely a single battery assay that even by chance went higher than the car assays is startling, in its evidence of deliberate, habitual design." Since the court found that the average of 84,000 car-sample assays showed a value 28 per cent. above the true value ascertained by him as nearly as practicable, and since he speaks in this very sentence of the assays as speculative, I doubt if there is any such implication in the fact. If the battery assays had frequently exceeded such car-sample assays, that fact would have condemned the battery assays. But, admitting that the difference is startling, how does that tend to prove that the conversion of the bullion, if there was any such conversion, was in pursuance of the alleged conspiracy? According to the theory of plaintiff, the defendants controlled both sets of assays. Why, then, did they allow this discrepancy to exist, if they were purloining the bullion, and were debasing the battery assays to hide the theft? The effort to show that the car assays were concealed was certainly a failure. There is at least a hint in the evidence that they were published daily. But, whether concealed or not, I do not see why such discrepant assays should have been allowed, if there was this design to purloin the bullion on the part of the personal defendants. In that case they were not wanted as a check on the mill. There might have been a motive for having the car assays too high, and that suspicion, if we are to indulge in suspicion, is as probable as the other. Perhaps some influential mine owners were then unloading. Certainly the discrepancy, however startling, cannot be accounted for upon the supposition that bullion was purloined by any one, in the absence of other inculpatory circumstances; and, if such conversion were proven, the burden would still be upon the plaintiff to connect the appellants with it. That has not been done, and can only be made out by boldly claiming that this court went outside of its functions as an appellate tribunal, and found as a fact that there was a fraudulent conspiracy to defraud the mining corporation, and to purloin its bullion. I do not find any language in the opinion justifying such claim, and, had there been, I doubt if we should feel bound by it. Certainly not unless it had been expressly and unmistakably so adjudged, and perhaps not then. Such a finding would not have bound the lower court, and therefore could not conclude this. Entertaining these views, it is not necessary to consider the numerous points raised as to the introduction of evidence at length.

1. I think the court erred in overruling the objections of defendants to the introduction as evidence of the books and statements of officers and bookkeepers of the Overman Silver-Mining Company. The question is not simply whether the result of the reduction of the ore of that mine could be shown, and compared with the working of ore in the Nevada Mill. The objection is to the mode of proving the results of working ore in the Overman Mills. The case of Insurance Co. v. Weide, 9 Wall. 677, 11 Wall. 433, and 14

Wall. 381, does not seem to me to have any bearing upon this question. There the evidence offered was not, as here, the unverified statement of third parties, but was direct. Had the working of similar ores in other mills been shown by competent proof, for the purpose of comparison, I think it would have been proper, and that is all that was decided in the case cited which is pertinent here. The same remark applies to another class of testimony to which objection was made. I think it was incumbent upon the plaintiff both to show that by sampling and assaying the value of the ore could be ascertained, and also to show that it was done by the method pursued in this case. In fact, the first proposition is involved in the last. On no other theory could the plaintiff be sustained in putting questions to experts on the assumption that samples were fair samples, or were fairly taken, or that there were no disturbing elements. Of course, if the samples were fair samples, and were properly assayed, that would end the controversy. But the question at issue was whether they were fair samples,—did truly represent the ore in the car,—and whether they were properly assayed. The questions assumed the point at issue, unless that was whether by sampling and assay the value could be determined. The questions and answers did not tend to show whether the samples involved here were fair, or that the assays were correct. It seems to me that all the questions put by plaintiff upon this subject assumed that the assays had been properly made.

2. The rule is that whenever a complaint is amended in any material respect, so as to present new questions upon which issue may be taken, the defendant may answer as of course; and in such case I do not see how the court can limit the defenses which may be interposed, any more than it could the defenses which might have been made in the first instance. The case is different where the court is asked to permit an amended answer to be filed. In this case I think the defendants had the right to answer, but I fail to perceive in what respect they have been damaged by the refusal. The amended complaint was allowed upon the first trial, to make it conform to the proofs. As to that trial, it served no other purpose. It should not be allowed in such case to present issues which have not been fully tried, and no advantage can be taken from the fact that some of the new allegations have not been controverted. The new trial was had after the amended complaint was filed. It is not contended that it is materially different from the former complaint, and the only injury claimed to have resulted is that the defendants could have pleaded the statute of limitations. It is not contended that the demand was barred when the action was commenced, or when summons was served on these defendants, but some of the defendants were sued by fictitious names. The summons was, however, personally served upon them. The complaint was amended so as to substitute the names of the defendants who had been served, for the fictitious names. Before this was done, it is thought, the limitation of the statute had accrued. I think the amendment was merely formal, and that the defendants were made parties in reality when the summons was served. True, they should still be made parties to the record as they were, but after that was done they are to be treated as having been parties from the time of service of process upon them. The answer already in was as appropriate to the complaint as amended as before the amendment, for it was in all material respects the same identical pleading.

The last point which it is necessary to consider is whether upon the new trial the question was still open as to the right of the plaintiff to bring this action as a stockholder of the Hale & Norcross Silver-Mining Company. Evidence upon this subject was taken upon the first trial, and the court found fully upon the subject. The facts which authorize the plaintiff to sue in behalf of the company were found. Upon the first appeal the defendants could have presented the question both upon the law and the evidence. By failing to except to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings, they waived that claim, and, there being no doubt as to the sufficiency of the findings to show the right of the plaintiff in that regard, this court necessarily concluded upon that record that the suit was properly brought. There was really no demand for a new trial,—none that this court could entertain upon that ground,—and no new trial upon that issue was awarded. The judgment here was an unusual one, no doubt. Appellants claim that, if the whole judgment was not vacated, it was one which this court had no power to make. They say this court can only affirm, modify, or reverse the judgment appealed from; and, as they contend, the judgment was not affirmed or modified, and must have been reversed, as they also say it was in terms. The judgment, as pronounced here, reads: "The cause is therefore remanded to the superior court with the following directions, viz.: The judgment appealed from is set aside, and the superior court is directed to enter a judgment as of the date of its former judgment against Alvinza Hayward and H. M. Levy for the sum of $210,197.50, with interest from that date, upon the issue presented by the claim for having paid an excessive price for milling the ore in the Mexican and Nevada Mills; and upon that issue the order denying a new trial is affirmed." As to another issue, specially mentioned, the order denying a new trial was reversed, and the court was directed to retry that issue, and certain directions were given as to the mode of trial. This judgment is not adequately described by quoting the first sentence, "The judgment appealed from is set aside." That sentence is limited and explained by what follows. The case was not sent back to be tried from the beginning. Evidently a part of what had been done was to stand,—all, I think, except as to the issue upon which a new trial was awarded. No findings were set aside, except upon the one issue. Upon the new trial the case would be taken as partly tried, and the trial court was told to proceed to finish the trial as directed. That which was reviewed was the order denying a new trial. The judgment was no further interfered with than was inevitable after the ruling upon the order denying a new trial. The judgment was set aside only to effectuate that ruling. So far as the judgment was supported by the findings not vacated, it was held in abeyance until the trial (which by the ruling was left incomplete) was finished, when one judgment would be entered, covering all the issues in the case. As to the order under review, it was affirmed in part and reversed in part, and this resulted in a modification of the judgment. So that in this case the court exercised its power in all the modes to which appellants claim it was confined. Although unusual, this action does not seem to me to be irregular, or at all suggestive of an excess of jurisdiction. It was all within the province of an appellate tribunal, and not beyond the power of this court as defined in the constitution. It must follow that the issue as to the right of plaintiff to prosecute the action as a stockholder was not open for investigation upon the last trial, either as to the issue upon which a new trial was denied, or upon that in regard to which a new trial was awarded. In fact, the direction to the trial court to proceed with the unfinished and incomplete trial was a ruling upon that matter. The court held that there was a case pending, and directed the superior court to proceed with the trial, and determine the one issue left open, in order that a final judgment could be made which would cover all the issues in the case. Of course, the order awarding a partial new trial may affect some general findings, so far as they determine matters brought in question in the special issue upon which a new trial was awarded. The right of plaintiff to sue was, however, the subject of a distinct issue, which was of the nature of a preliminary inquiry. Had that been found for the defendants, the court would not have proceeded to determine the other issues. When this court directed the trial court to proceed with the trial, it necessarily assumed that inquiry upon that subject was at an end. Nor do I think this conclusion a hardship upon the appellants. They had their day in court. The proper time for them to have presented the question was upon the first appeal. They did not avail themselves of the opportunity then offered. I do not see why they should have another. The judgment will therefore be, as upon the first appeal, that the judgment below is set aside, and the superior court is directed to enter a judgment, as of the date of the first judgment, against Alvinza Hayward, H. M. Levy, and the estate of W. S. Hobart, deceased, for the sum of $210,197.50, with interest from that date, upon the issue for having paid an excessive price for milling the ore in the Mexican and Nevada Mills. As to the issue presented by a claim for damages sustained by reason of imperfect and fraudulent milling, a new trial is awarded, and the court is directed to proceed and try that issue, and make findings in accordance with the views hereinbefore expressed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HENSHAW, J.; HARRISON, J.

VAN FLEET, J. I concur in the judgment, and generally in the views expressed by Mr. Justice TEMPLE upon which it is based. Were the question of the correctness of the court's finding as to plaintiff's capacity to maintain the action open to inquiry upon this appeal, I should strongly incline to the view that it was not supported by the evidence. But I am unable to perceive wherein either the reasoning or conclusion of the main opinion upon that question can be successfully upset. As conclusively shown by Judge TEMPLE, and as is indeed obvious, that finding was and is primarily essential to the validity of the judgment of the court below to any extent. Its correctness was in no manner attacked or questioned upon the former appeal. Upon that appeal the cause was remanded for a new trial solely as to the single issue of the alleged imperfect and fraudulent milling of the ore; and thereby, in all other respects, the findings and conclusions of the court below were manifestly as effectually sustained and affirmed as if so ordered in terms, since the lower court was left no power or discretion to reopen or disturb its findings or judgment in any other respect. In other words, our former judgment was equivalent to an express and final adjudication of the correctness of the proceedings of the court below in all respects other than the one particular as to which its action was reversed. Since this court has no power, under the constitution, to review its own final judgments (Fox v. Mining Co., 112 Cal. 568, 571, 44 Pac. 1022), upon the going down of the remittitur upon that appeal the question as to the plaintiff's right to maintain the action was definitely and finally concluded.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent from that part of the judgment which directs the court below to enter judgment against certain appellants for $210,197.50, and from so much of the principal opinion as leads to that result. I concur in all other respects in the opinion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE. I am of the opinion, however, that the language of this court on the former appeal did not preclude the appellants, on the second trial, from making the point, as to the whole case, that the respondent was not a bona fide stockholder during the time when the alleged causes of action accrued, and therefore not entitled to maintain the action,—a point which did not appear in the record on the former appeal, and was not on its merits then passed upon.

GAROUTTE, J. I dissent. When this case was before the court upon the former appeal, I felt compelled to dissent from the conclusion then declared. By that conclusion it was held that the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding of fact made by the trial court to the effect that 74 per cent. in bullion of the car-sample assay should have been returned to the Hale & Norcross Mining Company by the milling company. Upon the second trial of the case by the superior court, all the evidence introduced at the first trial was admitted, and in addition thereto other important evidence was introduced, bearing upon the issue as to the amount of bullion which should have been returned to the mining company. Upon the second trial the court found as a fact that 67 per cent. of the bullion as indicated by the car-sample assay would be a fair return to the mining company. It thus appears that at the second trial the percentage of bullion was reduced by the court, and at the same time the evidence upon the point strengthened. I am fully convinced that the evidence, as disclosed by the record, is amply sufficient to support this finding of fact made by the trial court. And I am therefore again compelled to dissent from that portion of the principal opinion wherein this particular issue is considered. Other questions of grave importance are involved in the appeal, and carefully considered in the opinion of the court. Owing to the press of other duties, I have not considered them, for the reason that my conclusion would not change the result of the litigation, even if by possibility such conclusion should happen to look in an opposite direction to the views therein declared.

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1898.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—TERMINATION OF ACTION —PROBABLE CAUSE—INSTRUCTION—ADVICE OF COUNSEL.

1. An allegation, in an action for malicious prosecution, that the prosecution on which the action is based had been finally determined in plaintiff's favor, is sufficient, without alleging, in addition, the means, as by writ of habeas corpus, by which that end was accomplished.

2. When a prosecution, under Pen. Code, §§ 701-714, authorizing the arrest of a person charged with having threatened to commit an offense, results, after a hearing, in an order requiring the accused to give an undertaking to keep the peace, the order, unless it is shown to have been procured by fraud, is conclusive evidence of probable cause.

3. In an action for malicious prosecution, it appears that, in one of the prosecutions on which the action was based, the plaintiff was discharged on a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground of the insufficiency of the commitment, and a possible defect in the warrant; and, in the other, upon the statement that she could not give a bond and assurances that she would not harm defendants, who were seeking to compel her to give an undertaking to keep the peace, she was discharged on motion of the district attorney, on her own recognizance. Held, that an instruction that plaintiff's release upon the habeas corpus proceedings and the dismissal on the motion of the district attorney were each a sufficient termination of the prosecution, for the purposes of this action, going to show a want of probable cause, is error.

4. A defendant in an action for malicious prosecution, who relies on the defense of probable cause by showing that he in good faith acted on the advice of counsel, after having disclosed to him all the material facts within his knowledge relating to the offense and the accusation, need not show that he also disclosed all the material facts bearing on the case which he could have ascertained by reasonable diligence, the other disclosures being sufficient.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by Fannie L. Holliday against Edward F. and Mrs. M. P. T. Holliday. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wm. J. Hunsaker, for appellants. James & Newby, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover damages for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment, based on a proceeding instituted by defendants against plaintiff before a justice of the peace, under the provisions of sections 701 to 714 of the Penal Code. The complaint contains four counts. The first count alleges that on the 19th day of August, 1895, in the city of Los Angeles, the defendants falsely and maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, charged plaintiff before William Young, a justice of the peace within and for the township of Los Angeles, with having threatened to burn the personal property of defendants, and to shoot, stab, and kill defendants, and that said defendants had just cause to fear the said threats would be carried into execution by said plaintiff if she was not restrained by the court, and procured said justice to issue a warrant for the arrest of plaintiff on said charge; and thereupon plaintiff was arrested under said warrant, and imprisoned in the county jail of Los Angeles county for the space of eight days. It is then alleged "that on the 27th day of August, 1895, upon petition of plaintiff for discharge upon a writ of habeas corpus, which was duly issued and returned, the said plaintiff was discharged from custody, and the said prosecution is wholly ended and determined." The second count alleges that on the 27th day of August, and immediately after plaintiff's discharge, as alleged in the first count, the defendants again procured the said justice to issue a warrant for the arrest of plaintiff upon the same charge set out in the first cause of action; and thereupon she was arrested under said warrant, and imprisoned for three hours, until released upon her own recognizance to thereafter appear and answer said charge; and "that on the 31st day of August, at the request of counsel for defendants, and on motion of the district attorney, the plaintiff was discharged from custody without examination, and said prosecution is wholly ended and determined." The third and fourth counts, by the instruction of the court, were withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, and they need not therefore be considered. Defendants demurred to each of the counts contained in the complaint, and their demurrer was overruled. They then answered, denying the allegations of the first and second counts relating to malice, want of probable cause, and damage, and, as a further defense to the first count, alleged that, after an examination of the charge before the justice of the peace, the proceeding was finally determined on August 20th and, as showing such final determination set up the following order made by the justice: "It appears to me that there is just reason to fear the commission of the offense within mentioned. I order that you, the said defendant, enter into an undertaking in the sum of $1,000, with two sufficient sureties, to keep the peace towards the people of the state of California, and particularly towards the affiants. Done in open court, this 20th day of August, 1895. Wm. Young, Justice of the Peace." And, in addition to the denials of the allegations of the second count, defendants alleged that they consented to the dismissal of the second proceeding solely for the reason that they and their counsel were assured by the counsel for the plaintiff in this action (the defendant in said proceeding) that she would not carry the threats, for the making of which she was charged, into execution, or otherwise harm or molest the persons or property of defendants. The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $500, on which judgment was entered. From that judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants have appealed.

The law is well settled that, to maintain an action of this kind, the plaintiff must allege and prove affirmatively malice and want of probable cause on the part of the defendant in instituting the proceeding which is made the basis of the action, and that the same has been finally determined in favor of the plaintiff. Appellants contend that the allegation in the first count of the complaint that upon a writ of habeas corpus, which was duly issued and returned, plaintiff was discharged from custody, and the prosecution was wholly ended and determined, was not sufficient to show that the proceeding had been finally determined in favor of the plaintiff, and therefore their demurrer to that count should have been sustained. The argument is that it does not appear that the petition for the writ was presented to any court or judge having jurisdiction to issue the writ, or that an order was made by any court or judge directing the discharge of plaintiff. But it was only necessary to allege that the prosecution had been finally determined, and not the means by which that end was accomplished. The statement that plaintiff was discharged upon a writ of habeas corpus, which was duly issued and returned, and the prosecution was wholly ended, should therefore, we think, be held sufficient.

It is further contended that the order of the justice of the peace made August 20th, requiring the plaintiff to enter into an undertaking to keep the peace, was a conclusive determination that there was probable cause for the institution of the proceeding which resulted in the making of such order, and was not subject to collateral attack. And, in accordance with this contention, defendants requested the court to instruct the jury that the order referred to, made by the justice upon the information before him, was "conclusive evidence that there was probable cause for lodging said information and prosecuting said proceeding." The court refused to give the instruction asked, and, at the request of the plaintiff, instructed the jury that "the fact that Justice Young rendered judgment requiring the plaintiff in this action to give bail in the sum of $1,000 to keep the peace is no bar to this action by the plaintiff," and that "the defendants cannot shield themselves on the first and second causes of action behind the action of Justice Young in issuing the warrants of arrest and committing plaintiff, if the facts stated in the information were false, and not believed by the defendants to be true." It is claimed by appellants that the court erred in refusing to give the instruction requested by them, and in giving the instructions requested by respondent, and many cases are cited on both sides as to the effect, as conclusive evidence, of judgments and orders of courts. Without reviewing the cases cited, we deem it enough to say that, while there is some apparent conflict in the decisions, the prevailing rule seems to be that when a person is charged before a competent court having jurisdiction of the matter, and is tried and found guilty, the judgment rendered, unless it is shown to have been obtained by means of fraud, is conclusive evidence of probable cause for making the charge, even though it is afterwards held to be unauthorized and reversed on appeal. It has, however, been held by this court that, in actions for malicious prosecution, the fact that the plaintiff, after examination, has been held to answer by the examining magistrate, is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of the existence of probable cause for the prosecution complained of. Ganea v. Railroad Co., 51 Cal. 140; Diemer v. Herber, 75 Cal. 287, 17 Pac. 205. Under the provisions of the Penal Code before referred to, authorizing the arrest of a person charged with having threatened to commit an offense against the person or property of another, the order of the magistrate, made after a hearing, and requiring the accused person to enter into an undertaking to keep the peace, would seem to have the force and effect of a final judgment and determination that there was just reason to fear the commission of the offense, and that the penalty provided should be imposed. If this be so, then such an order goes further and has a wider effect than an order made by an examining magistrate holding a party to appear and answer for some alleged offense before a trial court. We conclude, therefore, that appellants' contention on this point must be sustained, there having been no evidence that the said order of the justice was procured by fraud.

In actions of this character, what constitutes probable cause is always a question of law for the court. As said in Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 28 Pac. 937: "Malice is always a question of fact for the jury, but whether the defendant had or had not probable cause for instituting the prosecution is always a matter of law, to be determined by the court. If the facts upon which the defendant acted are undisputed, the court, according as it shall be of the opinion that they constituted probable cause or not, either will order a nonsuit (or direct a verdict for the defendant), or it will submit the other issues to the jury; but, whether admitted or disputed, the question is still one of law to be determined by the court from the facts established in the case. If the facts are controverted, they must be passed upon by the jury before the court can determine the issue of probable cause; but the question of probable cause can never be left to the determination of the jury. * * * The court cannot divest itself of its duty to determine this question, however complicated or numerous may be the facts. It must instruct the jury upon this subject in the concrete, and not in the abstract, and must not leave to that body the office of determining the question, but must itself determine it, and direct the jury to find its verdict in accordance with such determination. The court should group in its instructions the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and then instruct the jury that, if they find such facts to be established, there was or was not probable cause, as the case may be, and that their verdict must be accordingly."

In accordance with the law as above declared, the court, at the request of plaintiff, very briefly and meagerly grouped the facts which would constitute a want of probable cause, and instructed the jury that, if they found those facts to be true, the verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff. And, at the request of defendants, the court very fully grouped the facts which the evidence tended to prove, and instructed the jury that, if they found those facts to be true, then they constituted probable cause for lodging the information against plaintiff, and her arrest and prosecution, and the verdict should be for defendants on both causes of action. It is objected that the facts, as grouped at the request of plaintiff, were insufficient to show a want of probable cause, and that this was a fatal error, which calls for a reversal. But all of the instructions must be read together, and, when so read, we fail to see that the jury could have been misled. The jury must be presumed to have understood that if the facts, as grouped at the request of defendants, were not found to be true, then there necessarily must have been a want of probable cause.

At the request of the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury "that the release of plaintiff upon habeas corpus proceedings was and is a sufficient termination of the first prosecution; and the dismissal by the court on the motion of the district attorney on August 31, 1895, was a sufficient termination of the second prosecution, for the purposes of this action." In view of the evidence, this instruction, we think, was erroneous. Mr. Jones, who was the attorney for plaintiff in the habeas corpus proceeding before Judge Shaw, testified: "The ground upon which Judge Shaw discharged Mrs. Holliday was, as I remember, that the commitment was improper. It wasn't necessary to discuss the question of the sufficiency of the evidence, as she was discharged on account of the insufficiency of the commitment, and possibly a defect in the warrant. I think the main point that we pressed the most heavily was that the warrant of commitment did not conform to the order of commitment, and therefore she was unlawfully committed to jail, and she was therefore discharged." And as to the second discharge, it was proved that, immediately after plaintiff's second arrest, she and her attorney went to the justice's office, and there found Mr. Williams, the deputy district attorney; and that after consultation between the attorneys, and a statement by her attorney that she could not give a bond in any sum, and an assurance by her and her attorney that she would not do any harm to defendants, she was, on motion of the district attorney, released by the justice on her own recognizance. This being so, it certainly did not appear that either one of the proceedings against the plaintiff had been finally determined in her favor.

The court also, at the request of plaintiff, instructed the jury as follows: "The defendants rely upon the advice of counsel as one of their defenses to the causes of action for malicious prosecution, and upon this point the court instructs the jury that whether or not the defendants did, before instituting the proceedings, make a full, fair, and honest statement to their attorneys of all the material facts bearing upon the facts stated in the informations laid before Justice Young of which they had knowledge, or which they could have ascertained by reasonable diligence, and whether, in commencing such proceedings, the defendants were acting in good faith upon the advice of their counsel, are questions of fact to be determined by the jury from all the evidence and circumstances proven in the case; and, if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendants did not make a full, fair, and honest statement of such facts to their counsel, then such advice cannot avail them anything in this suit." By this instruction, the court, in effect, charged the jury that when, in an action for malicious prosecution, the defendant relies upon the advice of counsel as a defense for instituting the proceeding complained of, he must, in order to avail himself of that defense, prove to the satisfaction of the jury that, before instituting the proceeding, he made a full, fair, and honest statement to his counsel of all the material facts bearing upon the charge of which he had knowledge, or which he could have ascertained by reasonable diligence, and that he acted in good faith upon the advice of the counsel. In Dunlap v. Insurance Co., 109 Cal. 365, 42 Pac. 29, instructions of similar import were given by the court, and held to be erroneous, and, for the error in giving them, the judgment was reversed. The court, after a review of the authorities, said: "Assuming that in seeking the advice of counsel, and in acting thereon, he has acted in good faith, and has disclosed all the facts within his knowledge relating to the offense and the accusation, his defense of probable cause will be established, even though the defendant should show at the trial other facts sufficient to secure his acquittal, and which might have been ascertained by the prosecuting witness if he had made diligent inquiry therefor. It is not necessary that he shall institute an investigation of the crime itself, or seek to ascertain whether there are other facts relating to the offense, or try to find out whether the accused has any defense to the charge. He is not required to exhaust all sources of information bearing upon the facts which have come to his knowledge, for that would be to require him to perform the office of the committing magistrate, and thus thwart the very purpose of the law in inducing him to seek its immediate vindication for crimes committed against it. There are expressions in some opinions to the effect that, in addition to the facts within his knowledge, he must also have exercised reasonable diligence to ascertain whether there are any other facts bearing upon the charge; but, in an extended examination of the authorities, we have not been able to find any case in which it has been decided that such diligence must be exercised, or where the prosecuting witness has been held liable for failure to ascertain whether there were any other facts bearing upon the case." The case of Sandell v. Sherman, 107 Cal. 391, 40 Pac. 493, cited by counsel for respondent, does not sustain their claim that the instruction under review was not erroneous. In that case an instruction was given which stated that if the defendants "made a full and fair statement of all the facts of that case to their counsel," and he advised, etc., and they acted on his advice, "it is a good defense in this case." It was urged that the instruction was erroneous, for the reason, among others, "that it does not charge that they should have stated to the attorney all the facts within their knowledge, or which they reasonably could have obtained." But, tested by the general rule in such cases, the court failed to see any serious objection to the instruction, and held it to be sufficient. Following the law as declared in the Dunlap Case, it must be held here that the instruction under review was erroneous in so far as it charged, in effect, that the defendants could not avail themselves of the advice of counsel unless the jury should find from all the evidence and circumstances proven in the case that, before instituting the proceedings, they made a full, fair, and honest statement to their attorneys of all the material facts bearing upon the case "which they could have ascertained by reasonable diligence."

For the errors above noted, the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

HALL v. SUSSKIND. (L. A. 286.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 9, 1898.)
TROVER AND CONVERSION—INSOLVENCY—FRAUD—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—APPEAL —RECORD—REVIEW.

1. A stock of jewelry, several months prior to the filing of a petition in insolvency by the owner, was worth from $50,000 to $70,000. At the latter time the stock was reduced to $10,000, and was sold by the assignee for $7,100 to defendant, who took possession, and continued the business at the same place, assisted by insolvent's husband and former manager. Eight or nine months later his stock was attached by the assignee, and was found to be worth from $25,000 to $30,000. Sales in the meantime had been $34,000, and augmentation of the stock as accounted for by defendant only $4,600. Some of the stock in defendant's possession was identified as goods sold to the insolvent, but not turned over to the assignee, and a large portion was shown not to have been part of that sold by the assignee, nor to have been purchased by defendant elsewhere. There was testimony that insolvent's husband had admitted having secreted $25,000 or more of stock. The ordinary retailer's profit was about

50 per cent. Held, that the facts, taken with defendant's failure to account for such augmentation, show a fraudulent conversion, and a motion to nonsuit was properly denied.

2. In an action for fraudulent conversion of a stock of merchandise by sales at retail, it is not necessary to identify the specific articles converted.

3. Defects in a complaint cannot be reviewed on appeal from an order denying a new trial.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, subd. 3, requiring specifications of error to point out the particulars in which error is averred, specifications of errors "pointed out and designated in the transcript by exceptions Nos. 1 to 25" cannot be considered.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by A. I. Hall against Henry Susskind. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appealed. The appeal from the judgment was dismissed. Order affirmed.

Wells & Lee and C. Edgerton, for appellant. Graff & Latham, for respondent.

BRITT, C. This case, in a different phase, was before the court on a former appeal. Hall v. Susskind, 109 Cal. 203, 41 Pac. 1012. Plaintiff sues as assignee in insolvency of one L. M. Wagner, who, prior to her insolvency, was engaged in business as dealer in jewelry, diamonds, watches, silverware, etc., at the city of Los Angeles. In his complaint plaintiff charged that defendant conspired with said insolvent and her husband (one J. B. Wagner, who was her managing agent) to secrete and conceal a portion of her estate, described as "consisting of diamonds, watches, and jewelry," to prevent the same from coming into the possession of the assignee; that the insolvent did conceal property not exempt by law; that the defendant took possession of said concealed property knowing it to be part of the insolvent's estate, converted the same to his own use, and sold a portion thereof of the value of $30,000. The court found, among other things, that after said J. B. Wagner, acting on behalf of said insolvent, had concealed and secreted part of her estate,—described as in the complaint,—the defendant with knowledge of such concealment, and that the property concealed was part of the insolvent's estate, took possession of the same, and sold a portion thereof for cash, between November 16, 1892, and July 26, 1893, and that the value of the goods thus sold was $15,000, for which sum plaintiff had judgment.

Defendant's appeal from the judgment was dismissed. On the appeal from the order denying a new trial the main question made is whether the evidence sustained the finding of fraudulent conversion by defendant. The evidence was mostly circumstantial. It tended to show that Mrs. Wagner's stock in trade in the month of March, 1892, was worth from $60,000 to $70,000. In July, 1892, it was valued at $50,000. On September 22, 1892, the same was seized under a writ of attachment, and a few days later—on September 28th—she filed her petition in insolvency. The goods she then had in stock were worth, perhaps, $10,000, though there were estimates of witnesses thereon at considerably less than that sum; and on November 16, 1892, plaintiff, as assignee of said insolvent, sold the same at public auction to the defendant for the sum of $7,100. Defendant received possession of the goods thus purchased, and embarked in the same business as that previously conducted by the insolvent, and at the same stand. He was assisted therein by said J. B. Wagner, though in what capacity is not clear. Between November 16, 1892, and July 26, 1893, defendant made sales by auction and otherwise out of his stock to the amount, the evidence tended to show, of about $34,000. On the date last mentioned all the goods then in his possession were attached as the property of L. M. Wagner at the suit of one Wunsch and others, creditors of said L. M. Wagner. Some particulars of that action are related in Susskind v. Hall, 44 Pac. 328. At the time of this attachment defendant had on hand goods of the estimated value of $25,000 to $30,000. In the stock then attached in defendant's possession were found a considerable number of valuable gold watches; also several elaborate pieces of diamond jewelry, which were clearly identified as having been purchased by said insolvent, and it seems carried in stock by her, prior to her insolvency, but which were not included in the assets surrendered to the assignee, and sold by him to defendant. In March, 1892, the diamonds held in the Wagner stock were worth $20,000 or more. At the time of the insolvency the value of the diamonds on hand (and thereafter sold with the general stock by the assignee to defendant) was found to be from $1,300 to $1,500; but at the time of the second attachment, in July, 1893, the diamond stock in the hands of defendant was worth some $14,000. The only additions shown to have been made to defendant's stock by purchase between the time of the sale to him by the assignee (November 16, 1892) and the time of the second attachment (July 26, 1893) consisted of diamonds, watches, etc., to the amount of about $4,600. There was also evidence that said J. B. Wagner stated in conversation shortly after the filing of his wife's petition in insolvency that he was afraid of certain creditors, and had secreted goods. Being asked, "Did you put away $20,000?" he said, "Yes; I put away more than that." "Did you put away $25,000?" and he replied, "Yes; plenty." Some declarations of defendant were given in evidence which tended to show an understanding between him and J. B. Wagner that when defendant was repaid the money he had invested, with certain interest, the stock should belong to Wagner; also that he had been so repaid prior to the second attachment. He continued, however, in possession of the property, and claimed to own the same. When that attachment was levied, defendant was asked to open the strong box inside the safe belonging to the establishment. He refused, saying that it contained nothing but his private papers. It was opened a few days later, and found to contain diamonds and jewelry worth $2,500 or more. It seems that all, or a large portion, of these goods were not part of the stock sold by the assignee to defendant on November 16, 1892, and were not shown to have been purchased by defendant elsewhere. When the case for plaintiff was closed, defendant moved for a nonsuit, which being denied, he declined to introduce any evidence.

We think the nonsuit was properly denied, and that the evidence before the court—stated above in outline merely—justified the material findings. It is true, as said in a recent case here, that the presumption of law is always in favor of the fair dealing of the parties to a transaction, and that mere suspicion of fraud is not sufficient to overcome the presumption. Levy v. Scott, 115 Cal. 39, 46 Pac. 892. But it is also true, as conceded in the same case, that fraud is commonly established by facts and circumstances which logically denote its existence, rather than by direct proof of covinous contrivance; by circumstances which, taken together, lead to the inference of fraud, rather than to that of honesty. "Evidence is to be estimated not only by its own intrinsic weight, but also according to the evidence which it is in the power of one side to produce and the other to contradict." Code Civ. Proc. § 2061. Here it appeared that defendant purchased goods at a cost of less than $12,000, and which there was evidence to show were worth not greatly more than that sum. He made sales amounting to $34,000, and still had stock in his store worth above $25,000. Admitting that he sold at a profit of 50 per cent.,—which was said in the testimony to be a fair profit for the retailer over the wholesale price,—it is still apparent that his stock was enormously augmented from some undisclosed source. If, now, the estimates and values given in evidence for plaintiff were false, it must have been easy for defendant, by production of his books or otherwise, to contradict them. If he received accessions to his stock by purchase, gift, or consignment, in addition to those proved by plaintiff, or if the goods found in his stock which had been formerly owned by Mrs. Wagner, and not surrendered by her to the assignee in insolvency, were introduced into his store without his knowledge, or had been in some way legitimately obtained, it was easy for defendant to prove these facts, and very difficult for plaintiff to prove the contrary. He offered no proof, and cannot justly complain if the court viewed his neglect with suspicion, and gave to plaintiff the advantage of the unfavorable inferences which the evidence justified. Bode v. Lee, 102 Cal. 583, 36 Pac. 936; Newman v. Cordell, 43 Barb. 448, 461; Bump, Fraud. Conv. (4th Ed.) § 65. These considerations suffice to answer the specific objections urged that the evidence showed no ownership of goods alleged to have been converted either in the insolvent or in the plaintiff as her assignee, and that it failed to show that defendant converted any such goods. That the evidence pointed to the fraudulent concealment of a very large part in value of the insolvent's stock in trade prior to the filing of her petition is clear, and is not disputed by counsel. Of course any goods thus concealed belonged rightfully to the assignee. We may allow that defendant was not shown to have been either party or privy to such concealment in the first instance, but it was not essential to the making out of plaintiff's case to prove that he was. The important inquiry was whether defendant had knowingly converted to his own use property of the insolvent estate. Many articles which, it was reasonable to infer, had been concealed by Wagner, were found in defendant's possession, and he offered no explanation of this fact. The amount of his sales, and the goods remaining in his stock unsold, were out of all proportion to the investment he had made, and as to this incongruity he also remained silent. From these and the other facts developed it was a fair inference that the sales he had made included goods which had been surreptitiously withheld from the assignee.

It is claimed that there was no proof to sustain the court's finding of value of the goods converted,—$15,000. But given the fact found, upon sufficient evidence, as we hold, that defendant sold property belonging to the assignee, and it is apparent that the amount of such sales was peculiarly within the knowledge of defendant, and extremely difficult to ascertain by plaintiff. Defendant offering no proof, the court was forced to deduce the conclusion of value from the estimates before it, and of this defendant ought not to complain, provided the deduction was fairly made. We think it was. Defendant's sales had amounted approximately to $34,000. Assuming—what is improbable—that all the goods shown to have been purchased by him were again sold, and at a liberal margin of profit, the proceeds thereof would still be short of the total amount of sales by the sum of $15,000 or more. It is unnecessary to specify other elements which may have entered into the estimate made by the court.

It is further urged that the evidence was fatally deficient, in that it did not identify the goods in question; that is, as we understand the argument, describe with certainty sufficient for identification the "diamonds, watches, and jewelry" mentioned in the findings, and show, first, the concealment, and, secondly, the conversion, of goods so identified. We do not think this degree of certainty can be required in an action like the present, where, from the dispersion of the goods in the usual course of retail traffic, and other difficulties apparent in the evidence, identification was virtually impossible to the plaintiff. In modern times the rule of the action of trover invoked by defendant has not been considered hard and fast, but, on the contrary, as one amenable to circumstances. Thus, at a period when more strictness was required than now, trover was allowed for a "library of books," without expressing what they were, "because to set down the particular books would make the record too prolix." Emery's Case, cited in Elpicke v. Acton, 1 Vent. 114. Also for a "parcel of diamonds." White v. Graham, 2 Strange, 827. And see Bode v. Lee, 102 Cal. 590, pl. 4, 36 Pac. 936; Seligman v. Armando, 94 Cal. 314, 29 Pac. 710; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 804, note 4; Bank v. Montgomery, 70 Miss. 550, 13 South. 242; Taylor v. Wells, 2 Saund. 74, note. Possibly, the complaint was defective, as contended by defendant, in failing to show why the property was not more specifically described therein; but defects in the complaint are not reviewable on appeal from an order denying a new trial. Brisson v. Brisson, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186. The finding followed the description in the complaint, and is sustained by the evidence, which discloses also sufficient reason for the generality of the finding.

It is argued that the court erred in several rulings regarding the admission of evidence. The only specification of such errors contained in the statement on motion for new trial is that they are "pointed out and designated in the foregoing transcript by exceptions Nos. 1, 2, 3, etc., to 25, and the court erred in each of its said rulings." This was no more than to say that the court erred in the various rulings excepted to by defendant as shown in the transcript, and can scarcely be regarded as such a specification of particular errors as the statute requires. Code Civ. Proc. § 659, subd. 3. Moreover, we have been unable to find an exception in the transcript numbered in any manner. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. KANSAS ST. IMP. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of California. May 9, 1898.)

In bank. On application for rehearing, denied.

For former opinion, see 52 Pac. 811.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied, May 7, 1898.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing in this case, not because I disapprove of the judgment of affirmance, but because the ground upon which it is placed is not sustained by the record. The findings of the superior court make it clear that considerable losses accrued upon those contracts, as to which the department opinion concedes that the respondent may have been liable for contribution; but I think the superior court correctly decided, upon the facts found, that by his withdrawal from the partnership upon September 19, 1887, Green was released and discharged from all liability to the co-partnership.

MARTIN et al. v. WAGNER et al. (Sac. 294.)
(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1898.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ASSESSMENTS FOR STREET IMPROVEMENT—WHAT LAND SUBJECT.

1. Defendant owned half of an irregular block in the shape of a right-angled triangle, and his property touched the street corner in question, on which the assessments for paving were levied, at the point of an acute angle. The property fronted on the street which intersected the corner at right angles. Held, that the land was subject to assessment for improvements on the street crossing touching the acute angle, under St. 1891, p. 196, § 7, subd. 3, providing that the expense of the work done on main street crossings shall be assessed on the quarter blocks and irregular blocks adjoining and cornering on the crossings, and separately on the whole of each lot or portion of a lot having any frontage in the said blocks fronting on said main streets halfway to the next main street crossing, and all the way on said blocks to a boundary line of the city where no such crossing intervenes, but only according to its frontage in said quarter blocks and irregular blocks.

2. A main street ran diagonally through what would have constituted a block had not half of it been cut off by a lake, and terminated at the corner of said block where two other streets intersected. Held, that the quarter block facing on such street, and adjoining such crossing, could be assessed for paving such crossing, under St. 1891, p. 196, § 7, subd. 4, providing that, where a main street terminates in another main street, the expenses of the work done on one-half of the width of the street opposite the termination shall be assessed on the lots in each of the two quarter blocks adjoining and cornering on the same, and the expense of the other half of the width of said street on the lots fronting on the other half of the street at such termination.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by M. M. Martin and others against

J. C. Wagner and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Jas. A. Louttit, for appellants. Elliott & Elliott, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action on a street assessment for work done and materials furnished in paving and improving El Dorado street, in the city of Stockton. The complaint sets out very fully all the facts necessary to constitute a cause of action, and the only denials in the answer are (1) that the total cost of the street improvement was assessed and apportioned upon all the lots and lands assessable and liable therefor; (2) that defendants, or either of them, own any property fronting on said work or improvement; and (3) that the land described in the complaint has any frontage upon said improvement. The court below found in favor of defendants upon all the issues raised, and gave judgment accordingly, from which, within 60 days after its rendition, the plaintiffs appealed.

The defendant J. C. Wagner was the owner of the east half of block 94, east of Center street, as known and designated on the official map of said city, and the following diagram of the block with its surrounding streets will serve to illustrate the situation:

It was admitted that the said block has a frontage on Oak street, between El Dorado and Center streets, of 300 feet, city measure. There was an assessment upon the 150 feet of the said block fronting on Oak street, and owned by defendant, to pay a proportionate share of the expense of the improvement on the crossing of El Dorado and Oak streets; and there was another assessment called "Opposite Termination" assessment, upon 167½ feet of defendant's said land fronting on Fremont street, the two assessments aggregating the sum sued for. It will be observed that said block 94 is in the form of a right-angled triangle, and that it touches El Dorado street only at the point of an acute angle. Under these circumstances, the question, and the only one mooted, is, was his land subject to assessment for any improvements made on the said street?

The street improvement act of 1885, as amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 196), contains the following provisions: Section 7, subd. 3: "The expense of the work done on main street crossings shall be assessed at a uniform rate per front foot of the quarter blocks and irregular blocks adjoining and cornering upon the crossings, and separately upon the whole of each lot or portion of a lot having any frontage in the said blocks fronting on said main streets, half way to the next main street crossing, and all the way on said blocks to a boundary line of the city where no such crossing intervenes, but only according to its frontage in said quarter blocks and irregular blocks." Section 7, subd. 4: "Where a main street terminates in another main street, the expenses of the work done on one-half of the width of the street opposite the termination shall be assessed upon the lots in each of the two quarter blocks adjoining and cornering on the same,—according to the frontage of such lots on said main streets,—and the expense of the other half of the width of said street upon the lot or lots fronting on the latter half of the street at such termination." Section 34, subd. 7: "The word 'street,' as used in this act, shall be deemed to, and is hereby declared to, include * * * crossings or intersections, * * * and the term 'main street' means such actually opened street or streets as bound a block; the word 'blocks,' whether regular or irregular, shall mean such blocks as are bounded by main streets, or partially by a boundary line of the city." Section 34, subd. 12: "The term 'quarter block,' as used in this act as to irregular blocks, shall be deemed to include all lots or portions of lots having any frontage on either intersecting street half way from such intersection to the next main street, or, when no main street intervenes, all the way to a boundary line of the city."

Under these provisions of the statute, we think it clear that defendant's land was properly assessed for a part of the expenses of the work done on the crossing. It was the east half of an irregular block adjoining and cornering upon the crossing, and having a frontage on Oak street halfway to the next main street crossing. To say that, as a point has no length or breadth, there is no frontage of the property on the work, does not meet the case. The property cornered on the work, and had an admitted frontage of 150 feet on the intersecting street; and this was all the statute required.

We also think defendant's land was properly assessed for a portion of the expenses of the work done opposite the termination of Fremont street. It appears that that street passes diagonally through what would constitute block 94 if a portion of it had not been cut off by the lake. It is a main street, and terminates at El Dorado street. In such cases "the expenses of the work done on one-half of the width of the street opposite the termination shall be assessed upon the lots in each of the two quarter blocks adjoining and cornering on the same, according to the frontage of such lots on said main streets." Suppose Fremont street had terminated on El Dorado street, 10 or 20 feet further south, in that case there could be no question that defendant's quarter block would be subject to the termination assessment, according to its frontage on each of the main streets. Here, as the land only cornered on El Dorado street, there could be, and was, no assessment for frontage on that street, but the assessment for the frontage on Fremont street was clearly authorized. No objection is made that either of the assessments was for too large a sum, or to the validity of the assessments, if the said quarter block was in any way subject to assessment for the work done. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

FOX v. HALE & NORCROSS SILVER-MIN.
CO. (S. F. 683.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 9, 1898.)

REHEARING—REVERSAL.

A reversal of a judgment on appeal will be set aside, on the ex parte application of the respondent for leave to remit a portion thereof, and for an affirmance of the remainder, to enable the court to consider such application on a rehearing, which will be limited to that proposition.

McFarland and Van Fleet, JJ., dissent.

In bank. On application for rehearing. Granted.

For former opinion, see 53 Pac. 32.

PER CURIAM. The respondent having made an ex parte motion for a modification of the judgment of reversal heretofore given, it is ordered that the said judgment be vacated and set aside in order that the court may consider the application of the respondent for leave to remit a portion thereof, and for an affirmance of the remainder. The rehearing will be limited to this proposition, and the respondent will serve notice of his motion upon the appellants.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent from the whole of the foregoing order.

VAN FLEET, J. I dissent. If the judgment of this court is to be set aside for any purpose, I think the order should be general.

SOLANO COUNTY v. McCUDDEN. (Sac.

(Supreme Court of California. May 3, 1898.)

STATUTES—OPERATION—UNIFORMITY—COUNTIES.

St. 1893, p. 365, § 51, requiring all claims of members of the board of supervisors against a county for services to be presented to the district attorney for approval before allowance, does not conflict with section 25, subd. 12, authorizing the board to allow all accounts chargeable against the county, and hence does not violate Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring all laws of a general nature to be uniform in operation.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Solano county.

Action by Solano county against James H. McCudden. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Lamont, for appellant. Frank R. Devlin, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Defendant was a member of the board of supervisors of Solano county, and ex officio commissioner of a certain road district. At various times from December 5, 1893, to September 2, 1895, inclusive, he presented to said board, of which he was a member as stated, claims against the county for services performed by him as road commissioner. Such claims were allowed by the board, and were paid out of the county treasury. None of them was presented to the district attorney of the county, and none of them bore his indorsement of approval or rejection. This is an action by the county to recover the amount of the several payments made as aforesaid. The services for which defendant was paid were actually rendered, and there is no charge of bad faith against him. The county recovered judgment.

It is provided in section 51 of the county government act of 1893 (Statutes of that year, p. 365) that all claims against the county presented by members of the board of supervisors for any service rendered by them must, before allowance, be presented to the district attorney, "who must indorse thereon in writing his opinion as to the legality thereof; if he declare the claim illegal, he must state specifically wherein it is illegal, and the claim must then be rejected by said board." It is undisputed in the case that if such requirement was valid the judgment is right. See section 8 of the act. Subdivision 12 of section 25 of the same act confers power on the board of supervisors "to examine, settle and allow all accounts legally chargeable against the county," with a specified exception not material here; and it is contended for defendant that said section 51 of the act conflicts with the general provision of subdivision 12 of section 25 by giving to the district attorney supervisory power over claims presented by members of the board, and on that account is violative of the command of the constitution that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation. Article 1, § 11. We are unable to concur in the view of defendant's learned counsel. Section 51 does not purport to clothe the district attorney with authority essentially different from the power exercisable by him as to any claim whatever presented to the board for allowance. It is his duty to attend meetings of the board, and "oppose all claims and accounts against the county when he deems them illegal and unjust." Section 137 of said act. True, under the section last cited, the opposition of the district attorney does not control the discretion of the board to allow the claim opposed, while under section 51 the board is bound to reject the claim of one of its members if the district attorney in writing declares it illegal and states specifically wherein it is illegal, but this is not because of any enlarged power of the district attorney to supervise or usurp the proper functions of the board. It is the mandate of the law which thus discriminates between classes of claims, viz. those presented by the members of the auditing board, and those presented by other persons, and requires the rejection of the former on the unfavorable opinion of the district attorney. We think it quite apparent that claims of its own members are on a footing before the board so different from claims in general that special conditions for their allowance may justly be imposed by the legislature; and, as the requirement for submission to the district attorney applies alike to all claims within the category thus peculiarly circumstanced, the provision of the statute has uniformity of operation, within the meaning of the constitution. People v. Judge of Twelfth Dist., 17 Cal. 547; People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 442, 18 Pac. 413; People v. Railroad Co., 105 Cal. 576, 584, 38 Pac. 905. A judge of the superior court must pass upon and allow or reject claims against the estates of decedents in process of administration before him, but if he has a demand of his own against an estate he must obtain its allowance by some other judge. Code Civ. Proc. § 1495. It would probably not be contended that this provision affects the uniform operation of the statutes concerning claims against estates in probate. The principle of Dwyer v. Parker, 115 Cal. 544, 47 Pac. 372, cited by appellant, seems to us inapplicable here. There the statute drawn in question purported to confer on the district attorney discretionary power to determine in what cases justices of the peace and constables should be paid for certain official services; and this, whether such services had been performed in cases required by law or not, and whether for such services the law provided for their compensation or not. Here no such authority is given him. His duty as to the claim of a supervisor is merely to advise on its legality as presented, not to decide whether it shall be allowed as a matter of policy, even if found to be legal. Moreover, his conclusion is not final. The supervisor whose claim is rejected has still the right to sue the county thereon in the proper court. Section 44 of said act. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SOUTHERN. (Cr. 208.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1898.)
HOMICIDE—DYING DECLARATIONS—VIEW BY JURY.

1. Dying declarations are admissible on behalf of the accused to show that the killing was by another person.

2. It is discretionary to allow a view of a scene of a homicide by the jury, and error assigned thereon must be affirmatively shown to warrant a reversal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county.

Gray G. Southern was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appealed. Reversed.

C. S. McKelvey and Brousseau & Montgomery, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant has been convicted of murder of the second degree, and now prosecutes this appeal. The deceased was an Indian, and his death was caused by a shot from a pistol. The shooting occurred upon a public street of the city of Santa Ana, at about the hour of 10 p. m. The defendant denied that he fired the shot, or was present at the scene of the shooting.

During the progress of the trial, when the time arrived for the defendant to present his case, he proposed to prove a dying declaration of the deceased. This declaration was made by deceased in answer to a question put to him by a bystander a few moments after the shooting, and was to the effect that he (deceased) was shot by a Mexicano (Mexican). In view of the fact that the defendant is an American, the importance of this evidence to him is readily perceptible. There was evidence introduced tending to show that the defendant a few moments before the shooting addressed the deceased in the Mexican dialect, and also other evidence indicating that the locality where the shooting occurred was but dimly lighted. From these circumstances, it could well be argued to the jury that the deceased was mistaken as to the identity of the party who was his assailant; but those circumstances shed no light whatever upon the question as to the admissibility in evidence of this declaration of the deceased. In view of the fact that objections were sustained to nearly all questions addressed to the witnesses by counsel for defendant looking towards the establishment of a sufficient foundation upon which to rest the admission of evidence of this declaration of the deceased to the effect that he was shot by a Mexican, it would seem that the court took the broad ground that a dying declaration made by the deceased, which is favorable to a defendant on trial, cannot be introduced before the jury for his benefit. Evidence tending to show that the statement of the deceased was one made in extremis, and therefore admissible as a dying declaration, was rejected. For that reason we are not called upon here to examine the sufficiency of the foundation laid to form the basis for the admission of the dying declaration. Let us concede this declaration admissible, unless for the single reason that it was favorable to defendant. Is that reason good in law? There is a dearth of authority upon the question. In Rex v. Scaife, 1 Moody & R. 551, Justice Coleridge asked counsel for the prisoner if they could refer him to a case where the declaration of a dying man in favor of a prisoner had been received in evidence; and counsel replied that they had searched for such a case, but had not found it. In People v. McLaughlin, 44 Cal. 436, this court volunteered to cast some doubt upon the admissibility of such declarations, but expressly stated that it did not give an opinion upon the point. The court, in Moore v. State, 12 Ala. 767, said: "We conceive the rule to be that the dying declarations of the deceased may be given in evidence as well to acquit as to convict the accused, and they are not limited as evidence in favor of the state alone." The same principle is also declared in People v. Knapp, 26 Mich. 112, the court there holding that the prisoner had the same right with the people to show dying declarations, and stated that the rule would be very unjust unless so applied. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 159, and 3 Russ. Crimes, p. 270, seem to be in line with the two cases cited.

Upon principle there is no reason why a defendant is not entitled to invoke as evidence the dying declarations of the deceased. If such declarations are competent evidence to prove facts, what matters it that such proof tends to acquit the defendant rather than convict him? The state is as much interested in acquitting an innocent man charged with crime as it is in convicting a guilty man so charged. And surely the probability of the truth of a statement made by the dying deceased, tending to justify the assault upon him by the defendant, is entirely equal to the probability of the truth of a statement made by him bearing against the defendant. Indeed, there is no sound reason to be urged why the statement in one case should be received as evidence, and in the other case rejected. It may be said that this reasoning does not apply with full force in the present case, for here it is denied that defendant even assaulted the deceased; but the principle we have invoked applies nevertheless, and, when it is shown that the statement is a dying declaration in the sense of the law, a defendant is entitled to have it placed before the jury for its consideration.

A multitude of exceptions are disclosed by the record taken to the rulings of the court upon questions addressed to various witnesses. Many of these exceptions present close questions of law. It would seem that the prosecuting officer was zealous in objecting to all questions asked by counsel for defendant where a doubt existed in his mind as to their legal soundness. It is always a dangerous practice to thus attempt to hew to the very line of the law, for the slightest encroachment upon the other side may result in a mistrial. A much better practice is for both the prosecutor and the court to be liberal in these matters, and under all ordinary conditions to resolve doubtful questions in favor of the defendant. It is a safer and better course, for it will prevent mistrials, which often follow as a result of an effort to rigidly adhere to the letter of the law.

There are many other alleged errors occurring during the progress of the trial upon which appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment. Some of these assignments of error present important questions of law, but, as a new trial must be ordered upon other grounds, they will not be considered; for upon a second trial it is evident that they will not again arise.

The court allowed a view to be taken by the jury of the scene of the homicide. Error is now predicated upon this proceeding. It rests upon appellant to show error in this regard, and in the absence of an affirmative showing to that effect the proceeding will be sustained. It may be suggested that the trial court has an absolute discretion in granting or refusing an application for a view, and under any ordinary circumstances the safer course would be a denial of the application. There is always great danger that something may be said or done, or omitted to be done, in taking a view, which will operate in creating a mistrial of the cause. We find no sound objection to the law given by the court to the jury. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1898.)

ACTION ON NOTE—PARTIES DEFENDANT—FINDINGS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 383, providing that persons severally liable on the same note may all be included in the same action, an indorser on a negotiable note may be joined as a party defendant in a suit on the note.

2. A complaint on a note alleged that defendant, before delivery, indorsed it, waiving protest and notice. The court made a general finding that the allegations of the complaint were true, and found that defendant signed the note as a guarantor. Held, that the findings were not contradictory, and supported the judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county.

Action by Peter Loustalot against A. C. Calkins and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Parsons & Sherer and W. S. Day, for appellants. Thos. McNulta, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is prosecuted from the judgment, without a bill of exceptions. The action is brought upon a negotiable promissory note against A. C. Calkins, J. B. Libeu, and J. W. Calkins; and a joint and several judgment was rendered against them. They now appeal, and rely upon two grounds for a reversal of the judgment: (1) The demurrer of J. W. Calkins to the complaint should have been sustained; (2) the findings of the court are not sufficient to support the judgment.

The demurrer of J. W. Calkins declares there is a "misjoinder of parties defendant, in that J. W. Calkins, an alleged and supposed guarantor, is joined with the principal promisors." The complaint alleges that "the defendants A.

C. Calkins and J. B. Libeu made their certain promissory note, in words and figures following: * * * " It is further alleged that defendant J. W. Calkins then and there indorsed said note in the following words, to wit: "Waiving notice and protest. J. W. Calkins,"—"and that after the signing and indorsing of said note as aforesaid, the said defendants did then and there deliver said promissory note to the plaintiff." Section 3117 of the Civil Code provides: "One who indorses a negotiable instrument before it is delivered to the payee is liable to the payee thereon as an indorser." Tested by this section of the Code, the facts here alleged plainly place the defendant J. W. Calkins in the position of an indorser of the note. In many jurisdictions he would be termed an anomalous or irregular indorser. In speaking as to parties who may be joined as defendants, the Code of Civil Procedure (section 383) declares, "Persons severally liable upon the same obligation or instrument, including the parties to bills of exchange and promissory notes and sureties on the same or separate instruments, may all or any of them be included in the same action, at the option of the plaintiff." By a liberal construction of this provision, it may be fairly said that an indorser, such as this defendant, Calkins, is a party to the promissory note. It is said in Riggs v. Waldo, 2 Cal. 487, "Each one who writes his name upon it is a party to it, and, from its original character, each party to it is an original undertaker." The object of this section of the law is directed solely to the avoidance of a multiplicity of actions, and we see no substantial objection to the application of the rule to a case like the one at bar. Upon an examination of the authorities from other states having statutory provisions substantially similar to the one found in our Code, we find those authorities preponderating to the effect that a guarantor and the maker of a promissory note may not be joined as parties defendant; but that question is not directly before us, and we pass it by for that reason. In this state, from its earliest judicial history, the makers and indorsers of negotiable promissory notes have been joined as parties defendant, and no question as to the correctness of the practice has ever been suggested. For this reason alone we feel constrained to give the statute a construction which it has tacitly borne for so many years. See Riggs v. Waldo, supra; Pierce v. Kennedy, 5 Cal. 138; Ford v. Hendricks, 34 Cal. 673; Jones v. Goodwin, 39 Cal. 493; Fessenden v. Summers, 62 Cal. 484; Young v. Miller, 63 Cal. 302. The demurrer was properly overruled.

Are the findings of fact sufficient to support the judgment? The court made a general finding to the effect that all the allegations of the complaint were true. The allegations of the complaint which we have heretofore quoted, taken in connection with the additional fact that the note sued upon was negotiable in character, make J. W. Calkins an indorser, under section 3117 of the Civil Code. He is also an indorser who has waived notice and protest. Being a proper party defendant, it necessarily follows from these facts that the judgment against him is fully supported. The court, in addition to these findings, also found as a fact that Calkins signed the note as a "guarantor." And it is now insisted that such finding is contradictory to those findings showing him to be an indorser. If a guarantor may be joined in this state with the maker of the note, as a party defendant, then this finding gives a second ground for supporting the judgment, and that would be its only effect. But, conceding for present purposes alone that the law as to proper pleading would forbid such joinder of defendants, still the two findings of fact are not at all contradictory. A person may be an indorser upon a promissory note under the aforesaid section 3117, and also a guarantor upon the same note. Here the court found the defendant to be an indorser, and that fact itself was sufficient to support the judgment. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PRATHER. (Cr. 360.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1898.)

LARCENY—INFORMATION—DESIGNATION OF OWNERSHIP OF STOLEN PROPERTY—SUFFICIENCY—WITNESSES—EXAMINATION—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF ACCUSED—IMPEACHMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 956, providing that, where an offense for a private injury is described with sufficient certainty to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured is not material, an information charging a larceny of cattle as belonging to the estate of a deceased person is not fatally defective.

2. In a prosecution for grand larceny it is unnecessary to allege in the information that the property was taken to another county, where the offense was completed in the county wherein the information was filed.

3. It is proper to allow a witness to be withdrawn in order to lay a foundation for the admissibility of his testimony.

4. Declarations of a person accused of crime in his own favor are not admissible.

5. It is competent to ask a witness in a prosecution for larceny, who had been arrested for the same offense, but discharged without examination, for the purpose of impeaching his testimony, if he had not previously made statements different from his testimony given on the trial.

6. Where accused testifies in his own behalf, to discredit him testimony as to his general reputation in the community for truth, honesty, and integrity is admissible.

7. Instructions covered by others given are properly refused.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county.

Frank Prather was convicted of grand larceny, and appealed therefrom, and from order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

J. C. Ball and W. R. Jacobs, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of grand larceny, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The defendant was prosecuted by information filed by the district attorney in the county of Yolo, on the 14th of April, 1897. The following excerpt from the information will serve to illustrate the objections urged against its sufficiency: "The said Frank Prather did, on or about the 8th day of March, 1897, in the county of Yolo, state of California, then and there being, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously steal, take, and drive away certain cattle, being cows and steers, the personal property of the estate of James G. Fair, deceased, said property being then and there of the aggregate value of $780," etc. A motion was made to set aside the information, but, as the grounds upon which it is based are not made to appear of record or otherwise, the ruling of the court does not call for comment.

A demurrer was interposed to the information upon the statutory grounds prescribed by section 1004 of the Penal Code. The demurrer was disallowed by the court, and the ruling is assigned as error. The contention of appellant is that the information is too indefinite, in that the property alleged to have been feloniously taken could not have belonged to the estate of James G. Fair, deceased. It is true that, technically speaking, the personal property of James G. Fair, at his death, descended to his heirs or legatees, subject to the possession and a special property in his executors or administrators for the purposes of administration. At common law the ownership in such cases might be averred to be in the heir at law, if in possession, or in the ordinary before proof of the will, or in the executor or administrator after their appointment. But to aver ownership in a deceased person or in an estate was fatal. A like rule prevailed in this state prior to the adoption of our Penal Code. People v. Hall, 19 Cal. 425.

The question, then, is: Has the Code wrought such a change as to the allegation of ownership as to render this error now unimportant? Section 956 of the Penal Code provides that "when an offense involves the commission of, or an attempt to commit, a private injury, and is described with sufficient certainty in other respects to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured, or intended to be injured, is not material." In People v. Leong Quong, 60 Cal. 107, which was a case of grand larceny, the court said: "The name of the owner of property stolen is not a material part of the offense charged. It is only required to identify the transaction, so that the defendant, by proper plea, may protect himself against another prosecution for the same offense." In People v. Smith, 112 Cal. 333, 44 Pac. 663, which was a case of larceny, the complaint charged the defendant with stealing property belonging to the estate of W. C. Elledge, deceased. The information alleged ownership in Joseph Elledge and Mrs. M. J. Elledge, as executor and administratrix of the estate of W. C. Elledge, deceased; and it was held by this court that "there was no substantial variance in the offense, as charged in the complaint and in the information"; that "in each the offense was described with sufficient certainty to identify the act, and the alleged ownership was in effect the same, namely, in the estate of W. C. Elledge, deceased." In common parlance, we speak of property as belonging to the estates of deceased persons. We assess them as such for the purposes of taxation, and in various ways recognize property as belonging to such estates; and under section 957, Pen. Code, "the words used in an indictment or information are construed in their usual acceptance in common language, except such words and phrases as are defined by law." The act of the defendant constituting the offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, and it is not within the bounds of reasonable probability that he was or could have been misled or in any wise jeopardized by the designation of the property as belonging to the estate of Fair, rather than to his executors or administrators. "No indictment or information is insufficient * * * which does not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits." Pen. Code, § 960. See, also, section 1404.

It is also objected that the offense charged, if committed at all, was begun in the county of Yolo, and consummated in the county of Colusa, and that these facts should have been stated in the information. As nothing of this sort appeared on the face of the information, it was no cause for demurrer or motion to set aside the information. It may be remarked that the larceny is charged, and the evidence tended to show, that the offense was completed in the county of Yolo, and it was sufficient to so charge. It is true that the evidence showed that the stock was driven to the county of Colusa. Had the information been filed in the latter county, the question sought to be raised by appellant would have been involved, but it has no application here. The demurrer was properly overruled.

It is next urged that the court erred in refusing to strike out the testimony of Asa Morris, a witness for respondent. This witness had testified that about the 1st of March, the date not being remembered, but as he thought one week, more or less, before he heard of defendant's arrest, he met the latter in McGriff's or Griffin's Lane, a narrow and muddy lane in the vicinity of Knight's Landing, and asked him "what he was doing down there in the mud," to which defendant answered that "he was looking after some cattle for Doug. Mc-

Griff." The prosecution then withdrew the witness, with a view, as appears, of offering other testimony as to dates, etc. The court, in refusing to strike out the testimony, stated that it desired to give the district attorney an opportunity to connect the transaction. The testimony of J. J. Ely and others subsequently taken indicated that it must have been about the 8th or 9th of March that defendant met Asa Morris, and thereupon the court held the testimony of Morris admissible. In this there was no error. The testimony was of little importance, but was admissible for what it was worth. Nothing is more common than to permit a witness to be withdrawn in order to lay the proper foundation for the admissibility of his testimony, and it is as proper as common. The evidence showed without contradiction that defendant drove the cattle alleged to have been stolen from near the Fair ranch, in Yolo county, to a ranch owned or claimed by his (defendant's) father, some six or eight miles west of Arbuckle, in Colusa county.

A brother of defendant had been up to this ranch with provisions, and when on his return, and on the 11th day of March, met the defendant, just west of Arbuckle, driving about 30 head of cattle, and had a conversation with him. Defendant's counsel then sought to prove by their witness what the conversation was. The testimony was objected to, and the objection sustained. The evident object was to prove the declarations of the defendant in his own favor. We think the court was correct when, in ruling on the question, it spoke of it as "a self-serving statement, and not admissible."

Edward Prather, a brother of the defendant, was called as a witness on behalf of the latter, and testified in substance that in February and March he was on his father's ranch, west of Arbuckle, taking care of the latter's cattle; that some of their cattle had wandered away, and that he wrote a letter to his family apprising them of the fact, and that some of Fowler's cattle, whose ranch adjoined, had also disappeared, and asked them to look out for them at Knight's Landing, from whence the Prather cattle had been driven in January, 1897; that on the 11th of March, 1897, the defendant arrived at the ranch with some 25 or 30 head of cattle, 4 of which belonged to them (his father), and supposing the others were the Fowler cattle, or stock being ranched by the latter, they turned them over on the Fowler premises. On cross-examination the district attorney, for the purpose of impeaching the witness, was permitted, against the objection of defendant, to ask the witness various questions, among which were: "(1) Did you not tell me that you did not know the stock was on that place for several days after it was brought there? (2) Didn't you say: 'I am innocent. I didn't know that stock was upon that place for several days. I did not see Frank [the defendant] at all'? (3) Did you tell me that you told a falsehood to Linton about these cattle upon this place? (4) Did you explain to me that you told this falsehood because no man could expect me to convict my brother?" It appeared that the witness had been arrested, charged with the same larceny, and that this conversation was had in a room in the court house near the jail, and that the witness had been discharged without an examination. These questions and some others of like tenor were proper as tests of the credibility of the witness. The cases of People v. Greening, 102 Cal. 384, 36 Pac. 665, People v. Dilwood, 94 Cal. 89, 29 Pac. 420, and others cited by appellant on the question, are not in point. Code Civ. Proc. § 2052.

There are some other objections made to the rulings of the court upon the admission of evidence, but they are not, with a single exception, of sufficient importance to call for comment. The exception to which we allude is this: The defendant was a witness in his own behalf, and gave testimony vital to his defense. In rebuttal, the prosecution introduced as a witness one B. S. J. Hiatt, to whom the following question was put: "Q. Do you know the general reputation of Frank Prather [the defendant] for truth, honesty, and integrity, in the community where he lives?" Counsel for defendant objected to the question as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. It seemed to be conceded by defendant's counsel that the truth and veracity of defendant were proper subjects of inquiry, but that other traits were not properly in issue. The objection was overruled, and in conclusion the witness said: "Well, it is bad." Counsel for appellant urge with earnestness and zeal that testimony as to the honesty of defendant was inadmissible, and that for that error the judgment should be reversed. In support of their contention, they cite the case of State v. Marks, decided by the supreme court of Utah, February 4, 1898, and reported in 51 Pac. 1089. That case is not in all respects precisely in point with the case at bar, for the reason that there the question put to the witness was, "Do you know the reputation of the defendant in that community for truth, honesty, and integrity?" while here the question was, "Do you know the general reputation," etc. The court, however, after disposing of the first question in favor of the appellant, proceeded to say that the character of the defendant for honesty was not in issue, and that the question should have been confined to the general reputation of the defendant for truth and veracity, and hence that the court below erred, for which error a reversal was had. This case certainly sustains the contention of the appellant here. Section 2052 of our Code of Civil Procedure is in part as follows: "A witness may be impeached by the party against whom he was called, by contradictory evidence, or by evidence that his general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity is bad." This, being a statutory provision, may well be held to enlarge the scope of impeaching testimony.

"The rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions, except as otherwise provided in this Code." Pen. Code, § 1102. We shall not discuss the question at large, for the reason that this court has foreclosed it in this state. In People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 80, 45 Pac. 175, which is directly in point, it was held that just such a question as that propounded here, and put under like circumstances, was proper; citing People v. Beck, 58 Cal. 212, and People v. Bentley, 77 Cal. 7, 18 Pac. 799.

Appellant contends that the court, by the second instruction given on behalf of the prosecution, instructed the jury to find the defendant guilty of grand larceny. To reach this result, counsel for appellant eliminates from the second instruction all that portion qualifying the language to which he objects. In the first instruction the court had fully explained to the jury the distinction between grand and petit larceny, and had explained to them that the felonious stealing, etc., of "a cow, steer, bull, calf," etc., is grand larceny. Pen. Code, § 487. The second instruction, in its entirety, is as follows: "(2) It will be noticed from this definition of grand larceny that every felonious stealing, taking, and driving away of cows, steers, bulls, and calves is grand larceny, regardless of the value of the property taken; and in this case, as there is no evidence of anything other than calves, cows, steers, and bulls having been taken, you would not be at liberty to find the defendant guilty of petit larceny, but your verdict must be guilty of grand larceny, if you should believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, and to a moral certainty, that the defendant, as charged in the information, did steal, feloniously, a cow, steer, bull, or calf; or if you should, upon this proposition, have a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, your verdict should be not guilty." The language of the instruction, taken as a whole, refutes the position of appellant. The thirtieth instruction asked by defendant was refused, "because given elsewhere by the court." It was in all essential particulars covered by the instructions given at the request of defendant in numbers 31, 32, 33, and 34. These instructions are too lengthy to be copied. They are to be found at pages 134 and 135 of the transcript.

There are some minor points made by appellant, but the foregoing are all that it is deemed necessary to notice. The instructions were very lengthy, and those given placed the law of the case fairly and plainly before the jury. Upon a patient review of the record, we are of opinion the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed; and we so recommend.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LAUER v. ESTES. (Sac. 413.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1898.)

ELECTIONS—ILLEGAL BALLOTS—DECLARATION OF VOTER—EVIDENCE—PARTIES.

1. Under Pol. Code, § 1215, providing that no voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by which it may afterwards be identified as the one voted by him, a mark upon a ballot, having no lawful right there, and that might serve as an identifying mark, vitiates the ballot.

2. In an election contest, the declaration of a voter as to how he voted is inadmissible.

3. In an election contest a voter is not a party unless such of record.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action by E. Lauer against W. F. Estes. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

G. F. Harris, for appellant. Goodwin & Stewart, H. L. Sprague, and D. W. Jenks, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an election contest, and involves the office of supervisor for the Fourth supervisor district of Modoc county. The board of supervisors, after canvassing the returns, declared Estes elected, and he received the certificate of election. Afterwards Lauer commenced this present contest, and the superior court rendered a judgment annulling the said certificate of election, and declaring Lauer to have been duly elected to said office. From this judgment Estes appeals.

The court found that the appellant, Estes, received 131 legal votes for said office of supervisor. By finding 3 the court found that the respondent, Lauer, received 132 legal votes for said office; and in finding 7 it is found that the said respondent, Lauer, received 133 legal votes for the office. Appellant contends that these two findings as to the number of votes received by the respondent are fatal to the validity of the judgment, because they are inconsistent and uncertain. These findings might be embarrassing under certain circumstances, but we do not think that matter material in the case at bar, because, in our opinion, there were errors committed by the court prejudicial to the appellant to the extent of at least three votes. In this case—and the same thing occurs in most election contests—each counsel contends that, with respect to certain points, the evident intention of the voter expressed by the ballot should prevail as against what is called the “technicalities” of the election law, while with respect to other points the same counsel contends that other votes should be rejected because not in compliance with the mandatory provisions of the Code, no matter how clearly the ballots may express the intention of the voters. For instance, respondent's counsel contends that the court was right in excluding a certain vote for appellant, because the stamp on the ballot was outside of the perforated line, which ruling appellant's counsel considers highly technical, erroneous, and unjust, because the intent to vote for appellant was quite clear. But appellant contends that certain other votes counted for respondent should have been excluded, notwithstanding the apparent intentions of the voters, upon grounds which respondent's counsel considers highly technical. The truth is that under our present election laws courts cannot confine themselves to a mere inquiry as to what the voter intended to express by his ballot. The law has many other purposes, and to accomplish them it provides in great detail what the ballots shall be,—what the voter may do and what he may not do; and it declares that “any ballot which is not made as provided in this act shall be void, and shall not be counted.” Pol. Code, § 1211. For instance, the law evidently contemplates that the intent which a ballot expresses may be the result of coercion or undue influence, and endeavors to prevent one having power over another from knowing how the latter voted; and so it is provided that “no voter shall place any mark upon his ballot by which it may be afterwards identified as the one voted by him.” Section 1215. And this provision is mandatory. Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 108, 41 Pac. 454, and cases there cited. Under the sections of the Code last above quoted the court erroneously counted for the respondent the “challenged ballot No. 15,” attached to the transcript between pages 42 and 43. In that ballot the voter regularly stamped the number of presidential electors for whom he was entitled to vote, and at a point a couple of inches further down on the ballot, and opposite certain other candidates for presidential electors, there is a mark apparently made with ink, which is clearly a distinguishing or identifying mark within the meaning of the Code. It is not slight, nor is it connected with any other mark properly made by the stamp, nor is there any evidence that it was a mark made by the folding of the ballot. It stands by itself, is in a place where it has no authority to be, is about half an inch in diameter, is very distinct and pronounced, and there is no apparent reason why it was not put there as a distinguishing mark. The vote on this ballot was for the respondent, Lauer, and should not have been counted for him. For similar reasons the challenged vote No. 25, which appears on the ballot attached between pages 64 and 65 of the transcript, should not have been counted for the respondent. On that ballot there is a stamp regularly made after the name of Lauer for supervisor; but lower down on the ballot, and opposite the blank line, there is also another distinct cross, and this cross was clearly a distinguishing and identifying mark. Under the views expressed in Tebbe v. Smith, supra, there is no ground for holding that the marks upon said two ballots above referred to are not distinguishing or identifying marks. If we disregard them, we are “left without a fixed rule by which the officers of election are to be guided in counting the ballots." The marks in question were not legal marks placed upon the ballot in a legal place, and were, therefore, unauthorized. In the Tebbe Case the letter "J" was written in the blank space left for the insertion of a name for justice of the peace; and the court say: "Doubtless it may have been the intention of the voter to write a name, and he may have abandoned his intent after setting down the initial letter; but doubtless also the mark would serve as a distinguishing mark, and, being one having no lawful right upon the ballot, it renders it void." Of course, it might clearly appear on the face of a ballot that a mark was the result of accident; but there is no such showing in the case at bar. Either of the marks may have been intended as a distinguishing mark, and, being in their nature distinguishing marks, they vitiate the ballots. No doubt the provisions of the law in this respect sometimes work injustice, but, if so, the remedy is with the legislature.

One Samuel Cole voted at the election in question. The respondent introduced evidence tending to show that he was not a qualified voter, because he had not a legal residence at the place where he voted. The evidence was somewhat conflicting on this point, but the court found that he was not a qualified voter, and, under our view of the case, it is not necessary to inquire whether or not that finding was supported by the evidence. But, for the purpose of showing that Cole voted for the appellant, the respondent was allowed, over the objections of the appellant, to introduce a certain written declaration of Cole that he had voted for the appellant. This declaration was in the form of an affidavit made before a notary public. It was made after the election, and within two days of the filing of the complaint in this action. Of course, the fact that the declaration is in the form of an affidavit is of no significance. There is no provision for such an affidavit, and, if false, it would not subject the party making it to the penalties of perjury. It was a mere parol declaration of a voter as to how he voted, made some time after the election, and in no sense part of the res gestæ,—even if such a declaration might be admitted at all as part of the res gestæ. This declaration was the only evidence offered to prove how the said Cole voted, and "the court thereupon held that Samuel Cole was not entitled to vote at Alturas precinct at said election, and deducted his vote from the votes cast for defendant and contestee, W. E. Estes." The evidence was improperly admitted, and the court erred in deducting Cole's vote from the votes cast for appellant. Declarations of voters as to their disqualifications were admitted by the English parliament in contests over seats in that body. Their votes were given viva voce. The election records showed how an elector voted. The right to vote was a special franchise exercised by a limited class, and was dependent generally upon a freehold interest in land; and the admission of a declaration of a voter that he was disqualified seems to have been founded mainly upon the fact that such declaration was strongly against his interest as the holder of a special franchise, and really endangered his freehold interest, which was not always a matter of record. This rule has been followed to some extent by congress and other American legislative bodies, but even there it has been often seriously questioned. In a few judicial decisions this rule has been followed, although the weight of judicial authority is the other way. In People v. Pease, 27 N. Y. 45, there is a dictum that a declaration of a voter as to his qualifications is admissible, but the question was not there involved; and in State v. Olin, 23 Wis. 309, it is held that a declaration of a voter as to how he voted is admissible, but the rule is stated there upon the authority of People v. Pease, supra, which does not sustain the rule to that extent, even if the dictum in People v. Pease be taken as an authority. But in Kansas (Gilleland v. Schuyler), 9 Kan. 569, in Illinois (City of Beardstown v. City of Virginia), 76 Ill. 34, and in Colorado (People v. Commissioners of Grand Co.), 7 Colo. 190, 2 Pac. 912 the rule is repudiated. There is also an interesting discussion of the question by a congressional committee in the case of Cessna v. Meyers (43d Congress, Smith, 60), in which the incorrectness and danger of the rule is very clearly and strongly stated. The subject is quite thoroughly reviewed in Paine on Elections, commencing at paragraph 773, and most of the authorities bearing upon the question are there cited, and under paragraph 776 will be found a large part of the opinion of the congressional committee in the case above referred to of Cessna v. Meyers. The author says: "But it is held, both in the United States and in England, that declarations of voters, made after the election, are not admissible." In this state the point was noticed in Norwood v. Kenfield, 30 Cal. 394, but was not determined in the opinion of the court rendered by Sanderson, J. However, in a concurring opinion, Sawyer, J., very pointedly says that such evidence is inadmissible. The question has not arisen in any other case in this state to which our attention has been called. In our judgment, the declaration of a voter as to how he voted is clearly incompetent, and hearsay of the most dangerous kind. If admissible, it would afford a most easy method of manufacturing sufficient evidence in a closely contested election case to change the result. Under such a rule an unqualified voter could give one illegal vote to one candidate, and then, by a simple declaration, which would not subject him to any loss or danger, could have deducted a legal vote from another candidate. In a close contest between A. and B. a friend of A., who had illegally voted for him, would be under a strong temptation to declare that he had voted for B.; and it is difficult to imagine another case where the admission of hearsay evidence might be so mischievous. It has been said that in an election contest a voter should be considered as a party, and that, therefore, his declarations should be admissible. If that be so, then his declarations as to every question involved in the case would be admissible. But in fact he is not a party. He, of course, is not a party of record, and he is not a party in any other sense. This view is very thoroughly established in the report in the case of Cessna v. Meyers, above cited. It does not appear that any illegal votes were counted for appellant. The above views are therefore determinative of this case in favor of the appellant, and make it unnecessary to discuss other questions raised in the case. It may be proper to say, however, that in our opinion the complaint in the case is sufficient, and that no error was committed by the court in the matter of granting a continuance of the trial. There is no question here as to defeating the real will of the majority of the voters. It does not appear that a majority was in favor of the respondent. It appears that the appellant actually received more votes than the respondent, and the determination of the board of canvassers makes for him a prima facie case. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ANDERSON v. JOHNSTON. (Sac. 330.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1898.)
APPEAL—FINDINGS—REVIEW.

Findings of the trial court, when supported by evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by A. Anderson against W. E. Johnston. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Martin Devine and A. A. De Ligne, for appellant. C. W. Baker, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Plaintiff demands judgment for $85 and costs and an attorney's fee of $50. The cause was tried by the court, and a decree entered in favor of plaintiff for $67.50 and for an attorney's fee of $25 and costs. Defendant appeals from the decree and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It appears that on the 1st day of September, 1895, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement by the terms of which the plaintiff agreed with the defendant to construct for the latter a house in Sacramento, 12x18 feet, two stories in height, with one room on the back 10x18 feet, 8 feet high, with shed roof. The building, among other equipments, was to have eight windows, etc. An old building on the premises was to be taken down, and the lumber used in the construction of the new, with some exceptions not necessary to any question here. Plaintiff was to be paid $175,—$100 when the work was done, and $75 thirty days thereafter. The building was completed and occupied by defendant October 10, 1895, but not in accord with the contract, in that (1) there were but six windows instead of eight; (2) the rear room was 7½ feet high instead of 8 feet, as called for by the contract.

Defendant in his answer sets out these variations from the contract, and avers that he completed the structure as provided for therein at a cost of $20, which he avers should be deducted from the $75 due. He further avers that he tendered plaintiff $65 ($10 being, as we suppose, on account of extra work, averred in the complaint to have been performed and agreed upon). Defendant deposited $55 in court, which he claims was all that was due.

The court found, in substance, that all the allegations of the complaint were true, except, as before stated, that the ceiling of the back room was only 7½ feet high instead of 8 feet, as it should have been, and that defendant was entitled to a credit of $12.50, the sum necessary to make it 8 feet, and that defendant was entitled to a credit of $5, the amount agreed upon for leaving out two windows. It also found that $25 was a reasonable fee for plaintiff on foreclosure.

The principal contention of appellant is that the building was never completed as required by the terms of the contract, and hence that respondent was not entitled to a mechanic's lien thereon. It is true that, as said by Phillips on Mechanics' Liens (page 189, § 134), "a substantial performance, according to the terms and conditions agreed upon, is a condition precedent to the builder's right to maintain an action under the mechanic's lien law." The finding of the court is that the building was completed according to the contract except as to the back room, which was but 7½ feet high, and that it was accepted by the appellant. The court also finds that subsequently to the making of the contract some of the work thereon was ordered changed by the defendant. There was evidence tending to show that two windows were omitted from the building by order of the defendant, and that the posts of the old building furnished by defendant, and from which the new one was constructed, were not of sufficient length to make the back room 8 feet high, and that upon being so informed by plaintiff defendant told him to use them and do the best he could with them. The effect of this was to change the terms of the contract. "A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing or by an executed oral agreement." Civ. Code, § 1698. There is no express finding as to the exact alteration made in the written agreement, but only that alterations were made therein; but, as no specifications of error are predicated thereon, we think the findings must be deemed sufficient. The findings have evidence in their support, and we advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FONG HONG. (Cr. 357.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1898.)

ARSON—WHAT CONSTITUTES—OWNERSHIP—INTENT.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 452 (providing that, to constitute arson, it is unnecessary that a person other than the accused should have owned the building, but, if any part thereof was actually occupied by another, it is sufficient), where it is alleged and proved that the building burned was owned by one, and occupied by others, a conviction will be sustained, though there was no evidence that accused was not licensed by the owner to burn it.

2. To constitute arson where the acts are sufficient in all other respects, it is immaterial whether the motive be gain, revenge, or any other kind of malicious mischief.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Fong Hong was convicted of arson, and appeals from the judgment, an order denying his motion in arrest, and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Joseph Naphtaly and William Hoff Cook, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant was convicted of arson in the first degree, and appeals from the judgment, from an order denying his motion in arrest of judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. A reversal is contended for on two grounds:

1. Appellant's counsel contends that as "it is not arson to burn one's own property [citing People v. De Winton, 113 Cal. 403, 45 Pac. 708], therefore it was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove that defendant did not have a license from the owner to burn, if he did so." It is not necessary to determine whether this novel proposition would under any circumstances be entitled to grave consideration; for it certainly has no value in the case at bar. In the De Winton Case it was correctly held that an indictment was bad in which it was merely charged in general terms that the defendant burned a building which was his own property; no other facts as to title, or as to possession, occupancy, etc., being stated. But it is provided in section 452 of the Penal Code as follows: "To constitute arson it is not necessary that a person other than the accused should have had ownership in the building set on fire. It is sufficient that at the time of the burning another person was rightfully in possession of or was actually occupying such building, or any part thereof." Now, in the case at bar it was averred and proven that the building which was burned was "the property of the Luning Company, a corporation," etc., and that it was "then and there occupied by Mrs. Angela Fawn, John Shaughnessy, and Urbin Hosson." The owner, therefore, would have had no right to burn the building, and certainly no right to give anybody a "license" to do so.

2. Counsel contends that the court erred in refusing some instructions which he asked on the subject of the intent of the appellant in causing the fire. In the bill of exceptions there is a narrative statement that there was testimony tending to establish certain facts, and, among others, that appellant had in the building some property which was insured; and the contention is that the court should have instructed the jury that, if appellant caused the fire for the purpose of defrauding the insurance company, then he was not guilty of arson. The point is thus stated in the brief: "The defendant explicitly requested the court to instruct the jury that, if the intent was to defraud the insurance company, then the defendant could not be convicted under the information, but the court refused to do so." The proposition contended for seems to be that a man may feloniously burn a building not his own, and yet not be guilty of arson if he does it with intent to defraud an insurance company; and that in such case he must be prosecuted under the provisions of section 548 of the Penal Code. But this is not the law. If certain acts constitute arson in all other respects, the crime committed is arson, whether the motive be gain, or revenge, or any other kind of malicious mischief. The main purpose of section 548 is to make criminal certain wrongful and malicious acts which do not constitute arson. Arson can only be committed on a "building." Section 548 does not mention building, and the crimes there created may be committed upon any kind of "property." Arson cannot be committed on a building by one who exclusively owns and occupies it, notwithstanding the fact that it is insured; but burning his own insured building would be a crime, under section 548. That section makes it a crime to either burn or "in any other manner" injure "any property" insured against damage by fire, or by "any other casualty." Its purpose is to prevent the "fraudulent destruction of property insured." It does not deal with "arson," and does not undertake to change the character of that crime. Arson is the same crime as it was before section 548 was enacted. Whether a party might commit guilty acts under such peculiar circumstances as would subject him to prosecution for either arson or the crime created by said last-named section of the Code is a question not now calling for consideration.

The instructions of the court upon the subject of intent were sufficiently full. The jury were charged, among other things, as follows: "Arson is the willful and malicious burning of a building with intent to destroy it. There must be, to constitute the crime of arson, a willful and malicious burning of the building; and, as contained in the definition of the crime, there must exist intent to destroy it."

No special point is made as to the appeal from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment. The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

VAN LOBEN SELS v. BUNNELL et al.

DEEDS—NUDUM PACTUM—PURCHASE PRICE—MORTGAGES—PRIORITY.

1. An agreement, by the grantee in a deed conveying overflowed land, to pay, as part consideration, a certain sum yearly per acre, provided the grantor kept it pumped below a certain height, but with no corresponding duty on the grantor's part to pump said land, is not nudum pactum, where the deed expressly declared that the grantee's agreement to pay as set forth was a part of the consideration moving the grantor to its execution.

2. A mortgage to cover a loan which was used to pay for the property secured is not a purchase-price mortgage, within Civ. Code, § 2898, giving such mortgages priority over other liens subject to the recording laws, unless the money was loaned for the express purpose of paying for such property.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by P. J. Van Loben Sels against C. Bunnell, the Germania Building & Loan Association, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant association appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. T. & W. H. Devlin and W. A. Gett, Jr., for appellant. Johnson & Johnson, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a lien upon the real property of defendant C. Bunnell. The Germania Building & Loan Association was made a defendant. It answered, setting up a mortgage upon the property, executed to it by Bunnell, and asked that this mortgage be declared a lien prior and superior to that of plaintiff. The court found defendant Bunnell to be indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $757.50, gave plaintiff judgment for that amount, together with attorney's fees and costs, decreed to him a lien upon the property superior to that of the loan association, and ordered a sale and a distribution of the proceeds accordingly. From this judgment, and from the order denying it a new trial, defendant the Germania Building & Loan Association alone appeals.

By a deed executed on December 5, 1891, plaintiff, the then owner, conveyed to defendant Bunnell the land which is subjected to foreclosure in this suit. The land was overflowed land within the boundaries of a reclamation district. The deed was formally executed and acknowledged by both parties to it, and contained the following clauses, covenants, and conditions: "In consideration of the premises, and of the sum of one hundred dollars to him in hand paid by the party of the second part, and of the conditions, covenants, and stipulations by and on behalf of the party of the second part hereinafter expressed and contained, the party of the first part has granted and conveyed," etc. "To have and to hold the same unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, but upon and subject to the conditions, covenants, and stipulations by and on behalf of the party of the second part hereinafter expressed and contained. And in consideration of the premises the party of the second part hereby covenants, stipulates, and agrees to and with the party of the first part, his heirs and assigns: That, so long as the party of the first part shall continue to hold the record title to said pumping machinery, the party of the second part will pay to the party of the first part the sum of three dollars, United States gold coin of the present standard, per annum, reckoned from November 1st to October 31st next ensuing, for each several acre, and at the same rate for each fraction of an acre, of the land hereby conveyed; such payment to be made on or before the first day of November in each year, and, in case of nonpayment on or before that day, then to bear interest at the rate of one per cent. per month from such first of November until paid; provided, however, that if, during any season, reckoned from November 1st to May 30th next ensuing, the water at the pump of said pumping machinery shall for a period of fourteen consecutive days stand at a height equal to, or higher than, five feet of lake gauge, as at present established, then any such payment made for that year by the party of the second part shall be refunded to him." "That all payments herein agreed to be made by party of the second part to the party of the first part shall be, and are hereby made, a lien on the land hereby conveyed, and, in case of nonpayment, may be recovered in any action brought by party of the first part to recover the same and foreclose such lien; and, in case any such suit be brought, reasonable counsel fees, to be fixed by the court, shall be allowed the plaintiff." "That each and all of the covenants, stipulations, and agreements herein contained shall run with and bind the land herein conveyed, and each several acre and fraction of an acre thereof."

The propositions advanced by appellant are three:

First, that the agreement is a mere nudum pactum, upon which no recovery may be had. Herein it is argued that the plaintiff binds himself to nothing, and that there is no consideration whatever for the defendant Bunnell's promise to pay. The instrument, being in writing, not only imports a consideration for its covenants (Civ. Code, § 1614), but Bunnell's agreement to pay under the terms and conditions set forth is expressly declared to be a part of the consideration moving the grantor to the execution of the deed. The burden was upon appellant to show want of consideration. Id. § 1615. And this he has failed to do. It is not of importance, therefore, even if it be true, that there was no obligation upon plaintiff to pump the water from Bunnell's land. There was certainly an inducement for him to pump, if pumping was necessary to reduce the water level; otherwise he lost his right to demand and to collect the stipulated three dollars per acre.

Second, it is contended that appellant's mortgage was a purchase-money mortgage, and as such had priority over plaintiff's lien. This proposition is untenable, for the following reasons: A mortgage, given for the purchase of real property at the time it is conveyed, has priority over all other liens created against the purchaser, subject to the operation of the recording laws. Such is the declaration of section 2898 of the Civil Code. This is but the recognition of an equitable principle which was early declared. It came into existence at a time when title, and not a mere lien, passed to the mortgagee by virtue of the mortgage. It was recognized that the vendor, who has parted with his land, and has taken, to secure part payment of the purchase money, a mortgage upon that same land, should not suffer an impairment of his security, and perhaps an absolute loss of a large part of the purchase price, by other rights, such as dower, or the right of a judgment creditor attaching to the property in the brief time during which title was held by the vendee. To save this result, equity formulated the fiction that when the deed and mortgage were part of the same transaction, and well-nigh simultaneous in time, the seisin of the vendee was too short to allow the attachment to the property of any such liens or claim. It is said, in somewhat technical justification of the fiction, that, the execution of the deed and the mortgage being simultaneous acts, the title to the land does not for a single moment rest in the purchaser, but merely passes through him, and vests in the mortgagee, without stopping at all, and that, during such instantaneous passage, liens cannot attach to the title. Curtis v. Root, 20 Ill. 53; 4 Kent, Comm. 39; Maybury v. Brien, 15 Pet. 21. This equitable principle, where recognized, was frequently extended beyond the vendor, in whose interest it was originally formulated, and made applicable to a third person who had furnished the whole or part of the money used in the purchase of the land. In illustration of this may be cited from this state: Dillon v. Byrne, 5 Cal. 455; Lassen v. Vance, 8 Cal. 271; Carr v. Caldwell, 10 Cal. 380. To like effect are the cases of Clark v. Munroe, 14 Mass. 351; Curtis v. Root, 20 Ill. 53; Pearl v. Hervey, 70 Mo. 160; Moring v. Dickerson, 85 N. C. 466; Jones v. Tainter, 15 Minn. 512 (Gil. 423); Carey v. Boyle, 53 Wis. 574, 11 N. W. 47; Laidley v. Alken, 80 Iowa, 112, 45 N. W. 384. But the claims of third persons to have their mortgages upheld as purchase-money mortgages have been recognized only when it has been made to appear that the money was loaned to the purchaser for the express purpose, and was used for the express purpose, of paying for the property. Here it is not pleaded nor found that appellant's mortgage was a purchase-money mortgage; nor did appellant offer any evidence that it had advanced the money secured by the mortgage for the sole and express purpose of paying for the property. The only evidence in the case is a declaration by Bunnell that he so used the money, but this is not sufficient. It is not made to appear that he was not at liberty to have used it for any other purpose. Therefore, so far as the record discloses, the loan was like any other advancement of money to the general use of the borrower, secured by a mortgage upon his realty. Again, the deed and agreement between the vendor and the vendee was itself of record before the execution of appellant's mortgage. If it were to be conceded that appellant's mortgage was a purchase-money mortgage, it could only take priority "subject to the operation of the recording laws." By the operation of those laws there was a subsisting, prior, and valid lien upon the property, with notice of which the appellant was charged at the time he accepted the mortgage.

The third proposition of appellant is that, notwithstanding the terms of the agreement, the covenant sued upon does not run with the land. A determination of this question can be of no consequence to this appellant. Its decision might well be of importance to Bunnell's grantee or assign, but, so far as concerns the loan association, under the case presented, an adjudication in its favor upon the proposition would not advantage it. If the contract amounts to no more than a personal promise of Bunnell, still it is his promise to do a certain thing, and as security for his performance he has given to plaintiff a lien upon his land, which is here foreclosed. The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

MODOC COUNTY v. MADDEN, County
Treasurer, et al. (Sac. 314.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1898.)

APPEAL—AFFIRMANCE.

A county brought suit to restrain its treasurer from paying a certain warrant, and, upon the hearing, the court dissolved the preliminary injunction, and denied a perpetual injunction; and two days later the county gave notice of appeal, but did not perfect its appeal for over three years. Held, that as there was no appearance by respondent, and as the warrant was doubtless paid, the case would not be considered on its merits, and the judgment would be affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county.

Action by the county of Modoc against John Madden, county treasurer, and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for appellant. D. W. Jenks and Goodwin & Stewart, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. On the 15th day of July, 1893, the board of supervisors of the county of Modoc allowed and approved two claims presented by the respondent John Stanley for supplies furnished by him to the county hospital, aggregating about $60. The county auditor drew his warrant on the county treasurer in favor of Stanley for this amount. This action was instituted by the district attorney, on behalf of the county, to restrain the treasurer from paying the warrant. It was averred that there were moneys in the treasury available for the purpose, and amply sufficient to pay the warrant, but that it was an illegal and void demand against the county. The argument in this regard is that section 4047 of the Political Code provides that the supervisors must contract for all supplies for county institutions, and that the supplies in payment of which this warrant was drawn had not been furnished under contract. The defendants answered, denying that the claims were unauthorized in law. Upon August 1, 1893, the cause was submitted for decision, without the introduction of evidence upon either side. On the 21st day of August the court made and entered its judgment dissolving the preliminary injunction, denying a perpetual injunction, and dismissing the action, with costs to defendants. Two days later—upon August 23, 1893—the plaintiff served and filed its notice of appeal. There the matter was allowed to rest until November 7, 1896, when the record was certified to by the clerk of the court; and following this, upon December 16, 1896, the transcript was filed. The appellant has filed a brief attacking the validity of the claim upon the ground indicated. Respondent makes no reply, doubtless for the reason that he has long since received the money upon his claims, and has no further interest in the litigation.

Under this state of facts, we must decline either to disturb the judgment, or to consider it upon its merits. The rules of this court are designed, not alone to protect the rights of litigants, but to aid the prompt and proper administration of justice. The remissness of appellant in prosecuting its appeal has resulted in an inexcusable delay of more than three years in filing the transcript. During this time there has been no restraint upon the treasurer, and, beyond peradventure, the warrant has long since been paid, and the respondents may reasonably have concluded that the whole matter had been abandoned. In consequence, this court is deprived of the material assistance, to which it is entitled in the consideration of the question, of a brief from the prevailing party. By reason of the laches of the appellant, it may fairly be concluded that the proposition here involved is, so far as these litigants are concerned, nothing more than a moot question; and this court should not be called upon to decide so important a proposition, under the indicated circumstances. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

RUHL v. MOTT. (Sac. 327.)<sup>1</sup>

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1898.)

FRAUD — AFFIRMANCE OF CONTRACT — NOTICE — CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONSHIP.

1. Defendant, by deceit, induced plaintiff to purchase land, paying part cash, and giving two notes for the balance, one secured by a mortgage on the land. After discovery of the fraud, plaintiff paid part of the balance by deeding a lot to defendant, and gave a new note and mortgage for the remainder. Defaulting on this, he gave defendant a new note and mortgage for the amount of the old one and interest. Held, that his acts subsequent to discovering the fraud amounted to an affirmance of the contract.

2. One who has notice of having been defrauded is bound to ascertain the full extent of the fraud.

3. Plaintiff was a printer, and half of his business came from a firm of which defendant was manager, and, as a result, he reposed great confidence in defendant, and relied on him for advice. Held, that this did not establish the confidential relationship defined in Civ. Code, § 2219, which provides that one who assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is deemed a trustee as to dealings between the parties.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by Bernard Ruhl against George M. Mott. Verdict for plaintiff, and, from a judgment and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Albert M. Johnson, for appellant. Robt. T. & W. H. Devlin, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. These appeals are by defendant from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The plaintiff by his action sought to enforce a rescission of an executed contract for the purchase and sale of agricultural lands in which he was the vendee. His right to relief is based upon (1) alleged false representations as to character and quality of the land, the depth of soil, and the income derived from it; (2) on a breach and abuse of confidential relations existing between the parties; (3) upon promises made by defendant to plaintiff for the purpose of inducing him to enter into the contract, which promises at the time when they were made were not intended by defendant to be performed; (4) weakness of mind of plaintiff, induced by sickness and intoxication, of which defendant took advantage; (5) artifice and deceit by which defendant prevented plaintiff from making an independent examination of the property. Defendant demurred to the sufficiency of the complaint, which demurrer was overruled. He then pleaded in answer, denying all the allegations of fraud, denying the confidential relations and the breach thereof, and pleading affirmatively that, after knowledge upon the part of plaintiff of the condition, kind, and character of the land, plaintiff voluntarily affirmed the contract, and thereby waived any right which he might have had to rescind it. Upon the trial an advisory jury was impaneled by the court, and to it certain special issues were submitted for determination. These issues related to the alleged fraudulent misrepresentations, artifices, and devices practiced by defendant. The verdicts of the jury upon all of these issues were for plaintiff. The judge, with great reluctance, stating that he had himself reached an opposite conclusion from the evidence, adopted these verdicts, and added to them other findings adverse to defendant's contentions, all of which findings are here assailed, and so rendered judgment for plaintiff.

The charges in the complaint are substantially the following: Plaintiff was a book-binder by occupation. A considerable portion of his business he obtained by contract from the printing and stationery house of H. S. Crocker & Co. Defendant was a member of this company, and its business manager in Sacramento. Plaintiff went to defendant, expressing his desire to purchase a piece of land suitable for horticultural purposes. Defendant told him that he had a ranch which was better and cheaper than the land which plaintiff told defendant he contemplated purchasing. Defendant took plaintiff to visit his land, which was situated about 12 miles from Sacramento, showed him a portion of it, consisting of about 52 acres of rich bottom land,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  acres of which were planted in vines. The farm contained 264 acres, and defendant represented to plaintiff that the land was all of the same quality throughout; that the soil was from 15 to 20 feet deep; that defendant farmed the land through a tenant, and received \$750 a year for his share, while at the same time the tenant, who was not a good farmer, netted about \$1,000 a year additional. Defendant also told plaintiff that the land had cost him \$50 an acre, and further stated that, if the plaintiff would buy the land from him, he would give him all the work of H. S. Crocker & Co., as he had done in the past. He also prevented plaintiff, by artifice and deceit, from talking to anybody, or consulting with or inquiring of the neighbors, hurrying him out to the land, and away from it, and finally prevailed upon him to make a small payment of \$500. Such are the charges of the complaint, which by the findings are declared proven. These findings, as has been intimated, are bitterly assailed by appellant, as being unsupported by the evidence. Under the views hereafter to be expressed, it is unnecessary to enter into the consideration of these questions. The purchase price of the land was \$12,500. The alleged falsity of the declarations consisted in this: that the remaining portion of the 264 acres was not at all of the character of the 52 acres of rich bottom land exhibited to plaintiff. On the contrary, it was "hardpan land,"—land with sterile soil, of but from 6 to 18 inches in depth, entirely unsuited for horticultural purposes, and very poorly adapted to any purposes of agriculture. Throughout this land the bedrock was visible in many places, and the plow struck it constantly. Defendant had not received \$750 income from the place in preceding years, but received \$178 in one year, and \$220 in another year. The 52 acres of bottom land is found to have been worth \$25 an acre, and the rest of the land \$10 an acre. Findings 15 and 16 of the court are as follows: "(15) That plaintiff did not discover immediately after the execution of the conveyance of the land to him, or immediately upon his entry into possession of said land, any discrepancy between the true character of the land and the representations respecting the same made by defendant, and that plaintiff did not discover said discrepancy fully until the month of June, 1894, but, as soon as he had the first intimation that any of said representations were untrue, rescinded the transaction, and offered to restore to defendant everything he had received; but defendant at all times positively refused to accept said offer or to rescind. (16) That at the time that the plaintiff conveyed to the defendant his Sacramento city property, and executed a note and mortgage therefor, and at the time he executed the mortgage now subsisting upon said premises, he did not know of his rights in the premises; and that he did not acquiesce in the original transaction of 1891, and did not ratify or approve the same, or any part thereof, and he at no time ratified the transaction complained of. Said transactions were but continuations of the original transaction, and were not intended or understood by either party to be, and were not, ratifications." Finding 13 contains like declarations.

Accepting as true, for the purposes of this consideration, all the findings of the court relative to the fraud, misrepresentations, artifice, and deceit by which the plaintiff was induced to purchase, and by which he was prevented from making his own independent examination of the land before purchase, there remains for consideration the important question covered by the findings above quoted,—the question whether plaintiff, by his conduct after discovery, waived or lost his right to rescind. Plaintiff went into possession of the land on the 28th day of October, 1891, when the deed of conveyance was made. The purchase price, $12,500, was paid by plaintiff in the following manner: $1,500 cash, his unsecured note for $5,000, and his note secured by mortgage upon the property itself for $6,000. Plaintiff began to farm the land through an agent, and subsequently moved to the ranch with his family. One year after the making of the deed, the situation of the parties to the contract changed in the following manner: Plaintiff conveyed to defendant city property for $9,500. Upon this property there was at the time a mortgage amounting to $3,500. Defendant accepted the property at the price agreed upon ($9,500), paid off at plaintiff's request his note at the California State Bank for $2,000, credited $3,000 upon the purchase price of the farm, thus leaving $8,000 due thereon, for which a new note and mortgage were given, and paid the small remainder of the purchase price to plaintiff in money. Concerning this transaction there is no pretense that it was fraudulent in the sense that any undue advantage in values was taken by defendant, or that defendant did not fully and faithfully perform his part of the contract as it was agreed upon between the parties. The averment of the complaint is merely that plaintiff was sick and unable to resist defendant's importunities. The finding of the court is that the plaintiff, though physically sick, continued to transact business. Matters thus remained for another year, when plaintiff, who had defaulted in his interest, gave defendant a new note and mortgage for $8,600, which amount included the unpaid interest, and the earlier note and mortgage were surrendered and canceled. The only averment in the complaint touching this transaction is that "on November 1, 1893, the defendant induced the plaintiff to execute to him a new note in the sum of $8,600, bearing interest at eight and a half per cent. per annum, secured by mortgage." There is no allegation in the bill, nor anything in the proof, to show that any deceit or artifice was employed by defendant in this transaction, any more than in the transaction by which the city property was sold. There is no evidence establishing such deceit, nor is there any finding upon the question. It must result, then, that the transaction of 1892, whereby the city property was purchased by defendant, and a radical change made in the terms and conditions of the original contract of sale of the agricultural land, and the later transaction of 1893, whereby the plaintiff gave a new note and mortgage upon account of his purchase of defendant's ranch, being untainted by fraud, were distinct acts of affirmance by plaintiff of the original contract, if at the time when he entered into them he was aware of the original fraud of which he was the victim in the purchase of the ranch.

It has been said that in this discussion the findings of the court upon these frauds will be accepted as true. The only misrepresentations of which plaintiff can complain, as having induced him to his injury to purchase the property for a sum greater than its value were—First, that the soil was all of the character of the 52 acres exhibited to him; that is to say, deep, rich, bottom land, when in fact all of the rest of the ranch was of shallow, hardpan soil, of almost worthless character; and, second, that defendant represented that he was in receipt of an income of $750 a year as his share of the crops and profits of the ranch. Whether the defendant did or did not represent the land as good for apple trees, or good for grapes, or good for peach trees, is entirely immaterial—First, because the representations would be upon matters of opinion, and defendant was not a farmer, which fact was known to plaintiff; and, second, because, when plaintiff discovered the true character of the land, he was as fit to judge of its capabilities, or to employ those who were, as was the defendant himself. Nor can it be said that the alleged promise to give plaintiff all the binding business of H. S. Crocker & Co. was made without intention to perform; for it is shown that, for some time after the sale, the business of Crocker & Co. was in fact given to defendant precisely as it previously had been, and no finding of the court declares that the promise was unperformed or made without intent to perform. Plaintiff, it is to be remembered, had been in the possession of the property since the 28th day of October, 1891. Defendant's powers for artifice and deceit as to the character of the land and its depth of soil were at an end. By his own testimony, plaintiff appears to have made an early discovery of that character. He says: "It was in March, 1893, that I went down and saw Mott, and had a long talk with him about the hardpan that I had found on this place. That was one occasion; but I had also talked with him about the hardpan and the bedrock in January, 1892, less than three months after I bought the property. Yes, in January, 1892, we spoke about some of it, and I spoke to him, and told him that I had found bedrock on the land, and mentioned other things to him, but I do not remember exactly what was said." Again, he is asked if he found fault with anything connected with the trade or with the land between January, 1892, when he complained of its character, and March, 1893, when he had testified that he again spoke about the hardpan, and he answered: "In the summer of 1892 I did find fault about the crops, and about the income, and about what the place would produce, and what it was good for." Again, he says: "It was during the early part of that year (1892), and I had come to the conclusion that I had not been treated rightly, and I thought there was something very wrong about it, as I knew that he had misrepresented things to me, because he had told me of certain things that I then found out were not true. I knew that he had told me things that were not true, because I had found out, being on the place, that misrepresentations had been used by him. I saw that the harvest was not going to be anything like what he told me the income used to be from the place. I had found out that the place would not raise so much as he said it would, and I told him long before I went to Goethe that he had misrepresented things to me, and that I was dissatisfied." All this was before the situation of the parties was changed and the new contract entered into through the sale of the plaintiff's city land, its purchase by Mott, and the application of the proceeds of purchase as above set forth. Again, he testifies that in March, 1893, he found out that the land was hardpan. "Then I went to Mr. Mott, and told him I had found out that the land was bedrock, that struck the plow everywhere; and I believed it was a terrible thing to take me in in that way, and I offered to give him back the farm, and he refused to do it." Notwithstanding this knowledge, in November of the same year he affirmed the contract by including the unpaid interest in a new note, and giving to defendant a new mortgage upon the land for the whole amount thereof.

There can be no doubt that these acts of plaintiff amounted to an affirmation of the original contract after knowledge by him of the fraud. The foregoing quotations from plaintiff's testimony are sufficient to show the unsoundness of finding 15 made by the court. It matters not that plaintiff "did not discover" said discrepancy fully until the month of June, 1894." His own testimony shows that long before that time he had discovered that he had been defrauded as to the character of the land, and had become satisfied that defendant had deceived him in his statement of the amount of income he had derived from it. These representations, it is always to be remembered, are the only ones which injuriously affected plaintiff in the matter of the purchase. It is true that where one is justified in relying, and in fact does rely, upon false representations, his right of action is not destroyed because means of knowledge were open to him. In such a case no duty in law is devolved upon him to employ such means of knowledge. But, when thereafter he discovers that he has been put upon and defrauded as to one material matter, notice is at once brought home to him that the man who has been false in one thing may have been false to him in all, and it becomes incumbent upon him to make full investigation. A defrauded party has but one election to rescind, and he must exercise that election with reasonable promptness after discovering the fraud. Dennis v. Jones, 44 N. J. Eq. 513, 14 Atl. 913. Delay in rescission is evidence of a waiver of the fraud, and of an election to treat the contract as valid. Any acts evincive of an intent to abide by the contract are evidence of an affirmation of the contract, and of a waiver of the right of rescission. Delano v. Jacoby, 96 Cal. 275, 31 Pac. 290; Martin v. Wine Co., 99 Cal. 355, 33 Pac. 1107; Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 Pac. 868; Bach v. Tuch, 126 N. Y. 53, 26 N. E. 1019; Crooks v. Nippolt, 44 Minn. 239, 46 N. W. 349; Pearsoll v. Chapin, 44 Pa. St. 9.

Finding 15 is that, as soon as plaintiff had the first intimation that any of said representations were untrue, he rescinded the transaction. It has been shown by plaintiff's own evidence that he received these intimations but a few months after he entered into possession of the land; and indeed, it was most natural that he should, considering the character of the false representations alleged to have been made. The court finds that he then promptly offered to rescind, and that defendant refused to accept the offer. Upon this, plaintiff's cause of action to enforce a rescission became complete, and that cause of action would not be barred by the statute of limitations for three years. But, if he desired and designed to preserve his cause of action, then, as has been said, he must do nothing thereafter amounting to a waiver of his right to rescind, or equivalent to an affirmation of the contract. Both these things this plaintiff repeatedly did. By findings 13 and 16 it is declared that his subsequent acts were but continuations of the original transaction, and were not intended or understood by either party to be and were not ratifications. The word "ratification" is here perhaps somewhat loosely employed. The finding that the later transactions were but continuations of the original transaction cannot, under the evidence, be upheld. They were, manifestly, no part of the original contract. Neither of them was in contemplation when the original contract was entered into. They were independent agreements substituted for the original, and changing the status of the parties. They were entered into by the plaintiff after knowledge and notice of the fraud which had been put upon him. His conduct in this regard amounted to a distinct and unequivocal affirmation of the original contract, and a waiver of all right of rescission.

The legal and necessary effect of plaintiff's acts in the premises is sought to be overcome by a finding that "he did not know his rights in the premises." If this language is to be given any meaning, it is a declaration that plaintiff was ignorant of the law, but such ignorance cannot excuse. There may be extreme cases permitting such a plea, but none have been cited, and we need not be at pains to look for them. This, in any event, could not be one of them, for it appears that plaintiff's ignorance of the law was, at the worst, only partial. He seemingly knew enough of the law to perform the legal duty of offering promptly to rescind. This the court finds he did. But it is said that he did not know enough of law to justify a court in holding that his unequivocal later acts of affirmation should bind him. Plaintiff obtained title to this property in 1891. It was only in 1894 that he commenced this action. During that time he was at liberty to obtain legal advice if he had desired so to do. Nor can his ignorance be palliated or excused because of the alleged confidential relations which existed between plaintiff and defendant, or because of plaintiff's alleged weakness of mind. The court does not find that he was of weak mind, and plaintiff's own testimony as to other land transactions, and the uniform financial success with which he met in his speculations, negatives the idea that he was of feeble intellect. The confidential relationship is found by the court in the following language: "One-half or more of all the business done by plaintiff came from the defendant, as manager of the firm of H. S. Crocker & Co.; and, as a result of the relation between them, plaintiff reposed great confidence in defendant, trusted him, and relied upon him for advice." But this finding is not sufficient to establish the confidential relationship defined in section 2219 of the Civil Code, so as to charge the defendant with the high duties pertaining to a trustee, and to shift the burden of proof to show the unfairness of the transaction from the plaintiff, where it naturally rests, to the shoulders of the defendant, and compel the latter to establish the fairness of the sale. It is to be remembered that plaintiff was himself a business man, had bought and sold real estate, and was contracting with the Crocker Company, of which defendant was a manager. The fact that he imposed confidence in the defendant did not cast any duty upon the latter, unless he "voluntarily assumed a relation of personal confidence" with plaintiff, and this is not found. Equity always views with strictness the business dealings of a man with one who stands in a position of dependence or confidence to him, when that relationship is either voluntarily assumed, or is imposed by operation of law. But it would, indeed, be an anomaly if one dealing with a vendor of land should be allowed to shut his eyes and ears, and make no use of his faculties in determining the value of the property he purchased, and thereafter excuse himself by saying that he reposed confidence in the vendor. He may in fact have done so, but the fact does not establish a confidential relation as known to law, and for his trusting folly neither law nor equity can afford him redress. Finally, it may be added in this connection that it appears from plaintiff's own testimony that he early became convinced, not alone that defendant had misrepresented to him the character of the land and the income derived from it, but equally that defendant was not in fact his friend, but was hostile and false to him. From that time, certainly, he was neither justified nor excused in taking upon faith any of defendant's declarations, and it was his manifest duty to have obtained legal advice if he purposed prosecuting his right of rescission. It is apparent, therefore, assuming the truth and sufficiency of all other matters found, that plaintiff lost his right to rescind the contract by his later acts in affirmation thereof. Wherefore the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

KELSO v. COLE et al. (S. F. 1093.)<sup>1</sup>
MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENT—ASSESSMENT FOR PART.

Gen. Street Law, § 12½, as amended by St. 1889, p. 169, providing that the city council, instead of waiting till the completion of the improvement, may, on completion of two blocks, order an assessment for the proportionate amount of the contract completed, which may thereupon be collected, does not apply where the contract has been abandoned, and the time for its completion has expired.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by John Kelso against P. J. Cole and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. O. K. McMurray and Chas. A. Reynolds, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. Action upon a street assessment. Defendants had judgment for costs. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and supports his appeal by a bill of exceptions. Several points are involved in the appeal, only one of which, in our view of the case, calls for consideration.

On April 25, 1894, after the preliminary steps had been taken therefor, the superintendent of streets in and for the city and county of San Francisco entered into a written contract with J. W. Smith, the assignor of plaintiff (the appellant here), to grade to the official line and grade, to macadamize, and to construct redwood curbs and rock gutter ways on Sunnyside avenue, between Circular avenue and Hamburg street, city and county of San Francisco. The prices to be paid were: for grading, per cubic yard, 14½ cents; redwood curbs, per lineal foot, 13 cents; for macadamizing roadway, including rock gutter ways, per square foot, 2½ cents. The contract was in the usual form, and provided that the work should be completed within 90 days. The time for the performance of the contract was extended from time to time until it finally expired December 16, 1895. On that day, and ever since, no part of the work had been performed between Genessee and Foerster streets, being one block of Sunnyside avenue, included in the contract. The residue of the work was certified by the superintendent of streets to have been completed. On January 13, 1896, the board of supervisors ordered a proportional assessment to be made, under section 12½ of the general street law, as amended in 1889. St. 1889, p. 169. The question, then, is this: Had the board of supervisors jurisdiction to order a proportional assessment under section 12½ of the street act, when a portion of the work had been abandoned by the contractor, and the time for the completion of the whole contract had expired?

Section 12½ is as follows: "The city council, instead of waiting until the completion of the improvement, may, in its discretion, and not otherwise, upon the completion of two blocks or more of any improvement, order the street superintendent to make an assessment for the proportionate amount of the contract completed, and thereupon proceedings and rights of collection of such proportionate amount shall be had as in sections eight, nine, ten, eleven, and twelve of the act, of which this is amendatory, is provided."

All proceedings for work upon streets, etc., in the municipalities of this state, under the act of March 18, 1885, and the amendments thereto, are purely statutory, and can only be conducted in the cases and after the manner provided by the statutes. The authority conferred by these statutes must be strictly pursued. Haskell v. Bartlett, 34 Cal. 281; Smith v. Cofran, Id. 310; Smith v. Davis, 30 Cal. 536; Brock v. Luning, 89 Cal. 316, 26 Pac. 972. Under the general law, except as amended by section 12½, one of the prerequisites to the levy of any assessment whatever is that the entire work shall have been completed. In the language of section 8 of the act, "After the contractor of any street work has fulfilled his contract * * * the street superintendent shall make an assessment," etc. So, too, the contract must be fulfilled within the time specified therein, or within such further time as may have been given the contractor during the life of the contract, or no assessment can be levied; and if, after the expiration of the limited time, an extension is granted and the work is completed, it forms no foundation for a valid assessment. Raisch v. City and County of San Francisco, 80 Cal. 1, 22 Pac. 22; Dougherty v. Bank, 81 Cal. 162, 22 Pac. 513; Heft v. Payne, 97 Cal. 108, 31 Pac. 844; Brady v. Burke, 90 Cal. 1, 27 Pac. 52. The case of Fanning v. Schammel, 68 Cal. 428, 9 Pac. 427, which has been frequently referred to with approbation, was one in which the contract called for the completion of the work within 60 days. The work was not completed within the time, and subsequently the board of supervisors extended the time for its completion. It was held by this court that after its expiration the board had no jurisdiction to revive or validate the contract. The consensus of opinion, as expressed in the cases cited above, and in many others of like import, is that when the time fixed for the completion of the contract has expired, and the work has not been performed, the contract ceases to have any vitality, and jurisdiction to extend it, or to levy an assessment thereon, becomes extinct. The only power reserved is to let the completion of the work anew. This being so, we cannot see upon what principle the board of supervisors can, in its discretion, order a proportional assessment under section 12½ after the contract has been abandoned by the contractor, and the time for its completion has expired. We think section 12½ is intended to apply to an existing contract; to one still in force; to furnish, as we may well suppose, the contractor with funds to aid him in the completion of the work; and that it was not intended to galvanize and give new life to a dead contract,—to confer jurisdiction upon the board to do indirectly what it could not possibly do directly. In the language of the court below: "That section contemplates, as the basis of such an assessment, not only that a part of the improvement has been, but that the whole is to be, completed." We are of opinion the section is provided as a boon to the contractor who in good faith is prosecuting his work within the lines of his agreement, and not as a reward to a defaulting contractor, who has forfeited his right to any relief in the premises. It follows from these views that the assessment was void, and constituted no lien upon the lot of the defendants, and we recommend that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CITIZENS' BANK OF LOS ANGELES v.
JONES. (L. A. 438.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)
APPEAL—RECORD—CERTIFICATE OF DEPOSIT—CONSTRUCTION—PAROL CONTRACT.

1. A finding of fact cannot be attacked, in the absence of a specification attacking it.

2. The contract between the indorser and the indorsee of a negotiable instrument is written, and cannot be varied by parol evidence of a verbal agreement at the time of the transfer.

3. A certificate of deposit, "payable, * * * on return of this certificate, 12 months after date, with interest * * * for the time specified only. Payable in 6 mo., if desired, with interest. * * * No interest after due,"—is not due at end of six months, so as to relieve the indorser from liability to the indorsee if not then presented for payment, but matures at the end of a year.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by the Citizens' Bank of Los Angeles against G. M. Jones. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jones & Weller, for appellant. F. W. Burnett, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Appeal by defendant from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial. The action was to recover from defendant, as indorser, on a certain certificate of deposit. The certificate was in these words: "No. 5,927. First National Bank of Helena, Montana. (Not subject to check.) October 19, 1895. G. M. Jones has deposited in this bank ($1,000.00) one thousand dollars, payable to the order of self, on return of this certificate, twelve months after date, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum for the time specified only. Payable in 6 mo., if desired, with interest at 6 per cent. No interest after due. No. 70-430. Geo. F. Cooper, Cashier." It was indorsed, "G. M. Jones." The complaint alleged its presentation, with demand of payment, to the maker, on October 19, 1896, that payment was not made, and that due notice of such demand was given the defendant. The answer alleged that defendant's indorsement to plaintiff was made on or about March 6, 1896, and was with the understanding and agreement that plaintiff should present the certificate to the maker for payment at the end of six months from its date; that at the last-mentioned date the maker thereof was in a flourishing condition, and meeting all its obligations as they matured, and that, had the paper been then presented, it would have been promptly paid; that it was the duty of plaintiff, by reason of said agreement, to make demand at said date, and by its failure to do so it had assumed all future risks of collection. The court found the facts alleged in the complaint to be true, and those stated in the answer untrue, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Appellant's main contention seems to be, in effect, although not so stated in terms, that the finding against his special defense is not in accord with the evidence. We regard the evidence as substantially conflicting as to the making of any such agreement as that set up in the answer. But, if this were otherwise, appellant is not in a position to assail the finding upon this issue, since the record contains no specification attacking it. There is but one specification in the record, and that is directed in express terms to the first finding, which refers solely to the averments of the complaint. But, moreover, the evidence offered by defendant in support of his defense was not competent to establish it, and that objection was made; the court, however, permitting it to go in subject to the objection, and reserving its ruling. The evidence simply tended to show a verbal understanding, if any, had at the time of the transfer of the certificate to plaintiff, that the latter would present it at the end of the six months; but whether this understanding was had prior to the indorsement and delivery of the paper, or subsequent thereto, defendant could not state. Manifestly, however, whether before or after, in either event the evidence was wholly inadmissible. If made before indorsement, all negotiations were merged in the writing. If made subsequently, it was made without consideration, and void. The contract between the indorser and indorsee of a negotiable instrument is a written one, and cannot be varied or changed by parol evidence of a verbal promise or agreement made at the time of the indorsement. Goldman v. Davis, 23 Cal. 256. The court below having reserved its ruling upon this evidence until final submission, its subsequent finding against appellant upon the issue to which the evidence was directed was in effect a ruling excluding the evidence; and the case may be regarded as though no evidence had been offered by defendant in support of his answer.

The further proposition apparently advanced, that the instrument was by its terms due at the end of six months, and that plaintiff was bound to present it at that time in order to hold the indorser, is not tenable. The paper did not by its terms mature until October 19, 1896. The stipulation therein that it would be paid at the end of six months, "if desired," was an option solely for the benefit of the payee, to be availed of at his election. Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 355. And the instrument being negotiable, this privilege passed to the indorsee. The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1898.)

LARCENY—EVIDENCE—EMBEZZLEMENT.

1. M. and P. were roommates, and P. gave M. money, done up in a package, to be placed for safe-keeping in M.'s trunk. M. carried the key, but always unlocked the trunk on request of P., and handed him the package. He had no authority to touch the package in the absence of P., and was only authorized to hand it to P., or replace it in the trunk when P. was present. Held, that M.'s appropriation of the money was grand larceny.

2. Pen. Code, § 503, defines embezzlement as "the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Held, that the testimony of a witness that he "intrusted" his money to defendant does not conclusively show that the appropriation of it by defendant was embezzlement, but that expression must be read in the light of his whole testimony and all the circumstances.

3. Where M. induced P. to place his money in a particular place, for the purpose of bringing it within the possession and control of M., intending to thereafter feloniously appropriate it, the accomplishment of such act constitutes larceny.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Louis Montarial was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. Marion Brooks and D. K. Trask, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Appellant makes but one point in support of his appeal,—that the evidence did not warrant his conviction of grand larceny, but established, if anything, embezzlement instead. At the time the money was taken it was in two trunks belonging to defendant, $500 being in one and $300 in the other, where it had been placed by Paillac, to whom it belonged, some time before, for safe-keeping, under these circumstances: Paillac and the defendant were fellow countrymen and intimate friends, and roomed together at the same house. They had two rooms, one upstairs and the other down, but their intimacy was such that they used them in common, sleeping together in the lower room, and keeping wearing apparel and other articles in the upper one,—each having like access to both, and indifferently carrying the keys. They had been thus situated for several years. Paillac, who had accumulated several hundred dollars, had been in the habit of keeping it buried in the ground in a secret hoard. Observing that the defendant kept his money in his trunk, a discussion arose between them as to the safest way to keep money. Which one of the two first suggested the idea of placing Paillac's money in the defendant's trunks does not clearly appear; Paillac, who testified on the subject, being unable to speak English, and his evidence being given through an interpreter, and leaving the fact in some confusion. At one point he states that the suggestion came from himself, but elsewhere his statements indicate that it was made by defendant. It does appear from his evidence, however, that in the conversation defendant assured Paillac that he "might as well put the money in the trunk"; that it was "safer there than any bank"; and that Paillac had better put his money there, since the latter's trunk was old, and the lock broken,—telling him, "Don't be afraid; it will be a good, safe place;" and further, as expressed by the witness, "He said that some time I [Paillac] might die, or an accident fall to me, or I might fall off the wagon, and get killed, and then I [defendant] will know where the money is." The result of the conversation was that Paillac dug up his treasure and placed it in defendant's trunk. This was something over two years prior to the taking. At that time Paillac had some $500, and he put that amount in a purse, securely tied up in a handkerchief, and handed it to defendant, who in Paillac's presence placed it in the trunk in the upper room, where it remained undisturbed, except when inspected by Paillac, until taken by defendant. Subsequent to this first deposit the $300 fund was accumulated by Paillac. This latter was the fund to which Paillac resorted for current needs from time to time,—the $500 being kept intact,—and it was kept in the trunk which stood in their sleeping room downstairs. Like the first, it was always kept in a package securely done up by Paillac himself, and which he would merely hand to the defendant to be placed in the trunk in his presence; the defendant, as the evidence clearly indicates, never being given the right to handle or disturb either package in any way, except in the presence of Paillac, and then only for the purpose of handing them out when wanted by the latter, or replacing them at his direction. And, while defendant carried the keys to the trunks, they were always at the call of Paillac whenever he wished to get at his money; the defendant on such occasions unlocking the trunks for the purpose, and handing out the package, or putting it back, as the case might be. And the evidence indicates that, while Paillac had confidence in his friend, it did not prevent him from keeping a sharp eye on his treasure whenever the defendant opened the trunks to get his clothes, or for any other purpose of his own.

Upon this evidence and some expressions in the testimony of Paillac that, because of his confidence in the defendant, he "intrusted" the money to him to keep for him, that he would not have done so but for his "confidence" in him, and that he would have looked to him to return the money had it been missing, the defendant bases a very strenuous and plausible argument that the facts show a delivery of the money to the defendant which constituted a deposit or bailment, and that in appropriating the money under such circumstances the defendant was guilty of a fraudulent appropriation or embezzlement, and not larceny. But we cannot accede to this view. Taking the whole evidence together, with all it tends to show, and we are satisfied that it does not establish a bailment or intrusting of the money to defendant. As we regard it, the evidence does not show that Paillac ever in fact really parted with the possession of his money. While it was locked in the trunks of defendant, to which the latter retained the keys, the trunks were at all times as much in the possession of Paillac, and with practically the same freedom of access to the latter, as in that of the defendant. In legal contemplation the use of the trunks was loaned or given to Paillac as a place for keeping his money. The mere fact that defendant carried the keys is not a material consideration. As we have seen, the keys were always forthcoming when demanded by Paillac for access to his money, and the money was, therefore, to all practical intents and purposes, as much under his personal supervision and protection as of defendant; indeed, more so, since the latter had no right or authority to tamper with it in any way, except as directed by its owner.

Much is made by defendant of the fact that Paillac testified that he "intrusted" the money to defendant, and it is urged that this constitutes embezzlement, because that offense consists of "the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Pen. Code, § 503. But, to reach the meaning of the witness, his expressions must be read in the light of his whole testimony and all the circumstances; and when so read it is clear that his money was not intrusted to the keeping of the defendant in a manner to bring it within the definition of embezzlement. Defendant let Paillac have the use of his trunks as a place of safety for his property, and the only dominion defendant rightfully exercised over it was a perfunctory handling of it in the presence of the owner. The case, although differing in its circumstances, is not to be distinguished in principle from that of People v. Johnson, 91 Cal. 265, 27 Pac. 663, where it is held that, where the owner puts his property into the hands of another to do some act in relation to it in his presence, he does not part with the possession of it, and the conversion of it animo furandi is larceny, and not embezzlement. See, also, 2 Russ. Crimes (8th Am. Ed.) 21.

Moreover, there is, as suggested by the attorney general, another aspect in which the evidence, if so construed by the jury, was sufficient to warrant a conviction of larceny. If the jury believed, as there was evidence tending to show, that the defendant originally induced Paillac to place the money in his trunks for the purpose of getting it into his possession and control, with the intent to thereafter feloniously appropriate it, such act, when accomplished, constituted larceny. People v. Rae, 66 Cal. 423, 6 Pac. 1. We are satisfied that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

RIGHTS OF GUARDIAN FOR INCOMPETENT—APPEAL.

1. An appeal may be taken from an order appointing a guardian for an incompetent person, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1763, 1764, since the main thing provided for thereby is not the adjudication as to the incompetency, but the appointment of a guardian, and hence the appeal is authorized by section 963, providing for an appeal from any order granting or refusing to grant letters of guardianship.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 372, providing that mentally incompetent persons can take an appeal only by their general or ad litem guardian, does not apply to an appeal taken directly from the order of guardianship itself.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

In the matter of William F. Moss, an incompetent person. From an order appointing a guardian for him, he appeals. Motion to dismiss the appeal. Denied.

J. G. Swinnerton and Budd & Thompson, for appellant.

McFARLAND, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal taken by William F. Moss from an order of the superior court appointing a guardian for him upon the ground of alleged incompetency, under sections 1763 and 1764 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

1. The first contention of respondents is that the order appealed from is not an appealable order. They say in their brief that "the adjudication of incompetency is not appealable." It is not necessary to consider whether or not the order appealed from would be viewed as a final judgment if there were no express provision for an appeal from it, for the Code directly provides for an appeal from the particular order here involved. The main and ultimate purpose of sections 1763 and 1764 is the appointment of a guardian for a person found to be incompetent to manage his business and property. The Code does not seem to contemplate an adjudication of incompetency independent of the appointment of a guardian. Its purpose is to appoint a guardian for an incompetent person. Of course the incompetency would have to be found in some way by the court as a preliminary step to the appointment of a guardian; but the appointment of a guardian is the thing specially directed. Section 1763 provides that when it is represented by a verified petition that a person is insane, "or from any cause mentally incompetent to manage his property," the court must give notice to the person supposed to be incompetent of the time and place of the hearing of that matter, and that the alleged incompetent person must, if able to attend, be produced on the hearing; and section 1764 provides that "if after a full hearing and examination upon such petition it appear to the court that the person in question is incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property, such court must appoint a guardian of his person and estate with the powers and duties in this chapter specified." There is no provision for a mere adjudication of incompetency; the thing to be done by the court is the appointment of the guardian. And section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure expressly provides that an appeal may be taken to the supreme court from the superior court "from a judgment or order granting or refusing to grant * * * letters * * * of guardianship."

2. The notice of appeal is signed by Messrs. Nicol & Orr, who are attorneys of this court, and who appeared for the appellant, Moss, in the proceeding in the superior court in which the order of guardianship was made; and it is contended by respondents that, under section 372 of the Code of Civil Procedure, Moss could take an appeal only by his general guardian or by a guardian ad litem appointed by the court. But that section does not apply to a case where the very question involved is the validity of the order of guardianship itself, and where the appeal is taken directly from that order. That section applies only to a case where the order of guardianship has been finally established. But no judgment or order of a superior court is final when an appeal from it is duly pending. If the order appointing a guardian for the appellant be erroneous, it will be reversed; and the appellant's right to the control of his property cannot be held as finally concluded against him by an order from which he has appealed, and from which he has a right to appeal. Some difficulties are suggested by a consideration of the proposition that the appeal stays the execution of the order, and that, if the appellant be really incompetent, his property might be dissipated by designing persons during the pendency of the appeal. There is some force in this suggestion, and apprehended embarrassments might be remedied perhaps by some amendment to the Code in this regard; but more grievous consequences might follow an erroneous adjudication of guardianship, if no appeal were allowed.

3. We see nothing in the statement of respondents that Moss is not "an aggrieved party," or in any of the other contentions made by respondents.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

In re SPANIER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 1085.)

PROBATE—PAYMENT OF DEBTS—STATUTORY NOTICE OF SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS—ADMINISTRATORS.

1. The probate court has no power to order the payment of a debt from the estate of a deceased person until the settlement of the administrator's account (Code Civ. Proc. § 1647), and hence a debt paid by the administrator on the order of the court before such settlement cannot be credited to his account on the sole ground that it was ordered paid by the court.

2. An order of the court for the payment of a debt before settlement of the administrator's account is of no force if made without the statutory notice (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1633, 1634), and without notice to any one except the administrator.

3. An administrator has a standing in court to contest the account of his predecessor, since it is his duty to protect the estate against all unlawful claims.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Joseph Spanier, deceased. From an order settling the final account of A. C. Freese as administrator, he appeals. Affirmed.

R. F. Mogan, for appellant. J. J. McCabe, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by A. C. Freese, former administrator of the estate of Joseph Spanier, deceased, from an order of the superior court entered September 21, 1896, settling his final account as such administrator. The transcript consists of fragments taken from the general history of the administration of said estate, and does not very clearly show the facts upon which the litigation has arisen. The appeal involves merely one item of $150, claimed to have been paid by appellant to one Charles Frank, which item the court refused to allow as a credit. The only objection made in the court below to the refusal to allow this item was, "because the same was paid by said Freese by order and direction of the said court dated April 6, 1896." The facts about this item of $150, as they may be dimly seen in the transcript, appear to be as follows: Charles Frank, some time in 1890, presented a claim against the estate for $505.50, for "money loaned by claimant to decedent." The transcript contains an order of court made September 23, 1891, which, after reciting that something that is there called "the matter of the opposition to the claims" of said Frank and of certain other claimants had come on to be heard, orders that the claim of Frank be allowed for $150, and rejected for all the remainder of the $505.50. It is difficult to understand exactly what this proceeding was, for the Code does not seem to provide for the trial of an "opposition to claims" except upon the settlement of an administrator's account; but, although the order is recited as having been made by "the court," it may be treated as an order by the judge approving the claim of Frank for $150, and rejecting it for the rest. Frank did not accept the allowance of $150, but immediately brought suit in another department of the superior court against the administrator, who was then J. C. Pennie, for the whole of the claim. Judgment in that suit went against appellant for the whole claim. He appealed to this court, and the appeal was still pending when the order from which the present appeal was taken was made. Proceedings were instituted to remove the appellant from the administration of the estate, which resulted in his removal, and the appointment of John W. Moffitt as his successor, who qualified on May 12, 1896. While those proceedings were pending, and while the said appeal was also pending, the court, on April 6, 1896, made an order that Freese, administrator, "immediately pay" to Frank the $150. This order recites that by the order of September 23, 1891, Frank's claim was allowed for $150; that no part of it had been paid; that there were sufficient funds in the hands of Freese to pay it; and that the order of September 23d was in full force and effect, but does not recite that any notice of an application for the order had been given to any person, or that any person interested had appeared or was present when the order was made. And this is the order referred to by appellant in his specification of error in the transcript as "the order and direction of the said court dated April 6, 1896." Immediately after the making of the order, appellant paid the $150 to Frank's attorney. This was after the filing of his main final account, but for the purpose of charging this $150 thus paid he filed a supplemental account in which he placed it. On June 17, 1896, the present administrator, Moffitt, filed a verified petition to have said order of April 6th set aside upon various grounds, and, after a hearing, the court, on July 30, 1896, made an order canceling and vacating said order.

We have stated the foregoing facts because counsel, in their briefs, refer to them, but, in our view, many of them are immaterial. It will be observed that there is no question here as to whether the Frank claim was or was not a meritorious claim. If that were the question, the record would present no ground for attacking its rejection by the court. The whole contention of appellant is that it was ordered paid by the order of April 6, 1896, and therefore the court erred in not allowing it in settling appellant's account. But the order of April 6th was one which the court had no power to make, and therefore invalid. With the exception of section 1513 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which relates to certain interest-bearing debts, and does not apply to the case at bar, there is no provision of the probate law to which our attention has been called which gives the court power to order any particular debt paid prior to the settlement of the administrator's account, except that, perhaps, under section 1646, claims for expenses of funeral or last sickness, or family allowance, might, in certain cases, be ordered paid before such settlement. The "payment of debts of the estate" is provided for in the article of the Code, which begins with section 1643; and section 1647 provides that "upon the settlement of the accounts of the executor or administrator, as required in this chapter, the court must make an order for the payment of the debts as circumstances of the estate require." Sections 1633 and 1634 of the same chapter provide that notice of the day on which the settlement of any account is to be heard must be given in the manner prescribed in said sections; and it is quite apparent that if such notice be not given there can be no valid settlement of the account, and consequently no valid order made for the payment of a claim like that of Frank. The Code seems to contemplate an order for the payment of a debt only upon the settlement of the administrator's account; but if it be assumed that such an order could be made before such settlement, still it would clearly be of no force if made without notice. Therefore, under any view, the order of April 6th here relied on was invalid, because it appears affirmatively that it was made without the statutory notice having been given, and without any notice of any kind to any person other than the attorney for appellant. This is not a case where an administrator, having paid a just debt, asks to have it allowed in his account. The court refused to allow the alleged debt as a credit in appellant's account, and there is no evidence in this record as to the character of the claim, although it appears incidentally in the case of Frank v. Pennie, 117 Cal. 254, 49 Pac. 208, referred to in the briefs, that it was a gambling debt. The appellant rests entirely upon the conclusiveness of the said order of April 6th, which, as we have seen, the court had no power to make. Under this view, it is unnecessary to discuss other points made by respondents.

Appellant's contention that the present administrator had no standing to contest the account, because he is not a person interested in the estate, is not maintainable. It is the duty of an administrator to protect the estate against unlawful claims of creditors; and it is also the duty of the court to do so at the suggestion of any person, or on its own motion. The nonresident heir unites with the administrator in supporting the order appealed from. The order is affirmed.

APPEAL—GRANTING NEW TRIAL.

Where a new trial, asked for on several grounds, is granted, but the record does not disclose on which one of the grounds it was granted, the order will not be reversed if it could have been properly allowed on any one of said grounds.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Tibbetts Bros. & Cross against W. R. Bower. From an order granting defendant a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Alvin Fay, for appellants. T. M. McNamara, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Appeal by plaintiff from an order granting the defendant a new trial. In presenting this appeal, counsel for appellant proceeds upon the assumption and theory that the court below granted the motion for a new trial upon one particular ground, as to which he contends the court was in error, and that hence the order should be reversed. It is not necessary to inquire into the soundness of appellant's view of the law as to the particular point discussed by him, since the record does not sustain his assumption that the new trial was granted upon that ground. The action was in claim and delivery for the recovery of a lot of sheep, and the evidence was substantially conflicting as to the ownership and right to possession of the sheep. The motion for new trial was made upon several grounds, including that of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings, and the order granting the motion is general in terms. The respondent invokes the well-settled doctrine of this court that where a new trial is asked for on several grounds, and is granted, and the record does not disclose for which one of the reasons it was granted, the order will not be reversed if it could have been properly granted upon any one of the grounds assigned. The case is within this rule, and the action of the court cannot, therefore, be reviewed. The order is affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW—SELECTION OF JURORS—CHALLENGE TO PANEL—EXCUSING JURORS—REMARKS OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—EVIDENCE OF EXPERIMENTS.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 206, provides that the jury list shall be composed of names of persons selected from the wards and townships of the county. Held, that a challenge to the panel was properly overruled, where the evidence showed no jurors selected from the town of C., but did not show that none had been selected from the township in which C. is located.

2. A court has broad discretion in excusing jurymen, and a defendant tried by a competent jury cannot object that the judge excused certain of the venire for cause.

3. A statement by the district attorney, in his opening statement to the jury, that he would prove certain acts of defendant as evidence of guilt, will not be prejudicial error unless made in bad faith, although he is not permitted to introduce such evidence.

somewhat peculiar, with tracks made by defendant's shoes, and found them the same. He brought before the jury a box of sand containing shoe tracks, which he made with these shoes, which he testified were the same as those found in the sand at the place of the killing. Held, that the box of sand, with the impressions, was competent to show, by comparison, the character of the tracks, where the conditions under which they were made were substantially the same.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Louis James Searcey was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Benj. F. Bledsoe, Gordon & Hall, and H. M. Willis, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant has been convicted of the crime of murder, and by the judgment of the court the extreme penalty of the law has been ordered. Many assignments of error are relied upon by this appeal, and they are all of a somewhat technical character. We will specially notice the more important ones.

It is claimed that a challenge to the panel of jurors should have been allowed. The evidence taken upon the hearing of the challenge discloses a very lax performance of duty upon the part of the board of supervisors in selecting the list of trial jurors for the year. The sections of the Code declaring what that duty is evidently either have not been closely studied by the board, or no real effort has been made to follow the law there laid down. It appears that the names of persons were placed upon the list which do not appear upon the last assessment roll. That all names upon the list should appear upon the assessment roll of the preceding year is an important requirement in the eyes of the law. But the mere fact that some names of persons appeared upon the list that did not appear upon the last assessment roll of the county, of itself, is not a sufficient departure from the demands of the law to authorize the trial court in sustaining a challenge to the panel. It further appears that not a single name is found upon the list from Colton, a town possessing 1,500 inhabitants. The law says (Code Civ. Proc. § 206) that this list should be composed of names of persons selected from the wards and townships of the county in proportion to the inhabitants thereof, as near as may be estimated by the board of supervisors. It would seem that by compliance with this provision of the law the names of some persons from Colton would be likely to appear upon this list. But, however this may be, the evidence discloses that the township in which the town of Colton is situated embraces additional territory; and it is not plain from the evidence but that some names upon the list were those of persons living outside of Colton, and yet within the township. If appellant's contention upon this point be good in law, it was his duty to have shown by some pertinent evidence that the township of Colton was not represented upon the jury list. When he established the fact that Colton was not so represented, such evidence was not sufficient to prove the material issue. The further fact that the judge excused certain of the venire for cause is not a matter for complaint upon the part of the defendant. As to such matters the court's discretion is of the broadest. Defendant in this regard must be satisfied if he is tried by 12 qualified, competent jurors.

In this case a man was murdered upon the railroad track upon the Mojave desert, while traveling westward. The district attorney in his opening statement to the jury, prior to the introduction of any evidence, stated that he proposed to prove that the defendant was likewise traveling westward upon this track at about the same time and place; and also at that time officers of Arizona, with his knowledge, were looking for him, with a view to arrest him upon a charge of burglary committed in that territory. The case is one of purely circumstantial evidence. As suggested, the defendant was near the scene of the murder, traveling westward. Twenty-four hours later he was arrested 30 miles east of that point, traveling eastward. The district attorney by his opening statement proposed to prove these facts for the purpose of showing the improbability of defendant's conduct in traveling towards the arresting officers, unless great reason existed for such action upon his part, and this reason, it was claimed, was found in the fact of the murder. Evidence to this effect was offered before the jury, and under objection was denied admission by the court. Notwithstanding this ruling, it is still insisted by appellant that the statement of the district attorney, as bearing upon the defendant's commission of another offense, constituted prejudicial error.

There is no question but that under certain conditions the prosecution are entitled in law to prove against a defendant an offense other than the one upon which he is being tried. Our state Reports contain many such cases. But whether or not this case is such a one is not a question necessary for decision, for, as already suggested, the court rejected all evidence looking in that direction. Again, we have been cited to no case where a new trial has been ordered by reason of the character of the opening statement of the prosecuting officer. But, though precedent is lacking to the point, we are prepared to say that such misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer might be found in the character of his opening statement to the jury as to recommend, or even absolutely demand, in the interests of justice, a second trial of the defendant. The principle justifying such a course is well outlined in People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 Pac. 1078. There a new trial was ordered by reason of the action of the district attorney merely asking certain questions of various witnesses, the answers to such questions not being admitted by the court. The conclusion of the court was there declared because it was evident from the record that the attorney in asking those questions was acting in bad faith, and attempting by this course to improperly influence the jury to the defendant's damage. That case is an exceptional one in its facts, but not in its law, and the decision is eminently sound. If such misconduct existed here the same results would follow; but it is not at all apparent that the district attorney was acting in bad faith in making the statements to which objection is made. It is not even clearly apparent that his position as to the admissibility of such evidence was wrong in law. As a circumstance tending to show the guilt of the defendant upon the charge of murder, the facts evidencing his conduct in this regard bear with some force. There is certainly no such palpable wrong in his conduct as to justify the conclusion that he was actuated by bad faith in making the statements here under consideration.

Witness Arbois testified that a few days subsequent to the homicide he visited the scene of the crime, and found tracks of a person leading therefrom. He followed these tracks in the sand a distance of 15 miles. At that time he had a pair of shoes in his possession taken from the feet of defendant after his arrest. He compared the tracks in the sand, which were in some respects peculiar, with tracks made by these shoes, and found them the same. He also minutely detailed before the jury the appearance of these tracks in the sand. Thereafter he brought before the jury a box of sand which contained impressions of shoe tracks, and then testified he made these tracks with defendant's shoes, and that the tracks so made were identical with those he found in the sand upon the desert. The introduction in evidence of this box of sand, with the shoe impressions therein, is claimed to constitute error, and many reasons are now urged to support this claim. Counsel cite various cases which refer to the danger in allowing experiments to be made before the jury, and also insist that the conditions which surrounded these tracks when made in the box of sand were not shown to be similar to those upon the desert when the tracks were there made; but we see nothing of material moment in these positions. This evidence hardly partook of the character of an experiment made before the jury. Nothing was done before the eyes of the jury looking towards the making of an experiment. The shape and dimensions of certain tracks were placed before that body, made by the use of a box of sand. Any other impressionable substance as well might have been used. These tracks in the box were declared by the witness to be identical with those found upon the desert. Under such circumstances, this evidence served the purpose of accurately describing to the jury the appearance of the tracks upon the desert. It was an indirect, but entirely satisfactory, and legal way of proving that very material link in the chain of circumstances connecting the defendant with the murder.

It being clear that the evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing by comparison the character of the foot tracks upon the desert, no violation of law occurred upon the ruling of the court. Indeed, we find in the record no objection made by counsel to the admission of the evidence, other than the very general one that "we object to the witness testifying that he made footprints representing the form and shape of those." Was this evidence competent as directly tending to prove that defendant's shoes made the tracks in the desert sand? If defendant's shoes made the tracks in the sand in the box, and those tracks were identical with the tracks found in the sand in the desert, then the evidence would seem important upon that issue. There is but one possible objection that could be made to its admission for the purpose of establishing that fact. That objection would be a specific one, based upon a dissimilarity of conditions under which the tracks in the box and those upon the desert were made. To have any weight looking towards the establishment of this important fact, the tracks in both cases must have been made under substantially the same conditions, and, as already suggested, we find no objection in the record sufficiently specific to raise that question upon this appeal. Yet aside from that consideration, upon a careful examination of the testimony, we conclude the conditions were so substantially alike in the two cases as to justify the admission of the evidence. No testimony was offered bearing upon these conditions other than that of the witness Arbois, and he declares that the sand in the two cases was of the same quality and of the same character of hardness and compactness.

We have examined the remaining assignments of error, and find no substantial merit in them. While the evidence of defendant's guilt is found in a chain of circumstances alone, still, upon a perusal of that evidence as set out in full by the record, we are satisfied the jury was entirely justified in declaring the verdict rendered in the case. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

Action by H. Marks against Weinstock, Lubin & Co., a corporation. From an order denying a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Albert M. Johnson, for appellant. A. L. Hart, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. Upon filing the complaint in this case a preliminary injunction was issued, restraining the defendant from placing or maintaining on the sidewalk of a street in the city of Sacramento a certain obstruction, alleged to have been placed and kept there by defendant maliciously, and to the prejudice and damage of the plaintiff. The complaint was duly verified, and stated facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded. Without filing any answer, the defendant moved the court to dissolve the injunction upon several grounds. After a hearing the motion was denied, and from that order this appeal is prosecuted.

The motion was based upon two affidavits which were introduced and read by defendant at the hearing,—one made by James Seadler, and the other by A. Bonnheim. The affidavit of Seadler is of no importance, as it simply states the extent of the sidewalk occupied by the obstruction complained of, as alleged in the complaint. The affidavit of Bonnheim, after stating that he is the secretary of defendant, and makes the affidavit for and on behalf of defendant, consists alone of admissions, denials, and allegations as to the facts of the case. It first states that he (the affiant) admits many of the material allegations of the complaint, and then proceeds to state at length what the defendant denies and alleges. For example, it is said: "And the defendant denies that it has placed the said structure or show case upon the said sidewalk maliciously," etc., and "the defendant alleges, on the contrary, that the structure or show case was constructed by it and placed upon said sidewalk lawfully, and for a legitimate purpose," etc. And it is also said: "And defendant further alleges that" in June, 1894, the board of trustees of the city of Sacramento adopted an ordinance, a copy of which is set out, which authorized and justified its action.

We fail to see how this affidavit can subserve the purposes of the defendant. It is not an answer, and cannot take the place of an answer. Clearly, the affiant had no power to admit, deny, or allege any fact; and, until an answer was filed, how could he know what defendant admitted, denied, or alleged? An affidavit is simply and only written proof, taken ex parte, of the facts stated in it; and, as in giving oral testimony, the facts stated should be probative, and not ultimate facts or conclusions. We think it must be held, therefore, that the said affidavit was not sufficient to prove the facts attempted to be proved thereby, or to sustain the defendant's motion.

But, waiving this objection, the order of the court should, in our opinion, be affirmed on other grounds. It is a well-settled rule that the dissolution or continuance of a preliminary injunction is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears from the record that its discretion has been abused. Patterson v. Board, 50 Cal. 344; Parrott v. Floyd, 54 Cal. 534; White v. Nunan, 60 Cal. 406; Grannis v. Lorden, 103 Cal. 472, 37 Pac. 375. Here it appears from the complaint that the obstruction complained of was a private as well as a public nuisance, for the abatement of which the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action. And, as shown by the learned judge of the court below in an opinion delivered when the motion was denied, the obstruction was one not authorized or justified by the ordinance relied upon by the defendant. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said, we think, that the court abused its discretion in denying the defendant's motion. We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

In re WINSLOW'S ESTATE. (Sac. 357.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

ABANDONMENT OF HOMESTEAD—EVIDENCE OF DECLARATION.

Civ. Code, §§ 1243, 1244, provide that a homestead of a married claimant can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment, or a grant thereof, executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife and recorded. Held, where a wife declared a homestead on a lot, and subsequently entered into an agreement with her husband that they would henceforth live separate, and that they would divide the property specified in the agreement according to a plan set forth therein; that, in consideration of the payment to the wife of half the value of the lot in question, she transferred to him all her right, title, and interest therein; and that she relinquished all claims against the husband; which agreement was duly acknowledged and recorded, together with a deed to the lot from the wife to the husband,—that the contract was an abandonment of the homestead by both spouses, although the property was not referred to therein as a homestead.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

In the matter of the estate of Robert B. Winslow, deceased, Emily Winslow, his widow, petitions to have the homestead set over to her, which was contested by the mother of the deceased. Petition was granted, and contestant appeals. Reversed.

A. A. De Ligne and H. W. Johnson, for appellant. W. W. Rhodes and C. H. Oatman, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Robert B. Winslow and his wife, Emily, resided on a lot of land, which was community property, in the city of Sacramento. In the year 1890 the wife declared a homestead on the land in manner conformable to the statute. On May 28, 1895, said married parties jointly executed a written instrument reciting that differences had arisen between them; that they desired to adjust the same, and also their property rights, without resort to the courts; and that they had agreed upon a division of their property, particularly described, in accordance with the provisions of such instrument. The property described included the said lot of land, which was referred to as the residence of the parties, and was the only real estate mentioned. It was then declared in said instrument that the said property "is hereby equally divided between the parties; and inasmuch as the said real estate is incapable of partition, it is further agreed that the whole of the aforesaid property, both real and personal, is of the value of $4,700"; and in consideration of the premises, and of the sum of $2,350, one-half the said value, to her paid, the wife renounced and relinquished all claims of every kind against the husband, and granted and conveyed to him all her right, title, and interest in and to all the said property, and released him from all obligation for alimony, etc., and agreed never to make any claim on him in any manner whatsoever; and the husband on his part released the wife from all claims he might have or assert against her. It was further agreed that "henceforth the parties shall live separate and apart from each other, it being understood that this agreement is and shall operate as a complete settlement and adjustment of all their property rights and relations and affairs." Said instrument was duly acknowledged by both parties, and recorded in the office where the previous declaration of homestead was recorded. Said Emily further executed to said Robert a formal deed of grant purporting to convey to him the said lot of land "as and for his sole and separate property," which was recorded in the same office. He paid to his wife the sum of $2,350 mentioned in their contract, mortgaging the land to raise a portion thereof. The parties separated, and in January, 1896, the husband died, leaving no children. In course of administration of his estate, his widow, the said Emily, petitioned the superior court to set over the said land to her, claiming that the homestead thereon was never abandoned, and that she was entitled to the same as survivor of the marital community. It was valued at $3,200. Her petition was contested by the mother of the deceased. The court, however, granted the same, and the contestant has appealed.

Under sections 158, 159, Civ. Code, Winslow and wife had contractual power to deal between themselves with the homestead as property in any manner not forbidden by law; but it is provided in sections 1243 and 1244 of the same Code that a homestead of a married claimant can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment, or a grant thereof, executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife, and recorded in the proper office; and respondent contends that the said contract between herself and her husband constituted no abandonment of the homestead, within this requirement of the statute. It is urged that, admitting the language of the instrument to be expressive of the purpose of the wife to abandon her rights of homestead in the land, yet the husband did not abandon, and hence, under the statute, the abandonment by the wife alone was ineffectual. The law has prescribed no form of words for the abandonment of a homestead, and the meaning of the said instrument of May 28, 1895, is to be determined by the same rules which control the interpretation of other contracts. Among those rules are that the mutual intention of the parties will be given effect so far as the same is lawful and ascertainable from the language employed and the attendant circumstances; that each clause of the contract is to be looked to for light in interpreting the others; and that those things which are necessary to give the contract effect are implied therefrom unless its terms repel the implication. Now, throughout the instrument before us the manifest paramount object of the contract is a division of property, to be final and complete. The parties covenanted that the agreement should operate "as a complete settlement and adjustment of all their property rights and relations and affairs." If the homestead right persisted notwithstanding the contract, then, instead of evidencing a complete settlement of rights in the property described and a division thereof, the instrument effected an adjustment extremely imperfect and incomplete, even during the joint lives of the parties; for in that case neither party could convey or encumber the property without the concurrence of the other, and, in case of an action for divorce, it would still have been within the power of the court to assign as a homestead under section 146, Civ. Code. It is clear that the parties meant to deal with the unfettered fee in the land, not a mere life estate of either party. The homestead of married persons in this state has been so often likened to an estate in joint tenancy that we need not cite the cases which note the resemblance. What would be thought of a contract between joint tenants, in terms designed to effect a division, complete and final, of the property held by them, which should yet leave intact the right of survivorship? Certainly, all intendments would be indulged against that construction. We hold, therefore, that the contract between Winslow and wife—the same having been acknowledged by both and duly recorded—was an abandonment of the homestead by both spouses. Such abandonment follows from the provisions of the instrument, for they cannot have their natural and obviously intended effect without it.

Respondent has cited several cases claimed to be illustrative of the one at bar: Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 Pac. 715; Oaks v. Oaks, 94 Cal. 66, 29 Pac. 330; Estate of Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 30 Pac. 568; and others. It seems unnecessary to review those cases; our conclusion in no wise conflicts with them. In re Davis' Estate, 106 Cal. 453, 39 Pac. 756, has some similarity to the present case. There an agreement much like that of Winslow and wife—though apparently not involving a homestead—was enforced according to its terms. The court said that the obvious purpose thereof was “not only to definitely sever the property rights of the parties, but mutually to relinquish all inheritable interest of each in the property and estate of the other.”

The point that the homestead was not abandoned because the contract in question did not expressly refer to the property as a homestead is not well taken. See Head v. Auberry (Ky.) 38 S. W. 863; Withers v. Pugh, 91 Ky. 522, 16 S. W. 277. The order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE v. SCOTT. (Cr. 378.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

CRIMINAL LAW—RECORD ON APPEAL—EXCEPTIONS.

Exceptions will not be entered in a settled bill of exceptions, where the evidence as to their having been taken is conflicting, and the trial court has refused to enter them.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Kern county.

L. A. Scott was convicted of crime, and appeals, and petitions to include certain exceptions in settled bill of exceptions. Denied.

J. W. Ahern and W. A. Harris, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

PER CURIAM. This case is before us on a petition by appellant to have certain alleged exceptions included in a bill of exceptions which has been settled by the judge of the superior court, who refused to incorporate them in the bill. The matter was submitted here upon the petition, the answer of the judge, and certain affidavits filed by the parties. The alleged exceptions refer entirely to certain remarks claimed to have been made by counsel for the prosecution in his closing address to the jury; but the evidence as to whether there were any such exceptions is directly conflicting. Under these circumstances, we cannot hold that the superior judge erred or abused his discretion in not allowing the exceptions, nor would we be warranted in declaring here that they should be included in the bill. The petition is denied.

CLARK et al. v. NORDHOLT. (L. A. 442.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—PROBABLE CAUSE—PLEADING JUDGMENT.

1. Want of probable cause in instituting an action for $2,030, in which a judgment of $15 was obtained, is shown by an allegation in a complaint for malicious prosecution that in instituting it, and levying attachment therein, the plaintiff therein acted maliciously and without probable cause; the defendants therein not being indebted to him, except for the $15, which they had tendered to him, and had always been ready and willing to pay, to his knowledge, and which he had refused.

2. The provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 456, for pleading judgments, is not applicable to a cause litigated in a court of general jurisdiction; so that it is not necessary to set out the jurisdictional facts on which it rested, or allege that it was "duly given and made."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by T. M. Clark and another against W. F. Nordholt. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edgerton & Hickox, for appellant. Murphy & Gottschalk, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. The only question presented by this appeal relates to the sufficiency of the complaint to support the judgment. The action is one of malicious prosecution. It arises from a suit brought by defendant against plaintiffs upon an alleged indebtedness of $2,030, the issuance of a writ of attachment therein, and a levy upon these plaintiffs' goods to satisfy that demand. This defendant recovered a judgment in that action in the sum of $15. A general demurrer raises the question involved. It is claimed by appellant: (1) The first count of the complaint shows there was probable cause for the action. (2) The second count of the complaint shows there was probable cause for the action. (3) The first count of the complaint does not show that the action has been legally and finally determined in favor of respondents.

As to subdivision 1, the complaint alleges "that in instituting said action, and in securing said writ of attachment, and in having the attachment levied as hereinafter stated, the said Nordholt acted maliciously and without probable cause, and that these plaintiffs were not indebted to him in said amount of $2,030, or any other amount, excepting the sum of fifteen dollars, which they had tendered to him, and had always been ready and willing to pay, which was well known to said Nordholt, and the acceptance of which amount he had refused." This allegation of the complaint shows a want of probable cause.

As to subdivision 2, it is claimed that the allegation of the complaint as to the rendition of a judgment for $15 in favor of defendant conclusively shows probable cause in the bringing of the action by Nordholt. This count of the complaint also alleged "that in instituting said action, and procuring said writ of attachment, and in having said attachment levied as hereinafter stated, the said defendant, Nordholt, acted maliciously and without probable cause." It follows there is nothing in this contention. "If a person, having a good cause of action against another, willfully sue for a much greater amount than is due, and attach the property of the other, and put him to charges, he is liable." Weaver v. Page, 6 Cal. 681.

As to subdivision 3, it is claimed that the judgment in the prior action should have been pleaded, either by setting out the jurisdictional facts upon which it rested, or by alleging that it was "duly given and made." Section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the manner of pleading judgments, is not applicable to causes litigated and decided in courts of general jurisdiction. Weller v. Dickinson, 93 Cal. 108, 28 Pac. 854; Edwards v. Hellings, 99 Cal. 214, 33 Pac. 799; Rowe v. Blake, 112 Cal. 644, 44 Pac. 1084.

This is a frivolous appeal. The judgment is affirmed, and $50 damages added as a penalty.

HENSLEY v. RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 556.
(Sac. 322.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

RECLAMATION DISTRICT—ACTION AGAINST.

Action cannot be maintained against a reclamation district for injury cases by its negligence while bringing a "ditcher" onto plaintiff's land to construct a canal through it, no provision for action against it being made by Pol. Code, from which it derives whatever legal existence it has, and it having no property, and being given power to levy assessments against the lands within it and issue warrants only for the works of reclamation. Pol. Code, §§ 3456-3459.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by Mary A. Hensley against Reclamation District No. 556. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stearns & Elliott, for appellant. W. A. Gett, Jr., for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The court below sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and rendered judgment for defendant. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

It is averred that defendant is a corporation organized and existing "under and by virtue of the Political Code of the state of California, made and provided for the formation and organization of reclamation districts," and that plaintiff is the owner of a certain tract of land included within the district for the reclamation of which the defendant was organized. The gist of the alleged cause of action is that while the defendant was bringing a "ditcher" upon the land of plaintiff for the purpose of constructing a canal through said land, the defendant "negligently and carelessly cut through a levee upon said land of plaintiff, * * * and negligently and carelessly destroyed a certain trough or pump connected with the pumping plant of said plaintiff, * * * and thereby prevented said plaintiff from drawing off from said land the water which annually collected thereon during the wet season"; and that "by reason of such negligence of defendant" water collected and remained on said land, and destroyed a number of fruit trees, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $5,071.50. There is a second count in the complaint, but the cause of the alleged damage in both counts is that defendant in proceeding to take a dredger onto the land for the purpose of excavating the canal, negligently allowed the dredger to cut a levee, and thus injured a pumping plant of plaintiff so that she was afterwards unable to free her land from water by said pumping plant. The alleged damage does not seem to be consequential to the work which the defendant was engaged in, namely, making the canal, but was the result of a preliminary act, namely, taking the dredger to the place where the work of making the canal was to be done.

There is a great deal of discussion in the briefs about the responsibility of municipal corporations for damage done by the careless acts of their agents, but it does not seem to be necessary to consider those questions here. Reclamation districts have been organized in this state under various statutes, and the provisions of these statutes have differed materially from each other. In some of them much greater powers were given the district, and much greater liabilities imposed, than in others. This matter is quite fully discussed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Temple in People v. Reclamation Dist. No. 551, 117 Cal. 114, 48 Pac. 1016. In the case at bar the only averment pointing to the character, power, and liabilities of the respondent is that it was organized under the provisions of the Political Code. It is not necessary to determine whether or not districts formed under the Political Code can be properly called "corporations." They have been called "quasi public corporations." They are at least "public agencies." People v. Reclamation Dist. No. 551, 117 Cal. 121, 48 Pac. 1017. But, if considered corporations, they have only such powers and have only such liabilities as are prescribed by the law which creates them. They are not corporations organized under the provisions of the Civil Code. Their characters are determined by the provisions of the Political Code, from which they derive whatever legal existence they have. The law which creates them does not anywhere provide that they may be sued, and they can sue only for one purpose,—that is, to collect assessments. There is no provision for perpetual succession, and there are only two or three usual powers of a corporation granted them. If a judgment against a district could be enforced at all, it could be enforced only as against individual owners of land in the district, many of whom are brought into the district against their will; for a district may be formed upon petition of only one-half of the landholders within it. The district has no property out of which a judgment could be satisfied. It is in its essential character a mere agency. Now, it is admitted by appellant that, "if a judgment cannot be collected, it is idle for the court to entertain the action"; and it is quite apparent that in this case no judgment against the respondent could be collected. As before stated, it has no property, and it could obtain means to satisfy a judgment only by levying assessments upon the lands of the district. But it has no power to levy assessments for that purpose. It is given power to levy assessments and issue warrants for one purpose only, namely, "for the works of reclamation." Pol. Code, §§ 3456-3459. Neither its trustees nor its commissioners could be compelled by mandamus to levy assessments to pay such a judgment as is prayed for in the case at bar. This view is determinative of the case against the appellant, and it is not necessary to notice other questions discussed by counsel. Whether or not appellant would have a cause of action against individuals for the alleged acts of negligence complained of is a question which does not here arise. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

JOINT DEMURRER—ASSIGNMENT.

2. Where four persons jointly interested in a venture place checks received therefrom in a bank with the understanding that it shall collect the same, and pay one-fourth of the proceeds to each of such persons, an assignment by one of the four of his interest to a stranger is good as against another of the four to whom he is indebted.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by David Hirshfeld against A. Weill and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. Ahern, for appellants. T. M. McNamara, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal presents questions arising upon a judgment roll not containing a bill of exceptions. There are many defendants in the action, and they filed a joint demurrer, claiming that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also claiming that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. The general demurrer being joint, if a cause of action be stated against any of the defendants it was properly overruled. Azevedo v. Orr, 100 Cal. 293, 34 Pac. 777. The court there said: "So, also, a joint demurrer by all of the defendants must be overruled if the complaint is good against either of them." It is here conceded that a cause of action is stated against some of the defendants. Again, in speaking of a misjoinder of parties defendant, the court in the above case said: "A complaint is not necessarily defective in which there is united with some defendants another against whom no liability is alleged or recovery sought, and an order overruling a demurrer for misjoinder of parties defendant does not constitute a reversible error if it can be seen that the rights of the parties have not been prejudiced." We deem it plain that no rights of the defendants have been prejudiced by the action of the trial court in overruling the demurrer to the complaint as to a misjoinder of parties.

Weill & Alexander (partners), Elliott, Davis, and Miller were jointly interested in a business venture, from which was received, as proceeds thereof, various checks, drafts, bills, and notes. As to the disposition of these evidences of indebtedness, etc., the trial court made the following finding of fact: "That by and with the consent of the defendants John A. Miller and T. J. Davis, and for the mutual benefit of the said John A. Miller, T. J. Davis, Weill & Alexander, and E. E. Elliott, the said drafts, orders, notes, and due bills were received from said tenants by the defendants Weill & Alexander and E. E. Elliott, and by them placed in the custody and possession of the defendant the Kern Valley Bank for collection, with the understanding that the said Kern Valley Bank should collect the same, and from the proceeds thereof pay" expenses of collection and certain other named indebtedness, and out of the surplus "pay to the defendants Weill & Alexander one-quarter share thereof, to the defendant John A. Miller one-quarter share thereof, and to the defendant T. J. Davis one-quarter share thereof." The court further found that the bank accepted the trust, made the collections, paid the amount due as expenses of collection and the other named indebtedness, and held a surplus of $3,751.92, one-half of which it refused, upon demand, to pay this plaintiff, assignee of Davis and Miller. Both Davis and Miller were indebted to Weill & Alexander at the time they assigned their interest in the fund to this plaintiff; and it is now claimed that this indebtedness of Davis and Miller should be allowed in favor of Weill & Alexander, and that plaintiff's interest in the fund held by the bank should be reduced to that extent. We are unable to call to mind any principle of law that would justify such application of the fund. It is not Weill & Alexander who own or control the fund held by the bank. Again, they are not indebted to Davis and Miller, the assignors of plaintiff. These owners of the fund all stand alike, and the bank is the party holding the fund, and bound to pay it to the parties entitled, as theretofore agreed upon. The court below has taken this view of the litigation, and upon these facts has rendered a money judgment against the bank alone. It necessarily follows that the indebtedness of Davis and Miller to Weill & Alexander could not be set off in this action. They had no valid claim against Weill & Alexander, and, consequently, held nothing against which Weill & Alexander's claim against them might be set off. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

THOMSON v. THOMSON. (S. F. 1175.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

DIVORCE—FINDINGS ON DEFAULT JUDGMENT—DESERTION—TIME FOR COMMENCING ACTION.

1. Findings of fact and law, where the judgment is rendered on default, are unnecessary, and form no part of the judgment roll (Code Civ. Proc. § 670), and hence cannot be considered on appeal.

2. A complaint for divorce filed April 1, 1895, charged desertion without cause, and against plaintiff's will, and without his consent, prior to February 1, 1894. The action was not defended, and the trial court found that all the material allegations of the complaint were sustained by competent evidence. Held, that a finding that the action was barred by Civ. Code, § 124, subd. 3, providing that when desertion is charged the divorce will not be granted when there is an unreasonable lapse of time before the commencement of the action, was erroneous, since section 125 defines unnecessary delay as such as establishes the presumption of collusion, condonation, or acquiescence, all of which are negatived by the complaint.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by David Thomson against Sarah Thomson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. W. Davidson, for appellant.

BRITT, C. Action for divorce, begun April 1, 1895. Plaintiff alleged in his complaint, among other things: "That prior to the 1st day of February, 1894, the defendant * * * willfully and without cause deserted and abandoned the plaintiff, and ever since and still continues so to willfully and without cause desert and abandon said plaintiff, and to live separate and apart from him, without any reason, and against his will, and without his consent." The defendant did not answer the complaint, or otherwise appear in the action. In the judgment it was recited that the cause was heard upon the complaint "and upon the proofs herein taken, from which it appears that all the material allegations of the complaint are sustained by testimony free from all legal exceptions as to its competency, admissibility, and sufficiency"; whereupon the court denied a divorce "on the ground that said action is barred by reason of the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 124 of the Civil Code of California." The paper entitled "Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law," printed in the transcript, on which appellant lays much stress in argument, cannot be considered. As there was no answer, findings were unnecessary, and form no part of the judgment roll. Code Civ. Proc. § 670; Murray v. Murray, 115 Cal. 266, 47 Pac. 37. But, in our opinion, the determination of the court is at variance with the facts recited in the judgment. The said subdivision 3 of section 124, Civ. Code, provides that a divorce must be denied in actions on the ground of desertion (among others) when there is an unreasonable lapse of time before the commencement of the action. Section 125, following, defines unreasonable lapse of time to be such delay as establishes the presumption of connivance, collusion, or condonation of the offense, or full acquiescence in the same, with intent to continue the marriage relation notwithstanding the commission of the offense. Now, connivance and collusion imply consent to the act complained of. Civ. Code, §§ 112, 114; 2 Bish. Mar., Div. & Sep. §§ 203, 250. Acquiescence is consent by silence; condonation is forgiveness, and is revoked when the condonee commits the offense anew. Civ. Code, § 121. None of these matters of defense could co-exist with the facts alleged by plaintiff that defendant deserted him, and still continues such desertion, without cause, and against his will, and without his consent; which allegation is shown by the recitals of the judgment to have been well proved. Hence it appears that the plaintiff established his case, and the judgment denying the relief he claimed was erroneous, and is not helped by the reason assigned therein. It should therefore be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county.

Action by A. M. Bixby against S. S. Crafts and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. D. Soward, for appellant. F. D. Wehe and S. B. Davidson, for respondents.

BRITT, C. On February 4, 1880, plaintiff transferred in pledge to defendant S. S. Crafts certain shares of stock in the Hope Mining Company, a corporation, as security to Crafts for past and future advances of cash and merchandise had and to be had of him by plaintiff. On August 1, 1895, said mining company entered into a contract with defendant F. W. Page, whereby the latter obtained the option to purchase all the company's property within the period of 18 months, upon terms specified in the contract. Crafts and other holders of the company's stock ratified such contract, and agreed, on the consummation thereof by Page, to convey to him their several holdings of stock, the certificates of which they deposited in escrow pending the exercise of Page's option. Plaintiff commenced this action on November 13, 1895. In his amended complaint (to which said corporation was made a party defendant) he averred, among other things, that he waives "the tort of defendant S. S. Crafts in so executing the aforesaid agreement, and elects to treat such contract and deposit of the aforesaid stock in escrow as binding upon himself, save and except that his rights thereunder be protected by a decree of this court." He prayed that an account be taken to determine the amount due from him to Crafts; that any balance found due be paid by Page out of money to become payable from him under said contract with the Hope Mining Company; and that he (the plaintiff) be subrogated to the rights of Crafts therein. There was a cross complaint by Crafts, to which pleading plaintiff answered. By its judgment the court ascertained the amount due from plaintiff to Crafts, and decreed that plaintiff be allowed to redeem his stock by paying such amount within 90 days; otherwise that the stock be sold by the sheriff to raise the same, balance of the proceeds of sale, if any, to be paid to plaintiff, any dividends accruing meanwhile to be used in effecting redemption, and plaintiff to receive any excess thereof.

On appeal it is argued that by the contract with Page, and by depositing the certificate of stock in escrow, Crafts converted the stock, and so lost his lien as pledgee. Civ. Code, § 2910. But plaintiff seems to overlook the fact that by his pleading he waived the tort of Crafts in this behalf (if tort there was), and elected to treat the contract with Page as one Crafts had authority to make. It is said also that Crafts' account against plaintiff was barred by the statute of limitations, and hence that his lien on the stock was lost. Civ. Code, § 2911. It is sufficient reply to say that plaintiff did not in his answer to the cross complaint, or elsewhere, plead the bar of the statute. Plaintiff further complains that the court did not subrogate him to the right of Crafts under the contract with Page; but by redeeming the stock, as allowed by the judgment, he would become entitled as holder thereof to his proportionate part of all the benefits derived by the corporation from the contract with Page, and Crafts was entitled to nothing more than that. It is not perceived how plaintiff could have any other subrogation. The judgment fully protected the rights of plaintiff, and should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

WILSON v. DONALDSON et al. (Sac. 468.)

CHattel MORTGAGES—LABORER'S LIEN—PRIORITY.

A chattel mortgage on growing crops, for money used for seed and plowing, takes precedence over laborer's lien for harvesting, there being no other statutory provision as to priority than that, "other things being equal, different liens * * * have priority according to the time of their creation."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by Ellen M. Wilson against William Donaldson and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant C. L. Donaldson appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Mutter and W. A. Gett, Jr., for appellant. Albert M. Johnson, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Respondent, owning a certain tract of land, leased it to defendant William Donaldson for a share of the crop as rent, to be delivered in the sack to her. He also gave her a chattel mortgage upon all his interest in the growing crop to secure a then existing indebtedness. William Donaldson hired appellant, C. L. Donaldson, to harvest the crop at an agreed price of one dollar per acre. The grain was harvested under this contract, and upon the completion of the work this appellant took possession of 250 sacks of the grain, claiming a lien thereon to the extent of his contract price for the labor performed. Respondent claims the property under her chattel mortgage, execut and recorded before the grain was ready for harvesting.

Appellant contends that he is entitled to a lien upon the grain by virtue of sections 3051 and 3052 of the Civil Code, which relate to statutory liens created when labor is performed upon personal property under the various circumstances there enumerated. Upon principle, Douglass v. McFarland, 92 Cal. 636, 28 Pac. 687, to some extent at least, supports the right of appellant, Donaldson, to claim a lien upon the grain for his labor under the circumstances we have detailed. For the purposes of the case, it may be conceded that he is entitled to a lien. Such concession being made, the important question at once presents itself, does this statutory laborer's lien of Donaldson take priority over the lien created by the chattel mortgage? An examination of the authorities upon the question from the various states of the Union discloses a conflict of judicial opinion. A well-considered case upholding the priority of the statutory or laborer's lien may be found in Case v. Allen, 21 Kan. 217. But the great weight of authority is the other way. Pingrey, Chat. Mortg. §§ 730, 731; Jones, Liens, § 691; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 472; Storms v. Smith, 137 Mass. 201; Ingalls v. Vance, 61 Vt. 582, 18 Atl. 452; Hanch v. Ripley, 127 Ind. 151, 26 N. E. 70. It is well said in the case last cited: "As the agister's lien depends alone upon the statute, it can have no greater force than the statute gives; and as the legislature has, as we have said, manifested no intention of giving to it superiority over other liens, it can have none." In the absence of the statute, the appellant would have no lien whatever. All his rights come from the statute, and therefore must be weighed and limited by the statute. If the legislature had desired to give such lien claimants a priority over contract liens, it was an easy thing to have said so. And a declaration to that effect, not violative of constitutional rights, might be in line with a sound public policy. But here there is no such declaration, and it is not for the courts to ingraft such an amendment upon the law.

We have in this state a legislative declaration as to priority of liens in general which reads as follows: "Other things being equal, different liens upon the same property have priority according to the time of their creation, except in cases of bottomry and respondentia." Civ. Code, § 2897. It may well be said that "other things" are equal in this case. If not equal, then they preponderate largely in favor of the chattel mortgage. This is no question of balancing existing equities between the chattel mortgagor and the chattel mortgagee, but a question of equities between the chattel mortgagee and a third party,—a stranger,—and such equities are all in favor of the chattel mortgagee. We find none in favor of the third party, the statutory lien claimant. The chattel mortgagee gave full value for her right of lien, and was first in point of time. She notified all the world of her rights, and warned the world to deal with the property at their peril. She made a contract expressly authorized by the law, and did all that the law demanded of her in order to preserve the fruits of her contract. No court of equity can suggest a single defect in her conduct. Upon the other hand, this appellant, with full knowledge of the existence of the chattel mortgage, contracted to harvest the crop. He did this voluntarily, and if he suffers loss by such conduct it is his own fault. It was a matter of choice upon his part to do the work, and he assumed the risk of losing his share when he entered into the contract. To be sure, his labor may have been necessary for the preservation of the crop. At the same time it may be said that the chattel mortgage lien was occasioned by the advance of money to furnish the seed and plow the ground. If the words "other things" found in the statute quoted refer to equities (which we do not decide), then it may readily be seen that those words furnish no comfort to appellant.

It would seem that a great number of the cases cited from other states, tending to support appellant's contention as to the priority of a statutory lien over a contract lien, may be distinguished from the principle we deem controlling in this state. In many jurisdictions where these decisions are found a chattel mortgage carries with it title to the property and the immediate right of possession. In this state there is no such law, either as to the title or the right of possession. As the law stands in those states, the mortgagor by consent retaining possession of the property, the courts seem to hold that repairs necessary for its preservation, when ordered by the mortgagor in possession, being made upon the mortgagee's property, are deemed in equity to be made at his request. It may be said that in such cases the question is hardly one of priority of liens. The remaining contention relied upon by appellant has no substantial merit. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. HARTER et al. (Sac. 363.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1893.)
WATERS—RIGHT TO APPROPRIATE—CONVEYANCES —INJUNCTION—PLEADING—JUDGMENT—FINDINGS —DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—APPEAL—RECORD—REVIEW.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 526, providing that an injunction may be granted where defendant is doing some act in violation of plaintiff's rights, a complaint alleging ownership and right to use the waters of certain springs, and defendant's interference therewith, states a cause of action.

2. Where defendants in an action for diversion of a water flow admit the diversion, and set up a claim of right to use the water on land farmed by them jointly, a finding that defendants jointly caused the diversion is not necessary to support a joint judgment against them.

3. In an action for the wrongful diversion of waters, the court found that plaintiff was the owner of the waters, and that defendants had diverted same to their own lands, depriving plaintiff of their use. Held, that a finding that the diversion was wrongful was unnecessary.

4. An occupant of public land, without title, may, by use of the waters from springs on adjoining public land, acquire a right to their use as against subsequent purchasers of the land on which such springs are situated.

5. In a controversy over the ownership of waters from springs, a deed was introduced purporting to convey "one certain water ditch out of M. creek," and "also a certain water ditch taken from a tributary to M. creek, and taken out of said creek." The springs were tributaries of M. creek, having channels leading thereto; and the ditch connected the two channels, and ran thence to the land where the water was used. This ditch was in use, carrying waters, when the conveyance was made. Held, that the deed sufficiently described the ditch carrying the waters from the springs.

6. Where a water right has been acquired by means of a ditch used in carrying it, a conveyance of the ditch is a conveyance of the water right.

7. In an action for the wrongful diversion of waters, it appeared that the water was necessary for raising hay on plaintiff's land. During the time of the diversion, plaintiff's hay crop was from 50 to 100 tons short, and hay was worth $4 to $5 a ton. Held, that a verdict of $200 was not excessive.

8. A finding based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

9. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1849, providing that the declaration of a grantor, made while holding title, shall be evidence against the grantee, declarations as to the extent of his title made by a grantor prior to the conveyance are admissible.

10. In a controversy over water rights, testimony that, subsequent to the acquisition of plaintiff's right to use the water, a third person filed on the land where the waters were situated, and conveyed his rights to defendant, is immaterial.

11. Testimony that a third person would not have purchased certain lands unless plaintiff's predecessor made certain representations as to his right to waters thereon is hearsay and inadmissible.

12. Where a witness is erroneously asked whether certain statements were made in his presence, and he denies it, the error is harmless.

13. Where defendants claim that, because of representations made by plaintiff's predecessor as to his right to use certain waters, plaintiff is estopped to claim the right to such use, testimony that prior thereto, in a conversation with plaintiff's predecessor concerning such water rights, defendants made no such claim, is competent.

14. An objection that a new trial was arbitrarily denied without a hearing cannot be raised on appeal by affidavit printed in the transcript, but must be made by exception incorporated in a settled bill of exceptions.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Williams, as executrix of the last will of George E. Williams, deceased, against George Harter and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Spencer & Clark, for appellants. J. D. Goodwin and D. W. Jenks, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. George E. Williams died testate in the county of Modoc in 1891, owning a large tract of land in that county. His will was duly admitted to probate, and Mary E. Williams, his surviving wife, was appointed executrix thereof. As such executrix, she brought this action to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants from diverting water from the said lands, and also to recover damages for past diversions. It is alleged in the complaint that the estate of said decedent now owns and occupies, and it and its grantors and predecessors have owned and occupied for more than 20 years last past, a large tract of land in Modoc county, known as the "Williams Ranch," and which is particularly described. The complaint also describes two certain springs of water, their location and capacity, and a ditch leading therefrom, which it is alleged diverts and conveys all of the water of said springs to and upon said land, where the same is used for irrigation, for the watering of stock, and for domestic purposes, and has been so used by plaintiff's testator and his grantor for the last 20 years or more, when not prevented from so doing by defendants. It is further alleged that the grantor of plaintiff's testator, one J. N. Stone, constructed the said ditch, and thereby diverted and appropriated, and acquired a right to, all the waters of both of said springs, in the year 1871, and that he conveyed all his rights thereto to said testator in the year 1877. It is also alleged that within the year before filing the complaint, which was on August 25, 1891, the defendants entered upon plaintiff's said dams and ditch, at sundry points, and broke and destroyed the same, and placed dams in said ditch, and have thereby diverted the waters of said springs from plaintiff's ditch, and deprived her of the use thereof, and threaten to continue so to do, to her damage, etc. The defendants filed separate demurrers to the complaint, which were overruled, and then filed a joint answer denying all its material averments, except as to the diversion of the water, and setting up title in themselves to the waters of the said springs—First, by prescription; second, as owners of the riparian lands; and, third, by estoppel. The case was tried, and the court found all the facts in favor of the plaintiff, and gave judgment in her favor, granting the injunction as prayed for, and awarding damages in the sum of $200. From that judgment, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal.

1. We think the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and to entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded, and the court therefore did not err in overruling the demurrers. The facts showing plaintiff's ownership and right to the possession and use of the waters of the said springs, and the interference with that right by defendants, are clearly and succinctly stated. And, if the averments in this regard were true,—and the demurrers admitted them to be so,—then a case was made clearly entitling plaintiff to an injunction and to damages against both defendants, as they appear to have acted jointly and in concert in committing the wrongs complained of. Code Civ. Proc. § 526.

2. Appellants contend that the judgment entered against them jointly for $200 damages was not supported or justified by the findings, for the reason that there is no finding “that the defendants are jointly liable, or jointly committed the acts complained of,” or that the acts alleged to have been done by defendants “were done wrongfully or without right.” By their answer the defendants, in effect, admitted that they had diverted the waters of the said springs from the plaintiff’s ditch, and, to justify their acts in so doing, they set up a claim of ownership of the said waters in themselves, and a right to use the same “to irrigate their own land,” which they alleged they had “occupied and jointly farmed” during the last five years, being “jointly interested in said lands and crops thereon, and the whole thereof.” This clearly implies that the diversion was by concert of action on the part of defendants, and no special finding to that effect was necessary. The court found that plaintiff was the owner of all the water flowing from said springs, and that defendants committed the acts charged, in depriving her of the use thereof. This being so, a finding that the acts were done wrongfully or without right would have been quite superfluous.

3. Appellants contend that none of the findings of the court, 14 in number, except those numbered 2 and 3, which simply describe the location of the said springs, and the natural channels leading therefrom to Montgomery creek, were justified by the evidence. After carefully reviewing the evidence, which, with the exhibits, covers about 200 pages of the printed transcript, we conclude that there was evidence sufficient to justify all the findings complained of. It is true that on most of the issues raised there was a conflict in the evidence, but that cannot be considered here. It appears that all of the lands now owned by plaintiff and defendants were public lands of the United States in 1871–72. The springs arose on the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of a certain section 24; and the defendants’ grantor, one Cowins, made application to purchase the same, with other lands, in March, 1880, under the desert land act, made full payment in November, 1882, and received a government patent therefor in August, 1890. Finding 1 is: “That ever since the spring of 1871 plaintiff and her grantor of the ditches and water rights hereinafter mentioned, and her testator, have continuously occupied the southeast quarter of section 12” in the township in which the said section 24 is situated, and at the time this action was commenced she and her said testator had owned the said quarter section, and during all of said time had used the same for raising crops of hay, grain, and vegetables thereon, and that irrigation thereof was necessary to the growing of such crops. It is objected that Stone did not convey this quarter section to Williams, and the latter never acquired title thereto until May, 1884, and that there is no evidence that they made use of the land, or raised crops of hay, grain, and vegetables thereon, until after the title thereto was obtained. Counsel say: “It is clear from the evidence that plaintiff’s testator had no right to the use of the land until 1884. What use he made of it, if any, up to this time, was unlawful.” There was evidence that both Stone and Williams cultivated the said land, and raised crops thereon, before 1884, and their use of the land was not unlawful. All public lands are open to occupation and settlement by citizens of the United States, and the law is settled that the water flowing from springs on public lands may be diverted to other public lands, and there used for irrigation or other necessary purposes, and a right to the same acquired, as against any one who subsequently obtains title to the land on which the springs are situated. De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. 563, and 22 Pac. 198; Ely v. Ferguson, 91 Cal. 187, 27 Pac. 587. Findings 4 and 5 are in regard to the construction of the ditches by Stone in 1871–72, the diversion and appropriation of the waters of the springs through and by means of the same, the continued use thereof afterwards by Stone and his grantee, and the present use by plaintiff of the said ditches, and of all the water flowing from said springs. It would subserve no useful purpose to set out the evidence, of which there was a large amount, bearing upon the facts found, but we think it must be held sufficient to justify the conclusions of the court. Conceding, however, that Stone had a good title to this water, it is claimed that plaintiff failed to connect herself with his title, and cannot, therefore, have the benefit of it. Counsel say: “The deed to a ditch and water right offered in evidence by plaintiff doesn’t purport or intend to convey any ditch or water right, as counsel have attempted to prove in this case,” and that “the deed is irrelevant and immaterial for the reason that there is no allegation in plaintiff’s complaint to support it.” The deed referred to purports to convey by quitclaim “one certain water ditch taken out of Montgomery creek, on the west side of said creek,” etc. “Also, one certain water ditch, taken from a tributary of Montgomery creek, and taken out of said creek,” etc. The springs were tributaries of Montgomery creek, having well-defined channels leading thereto, and, so far as appears, were the only tributaries of that creek. The ditch in controversy was constructed from the channel of one of the springs to the channel of the other, and thence to the lands where the water was used, and it is not shown that there was any other ditch leading from said tributaries. Stone owned an interest in the Montgomery creek ditch, and in the ditch leading from the channels of the springs, and it does not appear that he owned any interest in any other ditch or ditches. The ditch from the springs was in use by Stone, conveying the waters thereof to his lands, when the deed was made; and, upon the execution of the deed, Williams took possession of the ditch and water, and used them continuously thereafter until interrupted by defendants. Looking at all the evidence, therefore, we think it sufficiently appears that Stone intended to, and did, by his deed, convey this spring ditch to Williams. But it is claimed that the deed only purports to convey the ditch, and not any right to the waters of the springs, and therefore Williams acquired thereby no interest in the waters flowing from the springs. The answer to this claim is obvious. If Stone owned the ditch, and by means of it had appropriated and acquired a right to the waters of the springs, then the waters were incidental or appurtenant to the ditch, and a conveyance of the ditch carried with it the water right. Findings 6 and 7 are in regard to the diversion of the water from plaintiff's ditch by defendants, and the damage resulting therefrom. It is claimed that finding 6 was not justified because it was not shown that defendants jointly did the acts charged, but that point has already been sufficiently disposed of. And it is claimed that finding 7 was not justified, because the damages allowed the plaintiff were excessive. There was evidence that this water was necessary for the successful raising of hay on plaintiff's land, that defendants turned the water away from plaintiff's land during the irrigation season of 1891, that her hay crop was short that season from 50 to 100 tons, and that it was worth from \$4 to \$5 per ton. If this was so,—and the court must have believed it,—it cannot be successfully claimed that \$200 was an excessive sum to be allowed as damages. Findings 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 are in regard to the adverse use of the waters of said springs by the defendants and their grantors, and the statutes of limitation pleaded by defendants. In view of the evidence, we think there can be no plausible pretense that defendants had acquired by adverse user any right to the waters of the springs, against the plaintiff, or that her cause of action was barred by the statutes of limitation; and therefore no further discussion of these points is called for. Finding 14 is in regard to the facts pleaded and attempted to be proved by defendants to show that plaintiff was estopped from claiming a right to the waters of said springs, by reason of the acts and statements of her testator at and about the time defendants purchased their lands from Cowins, in June, 1886. It is true that defendants introduced evidence tending to show facts which, if believed, would have established an estoppel, but these facts were squarely and positively contradicted by evidence given on the other side. The court must have believed the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff to be true, and the judgment cannot, therefore, be disturbed on this ground.

4. At the trial 76 exceptions to the rulings of the court were reserved by defendants, but less than one-half of them are discussed or referred to by counsel, and the others will therefore not be noticed. Twelve of the exceptions are based upon the admission of evidence relating to the diversion of the water from plaintiff's land by defendants, and the damages caused thereby to plaintiff by reason of her diminished crop of hay in 1891. There is no dispute that good crops of hay could not be raised on plaintiff's land without water to irrigate it, and she was clearly entitled to recover such damages as she sustained by reason of the wrongful diversion of the water. What that damage was, if any, could only be determined from the testimony of witnesses who had familiarly known the land and the crops raised thereon in prior years, and also the condition of the crop, and the market value thereof, raised in 1891. The witnesses gave testimony as to all the requisite facts, and it was quite sufficient to show that the damage caused was as large at least as the sum fixed by the court. Without reviewing separately the several rulings complained of, we deem it enough to say that we see in them no reversible error. Exceptions 21, 22, and 30 are based upon the admission of evidence as to declarations made by Cowins, defendants' grantor, while he was the owner and in possession of the land on which the said springs are located, relating to the ownership and right to use the waters of the springs and the ditches leading therefrom. That the evidence was admissible is not now a debatable question. Our Code provides: "Where, however, one derives title to real property from another, the declaration, act or omission of the latter, while holding the title, in relation to the property, is evidence against the former." Code Civ. Proc. § 1849. And the rule upon the subject is thus stated by Field, J., in Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 148: "That such declarations of the grantor are admissible, not only as against himself, but against parties claiming under him, is a familiar principle. The subsequent claimants are considered as standing in his place, and as having taken the title cum onere, subject to the same charges and restrictions which attached to it in his hands. It matters not whether the declarations relate to the limits of the party's own premises, or to the extent of his neighbor's, or to the bound-any line between them, or to the nature of the title he asserts. If their purport is to restrict his own premises, or lessen his own title, they are admissible." See, also, Bollo v. Navarro, 33 Cal. 459; People v. Blake, 60 Cal. 497; Sharp v. Blankenship, 79 Cal. 411, 21 Pac. 842. Exceptions 42 to 47, inclusive, are based upon the admission in evidence of plaintiff's title papers. The objections were that the papers were irrelevant and immaterial; and all that is said in support of them is that the objections should have been sustained, and the court erred in overruling them. We think the rulings were proper, and nothing further need be said of them here. Exception 48 is based upon the denial by the court of defendants' motion to strike out testimony. The motion was made near the close of plaintiff's testimony in chief, and was as follows: "We now move to strike out the testimony of the witnesses with reference to Stone's use of the water or the use of the land on the one hundred and sixty acres west of the Williams house," etc., "on the ground that it is irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, there being no connection shown between Stone and Williams. No transfer or no title having passed from Stone to Williams there, his use or occupancy of that land cannot go to their benefit." It is not clear what was meant by this motion, as the court was asked to strike out the testimony relating to the use of the water "or" the use of the land. If, however, the theory was, as it would seem to have been, that all the testimony relating to Stone's use of the water should be stricken out, because it was used by him on government land, which he never acquired title to, and never conveyed to Williams, then, as we have already seen, the theory was unsound, and the testimony sought to be stricken out was relevant, material, and competent. Exceptions 57 and 58 are based upon rulings of the court excluding certain evidence. Thomas Montgomery was a witness for defendants, and was asked by their counsel: "State whether or not you ever made any filing on that desert land where the springs are." The question was objected to as immaterial unless defendants were connected with it. Counsel then stated: "I propose to show, and offer to show, that Thomas Montgomery in 1877 filed upon this desert land upon which the springs rise; that he laid claim to the land, made use of the land, made use of the waters thereon; that he transferred what interest he had to Dalton, and Dalton to Cowins, and Cowins to defendants in this action." And again: "I offer to prove, with documents I have here now, and wish to offer, that Thomas Montgomery in 1877 filed upon this land upon which these springs rise, and used it, and used the water of these springs upon that land." This offered evidence was rejected, and hence the said two exceptions. The defendants had already put in evidence a deed from Montgomery to Dalton, from Dalton to Cowins, and from Cowins to defendants, conveying to them certain adjacent land, and all water rights connected therewith, which Montgomery had owned; but in the deeds no mention was made of the said desert land. The witness had also testified, without objection, as to his occupancy of the said desert land, and the use he had made of the springs thereon. It had also been shown that Cowins filed upon the land on which the said springs rise in March, 1880, and made final payment therefor in November, 1882. Under the circumstances shown, then, Stone having already appropriated the waters of the springs, whether Montgomery filed on the land or not was evidently immaterial. Exception 59 is based upon the refusal of the court to permit J. P. Harter to answer this question: "State to the court whether or not there would have been a purchase of that place if Williams had not told you to the contrary." George Harter, and not the witness, was the purchaser of the place; and the latter could not, therefore, be presumed to know, unless by hearsay, whether there would have been any purchase or not. The material question on this point was, what did Williams represent to George Harter as to the title to this water? As to this, the witness, without objection, had testified fully; and he also stated the damage George Harter would sustain if deprived of the water. Besides, George Harter, the only one competent to answer the question, testified fully upon this point, and defendants thereby obtained all the information asked for. There was evidently, therefore, no reversible error in this ruling. Exceptions 60 to 63, inclusive, are based upon the rulings of the court in allowing questions to be propounded to the witness J. P. Harter, on cross-examination, as to whether, in his presence, George Harter made certain statements to Williams in regard to the ownership of the waters in controversy. It was objected that the questions were not proper cross-examination, and it is claimed that the rulings in allowing them were therefore erroneous. A sufficient answer to this point is that the witness denied that any such statements as those suggested to him were made by George Harter. Clearly, therefore, the defendants were not prejudiced by the question, even if improper. Exceptions 74, 75, and 76 are based on the testimony of D. W. Jenks, given in rebuttal, detailing certain conversations held between the Harters and Williams, in the office of the witness, in relation to this water dispute. On cross-examination the attention of each of the Harters had been called to those conversations, and an effort made to have them state them in substance. The purpose of Jenks' testimony is clear. It was to show that at that time, as disclosed by the conversation, there was no claim or pretense that Williams had misrepresented his title to this water, or that he had estopped himself from asserting his title. The importance and materiality of the testimony are evident, and it was clearly admissible.

5. The point is made that the judge of the court below, before whom the motion for new trial was heard, arbitrarily denied the motion, without hearing or considering the grounds presented and urged in support thereof. To sustain this point, two affidavits, made ten days after the motion was denied, are printed in the transcript, and there is also found there a counter affidavit made still later. These affidavits form no part of the record, and cannot be considered. If the defendants desired to have the matter brought before this court for review, they should at the time have excepted to the action of the court, and had the facts embodied and settled in a bill of exceptions. Besides, the real and only question is, did the court err in denying the motion? We find in the record no valid ground for reversal, and advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

(121 Cal. 74)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

CORPORATIONS—AGENCY—EXTENT OF LIABILITY—EVIDENCE—ACCOUNT BOOKS—RELEASE
—PLEADING—LIMITATIONS.

1. One occupying a position of trust is bound to exercise reasonable skill and diligence, and to act with the highest good faith, in the performance of his duties.

2. The by-laws of a corporation provided that the general manager should have charge of all the company's property, and control of all persons in its employ, with power to discharge them at will, and that he should cause regular and accurate accounts to be kept by a competent bookkeeper. Held, that the general manager was liable for funds misappropriated by the company's bookkeeper.

3. The books of a corporation, kept under the supervision of its general manager (it being his duty, under the by-laws, to cause a correct set of accounts to be kept), are admissible in an action by the corporation against him for neglect of his duties and embezzlement, both to prove his negligence and the amount of his liability.

4. Where books are introduced in evidence in an action by a corporation against its manager for defalcation and negligence, the corporation is not bound by their contents, but may introduce independent evidence of loss.

5. A schedule of summaries of the contents of books and records, made by an expert (the books and records themselves being voluminous, and covering the transactions of many years), is admissible.

6. It is not error, in stating an account, to use a schedule of summaries of the contents of books and records introduced in evidence, prepared by an expert; the schedule not being accepted as true, except where shown to be so by all the evidence.

7. Where employes of a corporation embezzled corporate funds, through the manager's negligence, and he himself misappropriated the corporation's property, the burden was on him to show that he was not liable for the total loss.

8. Where defective account books show a loss, they are prima facie evidence of the existence of such loss.

9. Through defendant's negligence, a bookkeeper of a corporation embezzled corporate funds. With the connivance of the same bookkeeper, defendant himself misappropriated property of the corporation, of which he was general manager. After discovery of the bookkeeper's defalcation, defendant, in the name of the corporation, but without its knowledge, commenced a suit against the bookkeeper, and obtained a judgment, which was satisfied. Held, that the recovery and satisfaction of the judgment did not release defendant.

10. The release of a joint tortfeasor is not available as a defense, unless pleaded by the party relying on it.

11. The statute of limitations does not begin to run against an agent, for misappropriation, until discovery by the principal of the defalcation.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by the San Pedro Lumber Company and others against Merick Reynolds and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

M. L. Graff, for appellants. S. M. White and R. H. F. Variel, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from the order denying defendants a new trial. The appeal from the judgment in the same case will be found reported in the 111th volume of our Reports, at page 588, and in 44 Pac. 309. In the opinion there delivered, the nature of the case, and many of the facts necessary to an understanding of this appeal are presented. Others will be set forth as occasion may demand for a full understanding of the questions.

The plaintiff corporation was engaged in the lumber business. Its legal residence and place of the meetings of its board of directors was the city of San Francisco. It owned and conducted a large lumber yard in San Pedro, and others in the different towns in the southern part of the state. The general manager of its business was the defendant Merick Reynolds. From the date of the incorporation of the company, in 1882, until October, 1889, Reynolds had occupied this position. His duties as such manager were regulated and prescribed by the ninth article of the by-laws, which reads as follows: "The manager or managers shall be appointed by the board of directors, and shall hold office during the pleasure of the board. It shall be the duty of the manager or managers, under the direction of the board of directors, to superintend, oversee, and direct the operations of the company outside of San Francisco. He or they shall have the immediate control, command, and direction of all the persons in the employ of the company outside of San Francisco. He or they shall have charge and custody of all the property of the company, real and personal, used or occupied in or about the company's premises outside of San Francisco. He or they shall cause to be kept regular and accurate accounts of all transactions in business of the company. All such accounts shall be kept by a competent bookkeeper. He or they shall monthly, and as often as the board shall direct, transmit to the secretary abstracts of his accounts, with the necessary vouchers. He or they shall have power to discharge or suspend any or all persons acting under his or their orders, and transact such other business as the board of directors may authorize. The manager or managers shall in all things, and at all times, comply with the directions or instructions given by the board of directors." The provisions of the by-laws were actually known to Reynolds. They entered into, and became a part of, his contract of employment. Society v. Wennerhold, 81 Cal. 528, 22 Pac. 920. In September, 1889, plaintiff corporation made claim to Reynolds that a large amount of money was due from him to it, arising from peculations, defalcations, embezzlements, and breaches of trust in his management of the corporate affairs. Reynolds, in response to the demand of the plaintiff that security should be given for the amount of its losses so incurred, which amount was at the time undetermined and undeterminable (for the examination of the books had not then been completed), made to Hooper, the president of the corporation, as its trustee, a written assignment and pledge of certain stock owned by him. This property was pledged "as security for the payment by the undersigned, Merick Reynolds, of all sums of money that are now due or owing from me to the San Pedro Lumber Company, a corporation, or which may hereafter, upon careful investigation of the books and affairs of said company, be found to be due or owing from me to the said corporation, or for the payment of which I may be liable, either in law or equity, to the said corporation, or for which I may be liable in any manner by reason of having been the agent or employé of said corporation"; authorizing the pledgee to hold or to sell the stock "for the payment of the aforesaid sums of money now due or owing as aforesaid, or hereafter ascertained to be due or owing." When its examination of the books had been completed, plaintiff brought its action to foreclose its lien upon the pledged stock. It averred that it had suffered losses by the embezzlements, defalcations, and improper conduct of the defendant to the amount of over $53,000; that the exact amount could not be determined without an accounting. It prayed for such an accounting, and for a sale of the stock, and a reimbursement from the proceeds of the sale in such amount as might be found due. This action was instituted after demand for payment had been made upon Reynolds. Defendants answered by denial, and by pleading a tender of $20,000 alleged to have been made to Hooper, which it is averred was the full amount of all possible demands of plaintiff against defendant Reynolds. By cross complaint they sought to recover damages for the full value of the stock, insisting that Hooper's refusal to accept the tender amounted to a conversion thereof. Upon the trial the court held the action to be one to foreclose the lien upon the pledged stock, to which foreclosure an account was a necessary incident. Notwithstanding the vast amount of labor involved in the stating of such an account, or perhaps because of it, the court declined to refer the matter, but retained it, heard the testimony, and itself stated the account, rendering judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $48,432.44.

Reynolds, as has been said, was the manager of the corporation, under the by-law above quoted. The principal place of business was at San Pedro, where Reynolds himself was located. It was the duty of the bookkeepers and employés in charge of the other lumber yards to report to the principal office, at San Pedro, where the general books and accounts of the plaintiff were kept. The principal bookkeeper was thus located at San Pedro, under the immediate direction and supervision of Reynolds. In 1886 one C. K. Drane became the bookkeeper at San Pedro, and continued to act as such until August 17, 1889, when he disappeared. He has not since been heard from, and his abiding place is unknown. Twelve days after his disappearance, Reynolds communicated with Hooper, in San Francisco; informing him of the disappearance of Drane, and of his belief that Drane was a defaulter. An examination of the books of the company was promptly instituted. This examination was made by C. F. Lutgen, an expert accountant and a witness upon the trial. At the time the examination was instituted the officers of the corporation seem to have entertained no thought that Reynolds was himself in any degree culpable. This conviction was soon brought home to them. After knowledge, they promptly charged Reynolds with dereliction in duty, and the abstraction of corporate funds. Reynolds, in several letters to the president of the corporation, confessed his wrongdoing, begged forgiveness, and promised restitution of all that the company had lost. To give but a single quotation, upon October 3, 1889, he writes: "Oh, Mr. Hooper, won't you forgive me my acts and permit this * * *. I see where I erred, and I beg and implore you, for the sake of the family I have, to be lenient with me. * * * I know you have great reason to be very much offended, and I am very much ashamed. Still, I beg you, overlook my fault. Permit me to repay. I did not realize at the time of my offense that I was acting in such bad faith to my best friends."

The first consideration which invites attention is that of the position which Merick Reynolds occupied in relation to the corporation, the duties which attached to that position, and the legal consequences which must follow a failure to perform those duties. Appellants challenge certain findings of the court making declarations in this regard, and contend that, as Reynolds was general manager, he was liable only for want of ordinary care in employing the bookkeeper, Drane; that Reynolds' position is like, and his responsibility the same as, that of a director of a corporation in his relation to the stockholders. The cases of Scott v. Depeyster, 1 Edw. Ch. 513, and Bank v. Caperton, 87 Ky. 306, 8 S. W. 885, are here cited. But the present is not an action by a stockholder against a director. The duties of Reynolds as manager are not identical with the duties of a director, and the cases are not in point. Reynolds was the agent of the corporation. In him were vested great powers, and upon him were cast grave responsibilities. His position was a position of trust, and, in the performance of that trust, he was required to exercise reasonable skill, diligence, and care, and to act in the highest good faith towards his principal. 1 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Prac. §§ 82, 83. The by-law above quoted became a part of Reynolds' contract of employment. It measured his powers, fixed his duties, and defined his responsibilities. He had immediate control of all the employes of the company outside of San Francisco, and could retain or discharge at his pleasure. It was his duty to cause to be kept regular and accurate accounts of all the transactions of the company by a competent bookkeeper, and he was to transmit monthly, or as often as the board directed, abstracts of accounts, with necessary vouchers. For his failure to exercise due care in regard to these matters he was responsible to his principal. But it is not merely with negligent omissions that he is charged. The case against him is not made up wholly, or even mainly, of averments and proofs that by reason of his negligence others in the employ of the company succeeded in embezzling its funds. The gravamen of the charges is that the defendant himself both connived at and procured numerous false entries in the books kept under his immediate supervision and direction by the bookkeeper, Drane, and that the falsification of these books was for Reynolds' own improper ends. It is charged that Reynolds himself knowingly and corruptly embezzled funds of the corporation, and concealed his peculations by an elaborate system of deceptive and fraudulent entries running through the books. It is true, the books were actually kept by Drane. It is true that Reynolds did not personally employ Drane.

He was sent to San Pedro as bookkeeper by Hooper, the president of the corporation. But these facts do not even tend to exonerate Reynolds in the matters charged. It clearly appears from the evidence that Reynolds dominated Drane, and frequently directed the making of false entries, whose effect was to advantage Reynolds alone, and not Drane. In many instances Drane could not have made the entries without himself knowing of their falsity. It is not surprising that, seeing his superior thus misappropriating the moneys of the company, Drane, while complacently aiding him in the work, should, when opportunity presented, have stolen upon his own account. For all of these thefts, Reynolds, under the terms of his employment, was chargeable. If he had given strict and upright attention to his duties, Drane's embezzlements could not have been successfully carried out. They were made possible by Reynolds' own frauds, and his wide departure from the lines of his duty. Being himself engaged in unlawful appropriations, and using Drane to conceal the acts, Reynolds was in no position to criticize, check, or expose the like acts of his confederate and assistant.

Plaintiff introduced in evidence, over the objection and exception of defendants, the books of the corporation. These books, while not in the handwriting of Reynolds, were under his immediate care and supervision, and he was responsible for their accurate keeping under his contract of employment. It is contended by appellants that the books were not admissible, and sundry arguments are advanced in support of the proposition. It is said that they should be treated as are treated the books of a tradesman,—admissible only if supported by independent evidence to their correctness, and then only as to the accounts of a tradesman with his customers; that these books, as was contended and shown by the prosecution, were not correctly kept, and that, therefore, they were inadmissible; that they were not used in establishing the account of the corporation against the customer; and that, therefore, they were inadmissible. Again, it is said that they were inadmissible against defendant Reynolds for any purpose; and herein the cases of Rudd v. Robinson, 126 N. Y. 113, 26 N. E. 1046, Scott v. Depuyster, supra, and Neilson v. Crawford, 52 Cal. 248, are relied upon. This last proposition depends entirely for its force upon the point heretofore considered; that is to say, upon the relationship which existed between the corporation and Reynolds, and the duty of Reynolds as manager. With Reynolds' duties thus defined, it will at once be seen that Rudd v. Robinson and Scott v. Depuyster are not at all in point. Those cases were similar. In Rudd v. Robinson the action was to charge one of the members of the corporation with a personal liability to the corporation. There was no proof that the defendant had actual knowledge of the entries contained in the books, or that he authorized the entries, or caused them to be made. "There was no proof from which the law would raise the legal presumption that he had knowledge of the entries, unless he was chargeable with such knowledge from the mere fact that he was a stockholder and trustee of the corporation. There is no rule of law which charges a director or stockholder of a corporation with actual knowledge of its business transactions, merely because he is such a director or stockholder. In this case the broad claim is made that, in an action by a corporation against one of its members to enforce a personal liability of the corporation, its books are competent evidence against him to show the different accounts between him and it, and to establish the extent of his liability to it, upon their simple production, and proof that they are the books kept as such by its officers and agents." The foregoing is a quotation from the opinion in Rudd v. Robinson. The distinction between that case and the one at bar becomes immediately apparent. Here the positive duty was cast upon Reynolds, not alone under the general laws of agency (Mechem, Ag. § 528), but expressly by the terms of his employment, to cause to be kept proper books of account. These books are offered by him to the corporation as containing an accurate and faithful record of his stewardship. In addition to being the corporation's books, they are the agent's accounts. They are statements—declarations—of the agent as to the manner in which he has transacted the business of his principal, and of the dispositions which he has made of the property intrusted to him. They are admissible against him, as are any declarations or admissions of a party going to a matter in issue. This proposition is expressly declared in Neilson v. Crawford, relied upon by appellants, where it is said: "In an action brought against the corporation itself for the recovery of a debt, the books of account kept by the corporation would be admissible in evidence, because they are the declarations and admissions of the corporation entered by its servants and under its control." So here the statements of the books were the declarations and admissions of Reynolds, entered by those over whom he exercised supervision and control. In Neilson v. Crawford it was held that, in an action brought by a creditor of a corporation to recover on the stockholder's liability for his proportion of an indebtedness to the corporation, the books of the corporation were not admissible in evidence in behalf of the plaintiff to prove the indebtedness; but in McGowan v. McDonald, 111 Cal. 57, 43 Pac. 418, a contrary rule is announced, and it is said that any evidence competent to establish the liability of the corporation would be competent to establish the liability of the stockholder. However, as has been said and shown, the case is not in point; for Reynolds, as agent, was charged with the duty of keeping and presenting to his principal correct accounts, and the accounts which he kept were admissible as prima facie evidence against him. 2 Whart. Ev. § 1333; Mechem, Ag. § 100; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 150-154.

Appellants' argument that plaintiff, having offered the books in evidence, is bound by them, may not be sustained. The books were offered for a twofold purpose: First, to show that the agent did not keep either strict or accurate accounts of his dealings with the property intrusted to him; and, second, for the distinct purpose of showing by the books, coupled with independent proof, that part of the property with the custody of which Reynolds was chargeable was not accounted for by him, and was not by him delivered to the possession of his principal. The first purpose (that is to say, the failure of the agent to keep accurate accounts) was established by the very introduction of the books. They spoke for themselves. Upon their face it could be seen and determined whether or not there were irregularities of double charges, overcharges, improper charges, or omitted charges. This did not amount to proof that the corporation had sustained loss, but it was direct proof that the agent had failed in his duty to keep, by the books, an accurate record or history of his dealings and transactions with the corporation's property. It is quite true that, since bookkeeping is only a history of transactions, a man does not lose money merely by faulty bookkeeping. This proposition, however, was fully realized, and frequently stated, by both court and counsel, during the trial of the cause. When, however, to the proof of faulty bookkeeping is added evidence from independent sources that large sums of money which would be due to the corporation under a correct statement of accounts were not in fact received by the corporation, then at once the duty is cast upon the trustee, not alone to explain the entries, but as well to account for the moneys.

The expert, Lutgen, when on the witness stand, presented certain schedules which he testified were summarizations of what the books showed. By these schedules appeared shortages and defalcations to the amount sued for. It is insisted by appellants that they were not admissible. In Burton v. Driggs, 20 Wall. 136, it is well said: "When it is necessary to prove the results of voluminous facts, or of the examination of many books and papers, and the examination cannot be conveniently made in court, the results may be proved by the person who made the examination. Here the object was to prove, not that the books did, but that they did not, show certain things. The results sought to be established were not affirmative, but negative. If such testimony be competent as to the former, a multo fortiori must it be so to prove the latter." Says

Greenleaf (1 Greenl. Ev. § 93): "A further relaxation of the rule has been admitted where the evidence is the result of voluminous facts, or of the inspection of many books and papers, the examination of which could not conveniently take place in court." Here the expert, Lutgen, was showing, by his schedules, not alone what the books did contain, but what they should have contained and did not contain. The records of accounts, with their vouchers, were most voluminous. It is said by the respondents that they would weigh a ton, and appellants concede that this estimate is not far from the truth. The transactions covered years in time, and millions of dollars in value. Lutgen was rigidly cross-examined as to the items composing his schedules, and their correctness was established. They were, therefore, unquestionably, admissible.

It is further said by appellants that the court accepted the estimates as shown by Lutgen's schedules, and charged defendants accordingly, and that this was error. Herein they rely upon and quote the case of Association v. Childs (Wis.) 33 Am. St. Rep. 57 (s. c. 52 N. W. 600), to the following effect: "In an action by a corporation against its president and treasurer to recover for losses alleged to have been sustained through their negligent and unauthorized acts, it is error for the trial court, without judicial examination as to its accuracy and justice, to adopt, as a basis of judicial action against the defendants, the report of an expert accountant employed by plaintiff to examine into its accounts, and ascertain the extent of such losses." We need not take issue with the law thus declared, for the facts are at entire variance with those in the present case. Here the court itself heard all the evidence, and stated its own account. All the books, papers, and vouchers were before it. Lutgen's schedules were no more than the summarization of the results of his expert examination of these accounts. The court did not accept them as true, saving as they were shown to be true by all the evidence. As a result of this patient hearing of a vast mass of testimony, and after a most laborious examination of the accounts made by itself, the court rendered a judgment, for a large amount, it is true, but not for the amount which it was contended by plaintiffs was properly chargeable against Reynolds.

Appellants admit that a large sum of money is due from Reynolds upon account of his embezzlements and improper charges. But it is insisted that the court erred in charging him with any other or greater amount than the sum of $15,312.74. It is further said that the evidence does not show that Reynolds ever received any greater amount than that mentioned; and it is suggested, and, indeed, argued, that the further sums going to make up the judgment, if lost to the corporation, were lost by the speculations of Drane, with which Reynolds was in no wise chargeable. Upon the part of the respondent it is answered that, having in view the duties of Reynolds under his trust, when it showed that he did not cause to be kept faithful and accurate accounts, the duty of an accounting was cast upon him; that when it further showed that, in specific instances, Reynolds had defrauded and despoiled the corporation, the burden of proof shifted to him to account for every dollar of its property which had passed into his possession; that it was only necessary, therefore, for the corporation to prove that a specific amount of money had been lost; it was the duty of Reynolds to satisfactorily explain what had become of it, and, if he failed so to do, he was chargeable with it. This argument is certainly sound. It was not necessary for the corporation to prove that all of the money had been abstracted and embezzled by Reynolds. It was for him to show what had become of it. Aside from the admission of his counsel as to the amount due from Reynolds to the corporation, no doubt can be entertained, from the other evidence in the case, that Reynolds was a proved embezzler to a very considerable amount. There are the admissions in his letters to which we have adverted. But, in addition, there are many items charged upon the books whereby it manifestly appears, and, indeed, is admitted, that the moneys of the corporation were by him abstracted. For example, it is proved that Reynolds carried a dummy name upon the pay roll for years; that he caused the bookkeepers to enter upon their books the salary of one Lewis, at the rate of $15 a week; that there was no Lewis; and that he drew and used this money for his own ends. It is shown that he did this not only under Drane, the corrupt bookkeeper, but under the bookkeeper who had preceded Drane; and it is further shown that when the president of the corporation, during the time when the books were under investigation, asked him who and where Lewis was, Reynolds stepped to the door of the office, looked up and down the wharf, and replied that he was about the yard somewhere, and that he was surprised he was not in sight, and added, "Drane knows him." Drane at that time had absconded, and was out of the state. The pay-roll speculations alone, as admitted by Reynolds' counsel, exceed $6,000. Again, it was shown that Reynolds purchased a piece of land, and built thereon a house with lumber and labor supplied under his orders from the corporation yard, and made no charge against himself for the amount. Without multiplying instances, it is sufficient to say that there are numerous items in small amounts entered in the books, under the direction of Reynolds, all showing direct appropriations for his benefit. His moral turpitude in the matter is demonstrated. In addition, and as going generally to the irregular manner in which the books were kept, it is shown, without contradiction, that from January 1, 1887, to August 31, 1889, 700 checks were drawn against the bank for the aggregate amount of $260,000, and that no one of these checks was entered in the cash books or other books of the company. And, finally, the expert testified that, in 15 years of experience as an expert accountant, he had never seen books so cunningly falsified as were those in the case on trial.

In addition to these sums which were thus directly traced to Reynolds, it was shown by the corporation that it had not received other large sums. The evidence did not disclose what had become of these moneys. But enough had been proved to cast the burden upon Reynolds of accounting for all of this property with which he was primarily chargeable, and in any instance in which he fails he must bear the loss. This accounting he could make either by a showing that the principal in fact received the property, or, admitting the loss, by establishing that it occurred through no failure upon his part to perform his duties. No such proof does defendant offer. In Whart. Ag. § 299, it is said: "The agent is bound to debit or charge himself in the account with all money and other things which have come into his hands in his agency; and if, by his own fault, he has let any of them be lost or perish, he must charge himself, in place of these, with the sums at which the damage resulting from their loss may be estimated." In 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1063, it is said: "A failure to keep full and accurate accounts raises all presumptions against the trustee, and may subject him to pecuniary loss as for moneys received and not duly accounted for." An affirmative duty was cast upon Reynolds to cause to be kept accurate accounts. Instead of doing this, the books were falsified under his direction and for his benefit in a great many instances, and in very many ways. Upon establishing his agency and these facts, the burden of proof shifted to him to account for all of the losses which the company by its prima facie case established, and in any instance where he failed to account for property he was chargeable with it or its value. Rubidoex v. Parks, 48 Cal. 215; Young v. Powell, 87 Mo. 128; Darling v. Younker, 37 Ohio St. 487; Marvin v. Brooks, 94 N. Y. 76; Rochester v. Levering, 104 Ind. 562, 4 N. E. 203; Bank v. Cooper, 137 U. S. 473, 11 Sup. Ct. 160; Bailey, Onus Probandi, p. 316; Kerr, Fraud & M. p. 151; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 959; Bigelow, Fraud, p. 301. The effect of the evidence establishing fraud in specific instances is thus declared by Wharton in his work on Evidence (page 39): "We may, in fine, conclude generally that, when a mass of action is examined in block, it is allowable to assume, as a presumption of fact, that, if a part of it is tainted in a particular way, the rest is so tainted. Thus, where most of the vouchers produced by a party in proving his accounts show an overcharging of items, it may be inferred, as a presumption of fact, that a like proportion of the items not vouched are overcharged."

It is again urged by appellants that the court relied solely upon the evidence of the books, and that no other evidence was offered in arriving at the amount of its judgment, and that, the books being a mere history of transactions, appellants were improperly charged with losses which were not proved to exist, but which only appeared to exist by reason of defective bookkeeping. To this it may be said that, where the defective bookkeeping shows a loss, that is at least prima facie evidence that the loss existed. But, in addition to that, there is the evidence of the expert, Lutgen, on behalf of respondents, as follows: "Q. And that was relied upon by you to make up your defalcation of $53,000? A. I told you already, Mr. Graff, partly it was; partly it was relied upon, upon the absence of money, because afterwards I did not find the money for these remittances and for these defalcations. If I had found the money afterwards, there would have been no defalcation; but, through the absence of money, it became a defalcation or defalcations." Indeed, with the burden cast upon him, defendant Reynolds throughout the whole case lamentably failed to account for any of these sums.

It has been noted that in the month of August, 1889, the bookkeeper, Drane, fled the state. After his flight, Reynolds, in the name of the San Pedro Company, brought action against him for the sum of $5,000, moneys had and received, and attached some of his property within the jurisdiction of the court. Drane, of course, made no answer. Judgment passed for the corporation, and was satisfied out of the property. At this time Reynolds' complicity and culpability were not suspected by his employer, but, furthermore, the corporation not only did not authorize the action, but did not know of it. Upon this appeal Reynolds urges that, as he and Drane were joint tortfeasors, this judgment so obtained against Drane must operate as a complete satisfaction for all the corporation's demands against him. It seems scarcely necessary to do more than state the proposition, for the statement carries with it the refutation of its soundness. However, it may be added that before appellants could rely upon this satisfaction, having the opportunity, they should have pleaded it, and they did not do so.

It is unnecessary to discuss appellants' tender of $20,000. If the tender were in itself good, and kept good, it is more than doubtful whether the case is one in which a tender could be made at all; remembering that the stock was pledged for an undetermined amount, and for an amount undeterminable until after an accounting had. Iron Works v. Montague, 108 Mass. 248; Bartlett v. Johnson, 9 Allen, 530; McDaniels v. Bank, 70 Am. Dec. 406; Beatty v. Sylvester, 3 Nev. 228. In any event the tender was not for the amount found due. Lumber Co. v. Reynolds, 111 Cal. 588, 44 Pac. 309. Nor was the offer made in compliance with the law. Chielovich v. Krauss (Cal.) 11 Pac. 781.

The statute of limitations cannot be successfully invoked. Reynolds was acting in a fiduciary capacity. Such of his acts as resulted in loss to the corporation were concealed breaches of his trust. The statute of limitations would not begin to run in his favor, so as to enable him to escape the results of an accounting, until after knowledge by his principal of his derelictions. In this case the accounting was promptly demanded after discovery.

The record in this case is very voluminous. The labor entailed in its examination is far from slight, but that labor has been made as light as possible by the very able and exhaustive presentations in the briefs of counsel upon either side. It is thought that the court may with propriety express its appreciation of the valuable aid which counsel have afforded. The order appealed from is affirmed.

MELVIN v. STATE. (Sac. 287.)

(Supreme Court of California, May 31, 1898.)

STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE—IMPLIED AUTHORITY—TORT OF PUBLIC OFFICERS—LIABILITY OF STATE—"DEBT" DEFINED.

1. Act April 15, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 49), gives the state board of agriculture control of the State Agricultural Society; authorizing it to make needful changes in its constitution, rules, etc., and provide for an annual fair. Held, that authority to provide for an admission fee may be implied therefrom, though it does not follow that the society is organized for gain.

2. The officers of the State Agricultural Society gave on its grounds an exhibition of speed contests, unauthorized by the state, and impliedly discouraged by a provision in its appropriation to the society, that no part of it should be used for such purpose. Held, that where the officers neglected to keep a stand, upon which a visitor to such exhibition was seated, safe and secure, and the same gave way, and the visitor was injured, their negligence was a tort committed by them in the performance of a public duty, and not upon a contract entered into by the state with the injured party, and the state is not liable therefor.

3. Act April 15, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 49), gives the state board of agriculture control of the State Agricultural Society, and authorizes it to provide for an annual fair, and provides that in no event should the state be liable for any debt created by said board. Held, that the term "debt" includes an unliquidated demand arising by implication of law from an injury to a visitor to the fair due to an act of nonfeasance of the officers of the society.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by E. W. Melvin against the state of California. From an order setting aside a verdict for plaintiff, and granting a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Bruner, Hiram Johnson, and H. V. Morehouse, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the State.

SEARLS, C. Action to recover damages from the state for injuries received at the state fair at Sacramento in 1891. Plaintiff had a verdict, which, on motion of defendant, was set aside, and a new trial granted. Plaintiff appeals from the order, and brings the case here on a bill of exceptions.

The complaint avers, in substance, that in September, 1891, defendant held, conducted, and controlled an exhibition called a "state fair" at Sacramento, state of California, which said state fair was held by defendant for its own use and benefit, and for the purpose of exhibiting and displaying to all persons who should attend the products of defendant and other articles placed on exhibition therein, to which the defendant invited the public; that defendant sold tickets entitling the purchasers thereof to admission to the grounds and building where defendant held said fair; that plaintiff on or about September 10, 1891, purchased of the defendant a season ticket, for which he paid five dollars, which entitled him to admission to said state fair, and the ground and buildings where the same was held; that on the 12th day of September, 1891, plaintiff entered Agricultural Park to view the exhibition there being held by defendant, and occupied a seat upon a stand which defendant had provided and maintained for the purpose of those who chose to occupy said stand and seats, and defendant promised that said stand and seats were safe for said purpose; that said stand and seats were not safe and secure, if occupied, of which plaintiff had no knowledge; that defendant knew said stand was weak, insecure, and unsafe, but neglected and refused to repair the same, and invited the public to occupy the same while in such insecure condition; that, while plaintiff was seated upon such stand, by reason of its weakness it gave way and fell, carrying plaintiff with it, whereby he was injured (describing his injuries), and damaged in the sum of $25,000; that plaintiff presented his claim for damages to the board of examiners of defendant, and the same was rejected. The answer of defendant denied all the allegations of the complaint; alleged contributory negligence; averred that the fair was held by the State Agricultural Society for its use and benefit, and not for the state; said society derived all the benefit and profits thereof, which were the exclusive property of said society. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict of $10,000 rendered in favor of plaintiff.

It seems to be conceded by both parties to the litigation that, while the motion for a new trial was based upon several grounds, the motion was granted upon the ground that the state is protected from liability by reason of its sovereignty, and by reason of the several statutes applicable, or deemed applicable, to the facts as presented. The California State Agricultural Society, as originally constituted, was a corporation created by an act of the legislature approved May 13, 1854. St. 1854, p. 56. The first section of the act established a corporation to be known and designated by the name and style of the "State Agricultural Society," with powers to sue and be sued; to contract and be contracted with; to have and use a common seal; to adopt by-laws, ordinances, rules, and regulations, etc. The subsequent sections authorize the corporation to purchase and hold land not exceeding two sections, to be held for the purpose of establishing a model experimental farm, erecting inclosures, etc., calculated, among other things, for an exhibition of various breeds of horses, cattle, mules, and other stock, and of agricultural, mechanical, and domestic manufactures and productions. Membership was attained by the payment of $10 annually. Officers were to be elected by the members yearly. The act appropriated $5,000 each year for four years to the society, to be used only in the payment of premiums. There were other provisions in the act not necessary to be mentioned here. Various statutes were subsequently passed, altering somewhat the charter of the corporation, and appropriating money thereto, up to the adoption of our present constitution, in 1879. Section 22 of article 4 of that instrument contains, among other provisions, the following: "No money shall ever be appropriated or drawn from the state treasury for the use or benefit of any corporation, association, asylum, hospital, or any other institution not under the exclusive management and control of the state as a state institution. * * *" Section 7 of article 12 of the same instrument provides that "the legislature shall not extend any franchise or charter * * * of any corporation now existing, or which shall hereafter exist under the laws of this state."

It is apparent from the foregoing provisions of the constitution of 1879 that it became impossible for the state to grant further aid to the State Agricultural Society so long as it remained a private or quasi public corporation, and not under the exclusive management and control of the state. To obviate this difficulty, as we may well suppose, the legislature, at its next session after the adoption of the constitution, enacted a law, on April 15, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 49), entitled "An act to provide for the management and control of the State Agricultural Society." Section 1 of the act is as follows: "The State Agricultural Society is hereby declared to be a state institution." The second section requires the governor, within 10 days after the passage of the act, to appoint 12 resident citizens of the state, who shall, when organized, constitute "a state board of agriculture." They are required to qualify as required by the constitution; to meet at the office of the State Agricultural Society; to elect one of their number as president of the board for a term of one year; to elect a secretary and treasurer, not of their number, to hold office at the discretion of the board. The fifth section is as follows: "The state board of agriculture shall be charged with the exclusive management and control of the State Agricultural Society as a state institution; shall have possession and care of its property, and be intrusted with the direction of its entire business and financial affairs. They shall define the duties of the secretary and treasurer, fix their bonds and compensation, and shall have power to make all necessary changes in the constitution and rules of the society; to adapt the same to the provisions of this act, and to the management of the society, its meetings and exhibitions. They shall provide for an annual fair or exhibition by the society of all the industries and industrial products of the state, at the city of Sacramento; provided that in no event shall the state be liable for any premium awarded or debt created by said board of agriculture." The sixth section authorizes the board to appoint all necessary marshals and police to keep order and preserve the peace at the annual fairs of the society, and gives to such officers when appointed the same authority in preserving the peace on the grounds and in the buildings as other peace officers. Section 7 is as follows: "Said board shall use all suitable means to collect and disseminate all kinds of information calculated to educate and benefit the industrial classes, develop the resources and advance the material interests of the state, and shall, on or before the first day of February of each year, report to the governor a full and detailed account of their transactions, statistics and information gained, and also a full financial statement of all funds received and disbursed. They shall also make such suggestions and recommendations as experience and good policy may dictate for the improvement and advancement of the agricultural and kindred industries." The act provides that all members of the board shall be appointed by the governor, and contains provisions in regard to county and district agricultural societies not necessary to this inquiry. It also repeals all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the act. We take judicial notice of the fact that the legislature has, at each of its sessions since the passage of the foregoing act of 1880, appropriated sums of money for the State Agricultural Society, ranging from $4,500 in 1880 to $40,000 in 1897.

Until February 28, 1893, nearly a year and a half after plaintiff's alleged cause of action accrued, no suit could be maintained against this state. On the last-mentioned date an act was passed (St. 1893, p. 57) entitled "An act to authorize suits against the state, and regulating the procedure therein." The first section of the act is as follows: "All persons who have, or shall hereafter have, claims on contract or for negligence against the state not allowed by the state board of examiners, are hereby authorized, on the terms and conditions herein contained, to bring suit thereon against the state in any of the courts of this state of competent jurisdiction, and prosecute the same to final judgment. The rules of practice in civil cases shall apply to such suits, except as herein otherwise provided." Section 32 of article 4 of the constitution is in part as follows: "The legislature shall have no power * * * to pay, or to authorize the payment of, any claim hereafter created against the state, or any county or municipality of the state, under any agreement or contract made without express authority of law; and all such unauthorized agreements or contracts shall be null and void."

1. The State Agricultural Society, under the act of 1880, became, ever since has been, and now is, a state institution. The state board of agriculture provided for therein is "charged with the exclusive management and control of the State Agricultural Society as a state institution." We find none of the elements of a private corporation in its creation, its powers, or the mode of their exercise. Its objects are public and educational. They aim to improve agricultural and kindred industries, to disseminate information calculated to educate and benefit the industrial classes, and to advance by such means the material interests of the state. These objects are not widely different from those sought by our public-school system. The legislature found ample authority for its action in the constitution. Section 1 of article 9 of that instrument is as follows: "A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, the legislature shall encourage by all suitable means the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral and agricultural improvement." The act in question pursues the line thus indicated. The board constituted thereby is but the agency through which the sovereign authority of the state is carried out. The state appropriates its money, and the society receives it in aid of the benign objects in view. The state receives no pecuniary return. One object of requiring the annual report from the board of its receipts and expenditures doubtless is that the legislature may become familiar with the needs of the society, and gauge its appropriations accordingly. Respondent contends that, as there was no statute expressly authorizing the board of agriculture to charge admission fees to the state fair, their conduct in so doing was without authority of law and void. We are of opinion, however, that under the authority given to the board to provide for an annual fair, etc., to alter the constitution, and to make needful rules, etc., the authority to provide for an admission fee may be implied. It does not follow, however, that the society is organized for gain. It exists for the sole purpose of promoting the public interest in the business of agriculture and kindred objects. It is an agency of the government, and in no sense an organization for pecuniary profit to the state. Daggett v. Colgan, 92 Cal. 56, 28 Pac. 51.

2. The states are not suable, except with their own consent. Railroad Co. v. Tennessee, 101 U. S. 337; Railroad Co. v. Alabama, Id. 832. No claim arises against any government, in favor of an individual, by reason of the misfeasance, laches, or unauthorized exercise of powers by its officers or agents. Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall. 269; Clodfelter v. State, 86 N. C. 51, 53; Chapman v. State, 104 Cal. 690, 38 Pac. 457; Green v. State, 73 Cal. 29, 11 Pac. 602, and 14 Pac. 610; Bourn v. Hart, 93 Cal. 321, 28 Pac. 951; Story, Ag. § 319. It follows from those and kindred authorities that, if the acts of the board of agriculture and its subordinates constituted a tort, pure and simple, it gave to the appellant no right of action against the state; and the passage of the act of 1893, after the commission of the tort, did not have the effect of giving a right of action for a wrong, where none before existed. The act was permissive, and gave to parties having demands against the state a remedy, by action at law, where no such remedy before existed. We do not regard the fact that a tort may be waived and an action in assumpsit maintained, as conclusive upon this point. In most cases of tort this may be done, but when an action is brought against the state, which was not liable for a tort at the time the cause of action arose, the allegations of the complaint should aver such facts as show distinctly an authorized contract, and the proofs should correspond therewith. All this the plaintiff averred in the present case. The answer denied all these allegations. The evidence showed simply that plaintiff purchased a season ticket which entitled him to admission to the state fair, that on the day of his injury he visited Agricultural Park to witness a horse race or races there being carried on, and that on that day there was no other exhibit than the races. The state had made no legal provision for races or contests of speed. It had impliedly, at least, discouraged them. In the appropriation bill of the then current year, viz. 1891, the legislature appropriated $40,000 "for aid to State Agricultural Society, * * * provided that no moneys appropriated for agricultural societies shall be drawn, paid or used for racing or speed contests." Under these circumstances, we fail to see any foundation for plaintiff's claim, except the duty which devolved upon the officers by operation of law to see to it that plaintiff was not injured by any act of misfeasance or nonfeasance on their part, which duty would have been equally binding upon them had plaintiff, by their consent, entered the grounds without the payment of an admission fee. To neglect this duty was negligence, and negligence under such circumstances was a tort committed by such officers in the performance of a public duty, and not upon a contract entered into by the state with the plaintiff. The case of Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall. 269, at pages 274, 275, is instructive on this last point.

If, however, it be conceded that plaintiff's cause of action arose out of contract, the question still remains, can plaintiff, under the act of 1880, recover against the state in this action? It will be remembered that the fifth section of that act, after conferring authority upon the state board of agriculture to manage and control the society, and enjoining upon the board the duty of providing for an annual exhibition, etc., closes as follows: "Provided, that in no event shall the state be liable for any premium awarded or debt created by said board of agriculture." That the state could limit its liability in the premises as to future contracts, we do not doubt. Parties dealing thereafter with the board did so with full knowledge of the law as it stood, and cannot complain if they are precluded from redress against the state. Appellant contends, however, with great earnestness, that the term "debt created" does not cover a case like the present. It is true that the primary definition of a "debt" is a sum of money due by certain and express agreement. 3 Bl. Comm. 154. "An action at law to recover a specified sum of money alleged to be due." Burrill, Law Dict. The term "debt," however, has a much broader popular significance than the foregoing technical definition, and includes that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services; that which one person is bound to pay to another, or to perform for his benefit; thing owed; obligation; liability. Webst. Dict. So, too, in statutes the term is often construed as including liabilities. In Carver v. Manufacturing Co., 2 Story, 432, 439, Fed. Cas. No. 2,485, it was held that "debts contracted," in a statute relating to individual liabilities of members of manufacturing corporations, was equivalent to "dues owing" or "liabilities incurred." A debtor is one who owes anything, or who is under obligation, arising from express agreement, implication of law, or from the principles of natural justice, to render and pay a sum of money to another. Stanly v. Ogden, 2 Root, 259. In Dunsmoor v. Furstenfeldt, 88 Cal., at page 529, 26 Pac. 520, it is said: "Any kind of obligation of one man to pay money to another is a debt. 'A debt signifies what one owes. There is always some obligation that it shall be paid; but the manner in which * * * it is to be paid, or the means of coercing payment, do not enter into the definition,'"—citing Rodman v. Munson, 13 Barb. 197. Reference is also made to Insurance Co. v. Meeker, 37 N. J. Law, 300, for a full exposition of the word

"debt," as used in law, and especially in statutes. It is sufficient to say of that case that it supports the definition of "debt" as enunciated in Dunsmoor v. Furstenfeldt. Part 2 of our Civil Code relates to "Special Relations of Debtor and Creditor." Title 1 of the part contains general principles. Section 3429 is as follows: "A debtor, within the meaning of this title [title 1], is one who, by reason of an existing obligation, is or may become liable to pay money to another, whether such liability is certain or contingent." Section 3430 is as follows: "A creditor, within the meaning of this title, is one in whose favor an obligation exists, by reason of which he is or may become entitled to the payment of money." So far as we have observed, wherever the term "debt" is used in our Code, it is so used in that broader sense which includes demands or obligations upon contracts payable in money. To illustrate: An executor or administrator "must * * * collect all debts due to the decedent or to the estate." Code Civ. Proc. § 1581. Manifestly, as we think, he is thereby authorized to collect, not only all demands on contracts payable in sums certain, but also those obligations or demands capable of liquidation. "The earnings of the wife are not liable for the debts of the husband." Civ. Code, § 168. "The separate property of the husband is not liable for the debts of the wife contracted before marriage." Id. § 170. See, also, section 171. In all these provisions we think it plain that the construction to be put on the statute is, not that the spouses were simply to enjoy immunity from such contracts for sums of money due by certain and express agreement, which fixed the amount due, independent of extrinsic circumstances,—from such contracts as would have supported an action of debt at common law,—but rather that the word "debt" is to be used in its modern legal significance, as including any sort of obligation to pay money, and that it signifies what either of the spouses owes. So in the present case, we are of opinion that by the term "debt," used in the statute of 1880, it was intended to hold the state free from liability for the obligations which the state board of agriculture might incur, calling directly or indirectly for the payment of money. It follows that granting the motion for a new trial was proper, and we recommend that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

SAVINGS BANK OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY v. DALEY et al. (L. A. 374.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1898.)

ATTORNEY WITH POWER—MORTGAGE FOR PERSONAL BENEFIT—VALIDITY—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

1. A husband made a deed of trust of certain land to secure his debt. He thereafter deeded the land to his wife, and, under a power of attorney from her, executed a new mortgage in her name, and new notes, in consideration of the surrender of the deed of trust and the execution of deeds to the land by the trustee to the wife. Held that, since the lien had been created by the husband prior to the transfer to the wife, the mortgage given in her name under the power of attorney was valid as against her.

2. Where the owner of a Mexican grant has surveyed and subdivided it in the same way as the United States public lands are subdivided, a description in a mortgage by such subdivision is sufficient.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by the Savings Bank of San Diego County against Thomas J. Daley and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Works & Works, for appellants. McNeely & Whitehead, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage alleged to have been made on the 16th day of November, 1891, by the defendants, Thomas J. Daley and his wife, Sarah M. Daley, to secure a promissory note of that date for $29,395.73, alleged to have been made by the said Daley and his wife. The court rendered judgment foreclosing the mortgage for the amount of the note and interest (with the exception of the amount of $300 for a certain overdraft, which need not be further considered). Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The note and mortgage were made and executed by the appellant Thomas J. Daley in his own right, and by the appellant Sarah M. Daley by the said Thomas J. Daley, her attorney in fact; and the main contention of appellants is that the said Thomas had no authority to execute the mortgage as attorney for Sarah. The court below did not render any personal judgment against Sarah on the note, but held that Thomas had authority to execute for her the mortgage, and decreed a foreclosure against her. On the 30th day of September, 1889, the defendant Sarah M. Daley duly executed a power of attorney to the defendant Thomas J. Daley, which upon its face, beyond doubt, authorized him to execute the mortgage in question. But the contention of appellants is that the mortgage was given to secure a personal indebtedness of Thomas; that the plaintiff was aware of that fact at the time the mortgage was executed; and that, therefore, under certain authorities cited, the mortgage as to Sarah was void. Admitting the principle contended for to be correct, still it is not applicable to this case. The facts are these: On October 10, 1890, the appellant Thomas J. Daley was indebted to a corporation called the Consolidated Bank on five several promissory notes, in the sum of about $25,000; and on that day he executed to one John Ginty a trust deed of the lands here involved, to secure such indebtedness. Afterwards, on December 18, 1890, he made a deed of gift to his wife of all "his right, title, and interest" in said lands. Afterwards the present plaintiff and respondent paid the full amount due on said notes to the Consolidated Bank, and the last-named bank assigned and transferred to plaintiff all the said indebtedness secured by said trust deed. Afterwards, on November 16, 1891, the said appellant Thomas J. Daley, for himself and for the said Sarah, as her attorney in fact under said power, executed the note and mortgage sued on in this action, the consideration therefor being the said indebtedness secured by said trust deed. In consideration of this new note and mortgage, the old notes were delivered up; and Ginty, at the instance of plaintiff, jointly with said Thomas, executed to Sarah a quitclaim deed for said lands. The surrendering of the old notes, the execution of the deed and mortgage, and the recording of the same, were all done at the same time and as parts of the same transaction.

To the foregoing facts the principle that an attorney with power to mortgage cannot make a valid mortgage for his own personal debt, and for his own personal advantage alone, does not apply. The deed of trust was a subsisting lien against and a burden upon the lands to which Sarah held the legal title, to the same extent as the lien created by the mortgage; and the mere change in the form of the lien did not change her position. It cannot be said, therefore, that, within the authorities cited by appellants, the mortgage was made for the sole advantage of the attorney in fact. The lien for the personal indebtedness of the attorney in fact had been created before the deed, the consideration of which was merely love and affection, had been made to Sarah, and before she had any interest in the lands. The facts, therefore, do not show any legal limitation of the express power given in the power of attorney to execute the mortgage. It is true that there had been a former deed made by Thomas to his wife, in 1888; but as that deed had not been recorded, and as the respondent had no notice of it, it is not to be considered as affecting this case.

The other point made by appellants is that the mortgage does not contain a sufficient description of the lands sought to be mortgaged. The premises were within a Mexican grant, and the main description is by subdivisions, as though they had been upon public lands, and surveyed by the United States government; and the contention is that, as government surveys are not made upon the Mexican grants, therefore the description is meaningless and void. But the case is similar to that of Rea v. Haffenden, 116 Cal. 596, 48 Pac. 716, where it is held that if the owner of a Mexican grant has surveyed and subdivided the same in the same way as if the grant were a part of the public domain, a description in a mortgage by such subdivisions is sufficient. There are no other points in the case calling for discussion. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PUBLIC LANDS—AGENCY—RATIFICATION—ESTOPPEL—RECITALS IN DECREE OF CONFIRMATION—CONCLUSIVENESS—PATENTS—MEXICAN GRANTS—ACTIONS IN REM—MORTGAGES—CONCLUSIVENESS OF DECISIONS—QUIETING TITLE—HEIRSHIP—LIMITATIONS—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. A principal cannot ratify an unauthorized agreement to sell by his agent, after he himself has disposed of the subject of such agreement.

2. A contract to procure a deed to land from its owner or pay damages is not such a contract as can be ratified by such owner, so as to make it his contract, and thereby pass title to the party of the second part to the contract, who goes into possession thereunder.

3. The fact that intestate was in possession of land, claiming to hold under the owner, but never having paid any consideration or received a deed, does not estop his widow from securing a deed from the owner, having the claim confirmed by the United States courts, and acquiring the title for herself instead of for his estate.

4. Recitals in a decree of confirmation of title to lands by the United States district court as to how the property accrued to the parties named,—as whether by inheritance or otherwise,—are not binding, and not even evidence against the parties to the judgment, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1908-1911, providing, in effect, that only the matters directly in issue shall be deemed concluded by the judgment.

5. An order of the United States court recited that it appeared that intestate was the real claimant of certain land, and that while prosecuting the claim he had joined the army, and lost his life, and therefore a rehearing was granted to his widow and children. Thereafter the title was confirmed, and a patent was granted conveying the land to M., N., and H., widow and heirs of B., and to "their" heirs and assigns; to have and to hold the said tract to the said M., N., and H., widow and heirs of B., deceased, and to "their" heirs and assigns forever. There were other heirs of B. not named in the patent. Held, that the legal title was by the patent vested in the grantees named, and the title was not made subject to any trust in favor of the other heirs by virtue of its terms.

6. A patent issued to the conferee of the Mexican grant takes effect by relation as a deed of the United States at the date of the presentation of the petition for confirmation.

7. Purchasers of land between the time of filing the petition for confirmation of title and the granting of the patent acquire legal rights which are not disturbed by the subsequent patent.

8. The judgment in an action to determine conflicting claims to real estate, where a mortgagee whose mortgage was recorded was not made a party, does not bind him, since the action is in rem only in so far that personal service of process is not required to give jurisdiction.

9. The title derived by a mortgagee who purchases at his foreclosure sale dates back to the date of the mortgage.

10. A decision on appeal as to the ownership of land is not res judicata in an action between different persons, where the facts appear as materially different.

11. A patent to lands in confirmation of a Mexican grant issued to the original applicant or his legal representatives embraces representatives of the original petitioner by contract as well as by operation of law, leaving the question open in a court of law as to the party to whom the patent should inure.

12. In an action to quiet title, where plaintiff avers a legal title, and asks to have it so adjudicated, he cannot afterwards ask to have it adjudicated that he has an equitable title, and that defendant holds the legal title in trust for him.

13. Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, authorizing an action to determine heirship and the ownership of property in the estate of a deceased person, does not authorize the determination of adverse claims by third persons to the property, and a judgment therein is not conclusive as to persons claiming the property as their own.

14. Limitations do not begin to run against a purchaser at a foreclosure sale until the delivery of the deed.

15. Code Civ. Proc. § 325, providing that in no case shall adverse possession of land be considered established unless it shall be shown that the land has been occupied and claimed for the period of five years continuously, and that the party has paid all the taxes levied thereon, is not complied with by the redemption of such land from tax sales, where the party has failed to pay the taxes when due during such five years.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by J. Wade McDonald against Winifred McCoy and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Nougues & Boone and W. P. McNally, for appellants. McDonald & McDonald, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to quiet title against several defendants, but no defense is made except by the representatives of Maurice Dore, deceased, who are the appellants. The plaintiff, in his complaint, avers that he is the owner and in possession of the land in question, and yet the defendants assert title thereto, and slander and deny the right and title of the plaintiff therein, and by such assertion of their alleged rights, and slander and denial of the right and title of the plaintiff, the defendants have created doubts and thrown suspicion upon plaintiff's title. He demands judgment that his title is good, and paramount to the title and claim of defendants, and each of them. Appellants deny plaintiff's allegation of title, allege title in Dore, and assert certain equities.

The controversy involves the Rancho Jamul, in San Diego county, except a portion thereof, which had been set apart to Mrs. Burton as a homestead. In 1831 a provisional grant was made to Pío Pico. In January, 1851, Juan Forster, in his own name, as party of the first part, contracted with Lopez, Crossthwaite, Richard Rust, and William E. Rust, as parties of the second part, to sell to them the right, title, and interest of Pio Pico in the Rancho Jamul for $2,000, to be paid to Juan Forster, "agent as aforesaid." Five hundred dollars was to be paid in cash, and a like sum when Pico should deliver to them a deed in fee simple, and also some further sums; but, if Pico should refuse to ratify the agreement on the part of Forster, or to deliver the deed, then Forster agreed to pay to the parties of the second part $500 so advanced by them, and all damages resulting from their being dispossessed; and for the true and faithful performance of this last covenant Forster bound himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators. The deed of Pico, by the terms of the agreement, was to be delivered to the parties of the second part on or before the 1st of March, 1851. It never was delivered, and it does not appear that anything was ever done in performance of the contract by any one. In October, 1852, a petition in the name of Pico was filed in the United States land commission, asking for a confirmation of the title. The claim was rejected by the commissioners in 1855. According to an affidavit made by Maria S. Burton, and filed in the United States district court in 1880, Burton, in 1853, purchased the right of Lopez and Crossthwaite under the contract, and took possession of the land; and in 1854 he purchased the interests of Richard and William E. Rust. In 1867, nearly 12 years after the claim had been rejected, an appearance was entered in the United States district court on behalf of Gen. Burton. For what purpose does not appear. Burton left the state in 1859, and never returned. He was an officer in the army of the United States during the Civil War, and, according to the affidavit of Mrs. Burton, from the hardships and exposures in that service he contracted a disease from which he died at Ft. Adams in 1869. June 24, 1870, Mrs. Burton purchased the land from Pico, and took his deed to herself. Not as a ratification of the sale made by Forster, but to rebut the possibility of any such presumption, it was recited in the deed to her from Pico as follows: "To have and to hold unto her, the said Maria S. Burton, her heirs and assigns forever, to and for their benefit, and none other." On the 23d day of August—nearly three months after the deed from Pico to her—Mrs. Burton made the affidavit, in which there was evidently an attempt to excuse the failure to prosecute the claim by showing that Gen. Burton was the real claimant, and that no laches could be charged to him, because he was engaged in the service of his country as an officer in the army. In the same affidavit Mrs. Burton states that Pico did not ratify the sale made by Forster while Lopez and his associates were in possession, but never objected to the possession of Gen. Burton; "and since my husband's death said Pico has, in favor of myself and my children, ratified and confirmed the claim of my husband and ourselves to the land, and for our protection and security has executed and delivered to me a deed of conveyance of the land to myself, which deed is duly acknowledged and recorded in the county of San Diego, where the land lies." "I did not know, and have never heard until about a month ago, that an absolute grant of the land had been made by Manuel Victoria to Don Pio Pico, and am confident that my husband was never aware of the fact while he was in this state," etc. The affidavit of Pio Pico which had been filed in the United States district court was also put in evidence by respondent. It was filed in the district court August 26, 1870, by Mrs. Burton. In this affidavit Pico states that he did not present the petition to the commissioners for confirmation because Forster had sold the land, and others had taken possession, and he states: "Although I never confirmed the agreement entered into by Don Juan Forster as my agent and Bonifacio Lopez, Phillip Crossthwaite, Richard Rust, and William E. Rust, I have confirmed the land to the heirs of General H. S. Burton, late of the army of the United States, who succeeded to the interests of the parties above mentioned, and with that object I have conveyed said rancho of 'Jamul' to the widow of General Burton by deed which is duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded, and I have no interest or claim in the land." Respondent also read in evidence a writing bearing date August, 1870, executed by Pio Pico, in which the contract made by Juan Forster is set out in full, after which it proceeds: "Now, therefore, in consideration of the sum of five hundred dollars to me in hand paid by each of the parties named in said instrument as the parties of the second part, and for divers other good and sufficient considerations thereunto moving, I, said Pio Pico, have ratified, confirmed, and made valid, and by these presents do ratify, confirm, and make valid, the said agreement," etc.

At the time of the execution of this instrument Pio Pico did not own the land, having conveyed the same three months before to Mrs. Burton, to have and to hold for herself and her heirs forever, and for none others. He was not, therefore, in a position that he could ratify the contract had it been capable of being ratified by him, which it was not. No previous authority given to Forster could have made this contract the contract of Pio Pico. It did not purport to be his contract, or to bind him. By it Forster simply undertook to procure a deed from Pico, or pay damages. It may be doubted whether under any circumstances a ratification could be made, after Gen. Burton's death, which would have the effect of causing the title to vest in his heirs by succession. Title cannot be conveyed to the dead. But it may be conceded that, had there been a contract which purported to bind Pico, and which was, therefore, capable of ratification, and that Burton had become the owner of such contract, a ratification of this contract after Burton's death and conveyance to his heirs in performance thereof, the title, though not strictly acquired by decedent, would have been subject to administration in Burton's estate, or at least in some mode might have been made subject to administration. Burton, however, had no contract which purported to have been made by Pico, and which could be made the contract of Pico by ratification; and, had it been capable of ratification, still, before the attempt to ratify, Pico had parted with his interest in the property. The formal attempt to ratify must, then, be left out of the case. But it is said that Gen. Burton was in possession, claiming under Pico, and that Mrs. Burton used her position as his widow and heir to obtain the deed from Pico, and the confirmation of the claim by the United States court, and cannot now deny that the title was acquired for the benefit of the estate. It is not really proven in this case by any competent evidence that General Burton ever purchased the rights of Lopez and others under the contract with Forster. He most likely did acquire from them the possession of the land. Mrs. Burton's affidavit shows that Gen. Burton never knew that Pico had a grant for the land other than the provisional grant of 1831, and, of course, he knew that conferred no title. Indeed, Mrs. Burton attributes Burton's delay to prosecute the claim to his ignorance of the fact that Pico had any title. Burton's appearance was entered while he was an invalid, out of the state; and Mrs. Burton's affidavit also shows that he never paid any attention to the claim other than to employ attorneys. Ignorance of the existence of the grant is the only explanation that can be given of the fact that nothing was done in performance of the Forster contract, and no attempt made to get a deed from Pico, and of the failure to prosecute the claim for confirmation. I think that the evidence fails to show that Burton did claim under Pico. If this were otherwise, I still fail to find anything in the facts which would estop Mrs. Burton from acquiring title for herself.

The next question is whether there was anything in the proceedings had in the United States district court which will conclude those claiming under Mrs. Burton and her children. On the 26th of August, 1870, on motion of Mrs. Burton, an order was entered reciting that it appeared that Gen. Burton was the real claimant, and that, while prosecuting the claim in the name of the original grantee, he was ordered East, and lost his life in the Civil War, and therefore no laches could be attached to him for not prosecuting the claim, and therefore a rehearing was granted in favor of his widow and children, who were his sole heirs. September 21, 1870, an order was entered reciting that Henry S. Burton died seised and possessed of Jamul, having purchased it in his lifetime, and substituting the names of Mrs. Burton and her two children as claimants in lieu of Pio Pico. On the same day the decree of confirmation was entered, which contains the following: "This court does hereby order, adjudge, and decree that the claim of Maria A. Burton, Nellie Burton, and Henry H. Burton is a good and valid claim, and the same be, and is hereby, confirmed to them, as the legal representatives of the said Henry S. Burton, deceased." The patent was issued in October, 1876, and granted to Maria A. Burton, Nellie Burton, and Henry H. Burton, widow and heirs of Henry S. Burton, deceased, and to their heirs and assigns, the tract, etc.; "to have and to hold the said tract to the said Maria A. Burton, Nellie Burton, and Henry H. Burton, widow and heirs of Henry S. Burton, deceased, and to their heirs and assigns forever." It was not the province of the United States district court to determine who the heirs of Gen. Burton were, or whether the property accrued to the parties named by inheritance or otherwise. These recitals in the orders and in the judgment bind no one, and are not evidence of the facts recited, even as against the parties to the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908; Lillis v. Ditch Co., 95 Cal. 553, 30 Pac. 1108; Freem. Judgm. § 257. At the time of the entry of the decree of confirmation neither of the parties named was the legal representative of Gen. Burton in any other sense than that they were heirs, but not the only heirs, of Gen. Burton. He had been married previous to his marriage to Mrs. Maria A. Burton, and had other descendants capable of inheriting. After the confirmation of the grant, to wit, in 1872, Mrs. Burton and her two children mortgaged the land to Maurice Dore to secure a loan of $10,000. Mrs. Burton then claimed and represented to Dore that she and her children were sole owners of the land. Indeed, Mrs. Burton and her children always so claimed until Dore commenced a suit to foreclose his mortgage, when, in her answer filed August 26, 1880, she admitted that she had believed that the land belonged to herself and children, but had discovered that it was community property of herself and Gen. Burton. Had she been able to pay the debt due on the mortgage, probably she would never have discovered that Jamul belonged to the estate. Since these recitals in the proceedings in the United States circuit court do not bind those claiming under the patent, are not even competent evidence tending to prove the facts, and were received over the objections of appellants, who now insist upon the rulings as error, such facts, unless otherwise proven, have no legitimate bearing upon the question here involved. We come then to the effect of the patent.

It may be noted here that the grant is not to the grantees as heirs. It is to Maria A. Burton, Nellie Burton, and Henry H. Burton, widow and heirs of Henry S. Burton, deceased. It is not to the heirs of the intestate, but to the persons named, their heirs and assigns. This is, of course, the plainest possible indication that they held for themselves. The persons named were not the only heirs, nor even the only children, of Henry S. Burton. We are also to notice that, had all the heirs been named, still the title vested in them by the patent was as tenants in common owning equally, and not according to our laws of succession. As before stated, the district court had no jurisdiction over probate matters, and could not declare the succession. It is admitted by all that the legal title was, by the patent, vested in the grantees named; and it seems from the authorities that it was not, by virtue of the recitals in the patent, made subject to any trust in favor of any one. On its face it was an absolute title. In Christy v. Fisher, 58 Cal. 256, it was held that, although a patent was issued to Halleck Peachy and Van Winkle, as executors of Joseph L. Folsom, deceased, yet the persons named, though not in fact executors, could convey a complete title to the land. In Hartley v. Brown, 46 Cal. 202, Antone Moria Armijo was the original grantee. He died before confirmation, and the grant was confirmed to his heirs, and the patent was to them. The heirs conveyed the land to the plaintiffs in that action before the issuance of the patent. The defendants claimed under a probate sale made in the estate of the original grantee. It was held, in the absence of further showing, that the conveyances direct from the heirs must prevail over those claiming under a probate sale. In all these cases the opposing equities do plainly appear, while in the case at bar there were none. The cases are cited to show that the recitals in the patent do not imply a trust; that, if the title was received in trust for Burton's estate, that must be shown by evidence aliunde. Here Burton was not the grantee, nor the petitioner for confirmation, and never acquired any right or title, legal or equitable, from such grantee; nor did he hold a contract which purported to vest in him any such right; and, if it could be held that he did have a contract, I think it is fully shown that it never was ratified.

It is said that the mortgage to Maurice Dore was in form a quitclaim, and, having been given before the patent was issued, did not carry the after-acquired title. I am not sure that plaintiff has any concern in that question, but there is nothing in the proposition. It has been uniformly held that the patent issued to the confirmer of the Mexican grant takes effect by relation as a deed of the United States at the date of the presentation of the petition for confirmation. Moore v. Wilkinson, 13 Cal. 478; Touchard

v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150; Clark v. Lockwood, 21 Cal. 220; Schmitt v. Giovanari, 43 Cal. 617; Bihler v. Platt, 52 Cal. 550. We start with the title in the petitioner at that date, and titles subsequently derived from him in any legal mode are valid, no matter to whom the patent may subsequently be issued. Nor do purchasers intermediate the filing of the petition and the patent acquire a mere equity; nor, if such intermediate rights are mere equities, are they disturbed by the subsequent patent.

It is contended by the plaintiff that appellants are estopped from asserting any claim to the Rancho Jamul by the judgment rendered in a suit to quiet title brought by G. W. B. McDonald, administrator of the estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased, in 1883, against Leach, Capron, and others, Dore having foreclosed his mortgage given by Mrs. Burton and children, purchased the property at the foreclosure sale through his agent, and in 1883 sold and caused the land to be conveyed to Wallace Leach and John G. Capron. They executed to his agent, Bayley, a mortgage to secure the payment of $4,000, which was the purchase money, or a part thereof. Some few months afterwards, to wit, on December 21, 1883, McDonald, as administrator of Henry S. Burton, deceased, commenced an action against Leach, Capron, and others to have it adjudged that said Rancho Jamul was property of the estate subject to administration, and that the legal title held by Mrs. Burton and her children was held in trust for said estate, and "to vest hereafter in this plaintiff as administrator, and to be disposed of by him in due course of administration." Dore's mortgage was duly recorded before this action was commenced, but neither Dore nor Bayley were made parties, or served with process, and neither appeared in, or in any mode participated in, the action. April 28, 1887, judgment was entered in that action to the effect the rancho is and was the property of the estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased, and subject to the administration thereof, and that all title held by said defendants Leach, Capron, and Ingraham, or either of them, was declared to be held in trust, and for the use and benefit of said estate. Of course, the estate of a deceased person is not a person or an entity capable of acquiring or holding title, and the only rational meaning of this decree is that the rancho was part of the estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased, and that the beneficial interest therein had devolved upon Mrs. Burton and her children as heirs of Gen. Burton. Plaintiff derives his title through a probate sale in the estate of Henry S. Burton made in 1895.

I think it clear that the appellants here are not bound by the judgment in the former suit. It is not an estoppel as to them. It is suggested that the action to determine conflicting claims to real estate under our Code is in rem, and binds the whole world. Otherwise an action of that character cannot be maintained against claimants who cannot be personally served. There is much plausibility in the argument that it is an action of that character, just as a suit to foreclose a mortgage may be so regarded. But neither in this case nor in actions of foreclosure is provision made for the notice to all interested, whether parties to the record or not, and it has never been held that judgments in such cases are conclusive except upon parties and their privies. They are not in the full sense actions in rem, but so far only that personal service of process is not required to give jurisdiction. The effect of a judgment as an estoppel is declared in section 1908 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is true, Dore claims under Leach and Capron, who were parties to the action. Dore was then, however, a mortgagee, and his mortgage had been duly recorded. When his mortgage was foreclosed, his title derived from a sale under the decree dated back to the date of the mortgage, which was prior to the commencement of the action. Jones, Mortg. § 1654; Brady v. Burke, 90 Cal. 6, 27 Pac. 52. But it is contended that, conceding that the judgment in the case of McDonald against Burton is not conclusive as an adjudication, it should be so regarded as an authority. The facts, it is said, were substantially the same, and that case was twice appealed to this court. 68 Cal. 445, 9 Pac. 714, and same case under title Burton v. Burton, 79 Cal. 490, 21 Pac. 847. In the first appeal the facts are recited at length, and the principal ones correspond very closely to those here considered. I do not understand that it was there held that the decree of confirmation and the patent by their terms show that the title was received by the patentees in trust for the heirs of Henry S. Burton, but the conclusion was founded mainly upon the evidence of ratification found in the record. In some important respects the facts cited as tending to show ratification differ from those now presented. I notice three which seem to be important: (1) It is said that Pico ratified the sale made by Forster without receiving any consideration from her. There is no express evidence in the present record that Mrs. Burton actually paid Pico for his deed, but all the presumptions are very strong to that effect. The facts recited in the attempt at a formal ratification are that Pico had received $500 from each of the parties of the second part to the agreement with Forster. Both Pico and Mrs. Burton testify, in effect, that he had never ratified the agreement in their favor, but only in favor of Mrs. Burton. Of course, the deed imports a consideration, and it is not to be supposed that he transferred all this land, to which it was then found he had a good title, for nothing. (2) It does not appear that it was then apparent that the Forster agreement did not purport to bind Pico, or to be his contract, and therefore was incapable of being ratified by him. (3) It did not then appear that the parties named in the decree and patent were not the only heirs of Gen. Burton. That fact now plainly appears, and, in my opinion, has an important bearing upon the question of ratification. It throws light upon the intention of Mrs. Burton in taking the deeds from Pico, and explains the extraordinary clause in the deed from Pico to her: "Maria A. Burton, her heirs and assigns, are to have and hold said rancho to and for her and their benefit, and for none others." It is no wonder that she always asserted that the property did not belong to the estate of Gen. Burton, but was the individual property of herself and children. Where she procured the money with which she paid Pico does not appear, unless in the evidence which tends to show that she used a portion of the money which she got from Dore to pay the expense of procuring the confirmation. The decision in the former case, being based upon facts materially different, cannot, in my opinion, be taken as controlling here. It does not constitute the law of the case, and, unless founded entirely upon the supposition that title accrued to Gen. Burton through the ratification referred to, it is opposed to the cases already cited upon the effect of the confirmation and patent, and also to the line of decisions commencing with Estrada v. Murphy, 19 Cal. 248, and also to the following cases in the supreme court of the United States: Hogan v. Page, 2 Wall. 605; Carpenter v. Rannels, 19 Wall. 138; Steinbach v. Stewart, 11 Wall. 566.

In Hogan v. Page it is said that the land office at an early day, to avoid the necessity of determining derivative titles, adopted the formula of issuing the patent in terms to the original applicants or his legal representatives, and that the formula "or his legal representatives" embraces representatives of the original grantee in the land by contract, such as "assignees or grantees, as well as by operation of law." Substituting the phrase "original petitioner" for "original grantee," this is the precise effect, as I understand it, which has been given to a patent in confirmation of a Mexican grant in California, although no such formula has been used. Under this rule it is not necessary that the United States district court should inquire as to the derivation of title from Pico, nor did it. The recitals in various orders in regard to Henry S. Burton have reference only to the question of laches in the prosecution of the claim. The court was made to believe that Henry S. Burton was the real claimant, and because he was in the service of his country excused the delay. This was not an adjudication of that fact, nor do I see how the use of this pretense can estop Maurice Dore from showing that as matter of fact Gen. Burton never had a pretense of title in law or in equity, and never knew that a grant had been made to Pico. The court had no occasion to determine who were the legal representatives either of Pico or Burton. Whoever received the patent, the title would inure to those who could derive title from Pico subsequent to the filing of his petition with the United States land commission. The sale to Lopez and others was prior to that date, and it is only through the deed to Mrs. Burton that any derivative title can be shown. Rights founded upon this contract which antedated that time, even had Pico been the contracting party, could not be recognized save in a court of equity.

The plaintiff avers a legal title, and asks to have it so adjudged. He cannot now, in lieu of that, have it adjudged that he has an equitable title, and that defendants hold the legal title in trust for him. Von Drachenfels v. Doolittle, 77 Cal. 295, 19 Pac. 518; Harrigan v. Mowry, 84 Cal. 456, 22 Pac. 658, and 24 Pac. 48; Burris v. Adams, 96 Cal. 667, 31 Pac. 565. If such a suit could be maintained, it would, as pointed out by Judge McFarland in the last case cited above, reverse the present rule, which requires a party claiming to have equities to set them up. A person claiming that an adverse title was fraudulently acquired, and that he is entitled to have it conveyed to him, might sue to quiet title, and thus avoid the necessity of setting up the facts constituting the alleged fraud. This may not be done. The learned judge of the trial court found that plaintiff had the legal title. Had the title come to the heirs of Burton by succession, this would have been correct; for in such case the legal title would have been in the heirs, subject to being divested by appropriate proceedings in the administration of the estate of Henry S. Burton. But, since it could not have been so vested by the decree of confirmation, and the patent does not purport to grant the land to them as the representatives of Burton, it cannot be held that they held the title subject to administration.

In 1887, Maggie Leach, as executrix of Wallace Leach, then deceased, commenced an action under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine heirship to the estate of Henry S. Burton. In her complaint she described the property here in controversy, and claimed title thereto derived from the heirs of Henry S. Burton, deceased. Maurice Dore was served with summons in this proceeding, but did not appear. It was adjudged that the estate of Wallace Leach owned an undivided five-sixths of the property as grantee of some of the heirs of Henry S. Burton, deceased. Plaintiff contends that this judgment concludes the heirs of Maurice Dore, that they cannot deny that the property belongs to the estate of Henry S. Burton, and that the title derived from a subsequent foreclosure of the mortgage against the estate of Leach was simply the right of Mrs. Burton and her children as the heirs of Henry S. Burton. Section 1664 is in article 2 of chapter 11 of title 11, and concerns distribution and final settlement of estates of deceased persons. The proceeding is a step in the distribution of estates. The purpose is to determine heirship and the ownership of property of the estate, and the decree is made conclusive only in distribution and of title to property of the estate. It provides no means of determining adverse claims, or what property belongs to the estate. Had Dore appeared, and alleged that his claim was that the described property did not belong to the estate, he would not have been heard. The decree did not affect the claim of the appellants.

In 1889 the administrator of the estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased, by virtue of the decree in the case of McDonald against Burton, above mentioned, was put into possession of Rancho Jamul. He continued in possession as such administrator until after the administrator's deed to plaintiff, February 18, 1895. Respondent claims that title as against the appellants, if they claim adversely to the estate, has been acquired by the statute of limitations. There are two answers to this contention: (1) So far as appears, appellants have not even yet been able to procure a deed to themselves conveying the legal title to them under their decree of foreclosure. They have had, therefore, no right of action at law to recover the property. Leonard v. Flynn, 89 Cal. 535, 26 Pac. 1097. (2) While the administrator was in possession, no taxes were paid. The rancho was assessed for taxes each year, and the taxes were regularly allowed to become delinquent, and under the statute the land was sold to the state. After the probate sale in 1895, the administrator redeemed the property from these sales, by paying to the state the required amounts, and received certificates showing that a redemption had been effected. Section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in addition to the requirements as to the character of the possession in other respects, provides that in no case shall the adverse possession be considered established unless it be shown that the land has been occupied and claimed for the period of five years continuously, and the parties have paid all taxes which have been levied and assessed on the land. It appears, then, that while the administrator was maintaining his possession, which it is claimed was adverse, he did not pay the taxes which were assessed upon the land, or any portion thereof, but, on the contrary, allowed the land to be sold for the delinquency. No taxes were paid, even if such redemption could be called a payment of taxes, until he ceased to have or to claim any right to possession. But, though the redemption had been effected while he was still in possession claiming title, it would not have been a compliance with the law. If there is anything of benefit to the state contemplated by this anomalous law, it is that it will have a tendency to induce people to pay their taxes, and not compel the state to take the title subject to redemption. If it is an element in the adverse possession tending to show good faith, certainly during those years in which the taxes have not been paid the possession lacks an essential element required in the statute. During all the years in which the delinquency was allowed, the true owner might forbear suit because of his knowledge that the person in possession had not paid taxes, thereby indicating that he was not holding adversely. The plaintiff, I think, is not in a position to invoke the statute of limitations.

Holding these views, I have not found it necessary to consider the appellants' alleged equities, or whether they should have been allowed to amend their answer, and plead the statute of limitations. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial awarded.

HINES v. WARD et al. (Sac. 189.)

MORTGAGE—MERGER—ESTOPPEL—ELECTION OF REMEDIES.

A mortgagee, to whom the mortgagor has deeded the mortgaged premises in satisfaction of the mortgage, is not estopped to deny a merger as against one who, without his knowledge, obtained judgment against the mortgagor between date of mortgage and deed, though he commenced an action against the judgment creditor and sheriff alone to enjoin sale under the judgment, and preserved a bill of exceptions to the order dissolving the injunction, and took an appeal therefrom, which, however, he did not prosecute, he having amended his complaint, and made the mortgagor a party, which was enough to entitle him to relief under the prayer for general relief.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county.

Action by F. Hines against F. G. Ward and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant L. E. Richter appeals. Affirmed.

Shinn & Shinn, for appellant. Goodwin & Goodwin, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Plaintiff held a mortgage, given and recorded in June, 1890, on land of defendant Tunison to secure the latter's note, on which there was due in May, 1894, the sum of $1,500. Being insolvent, and unable to pay the note, and desiring to avoid the expense of foreclosure and sale, Tunison requested plaintiff to take a deed of the mortgaged premises in satisfaction of the debt, representing to plaintiff and assuring him that there was no other incumbrance or lien upon the land. Plaintiff, believing and relying upon Tunison's representations, consented, without an examination of the record, to accept such deed, and thereupon on May 19, 1894, Tunison and wife made and executed to plaintiff a deed of the premises, which the latter took, and in consideration thereof surrendered and canceled the note, and satisfied the mortgage, and placed his deed of record. In fact, the defendant Richter had in March, 1894, without plaintiff's knowledge, but with the knowledge of Tunison, recovered a judgment against the latter in the superior court of the county, which judgment appeared of record as having been entered and docketed on the 27th of that month; and in August, 1894, Richter caused an execution based upon said judgment to be levied upon the land by the defendant Ward, as sheriff of the county, who advertised the land for sale thereunder. The existence of this judgment and the proceedings taken thereunder being thus brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff, he commenced this action. In the complaint, as originally filed, Richter and Ward, the sheriff, were alone made parties defendant, the complaint alleging the facts as above stated, and also setting out the facts as to the manner in which Richter's judgment had been procured and docketed, and praying for a perpetual injunction restraining the sale, and for general equitable relief. Upon the complaint as thus framed a temporary injunction restraining the sale was granted, but subsequently the court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and dissolved the injunction, but with leave to plaintiff to amend. Plaintiff thereupon filed an amended complaint, adding and bringing in Tunison as a party defendant, and, alleging otherwise substantially the same facts stated in his original complaint, asked that the satisfaction of said mortgage be canceled and set aside, that plaintiff be restored to his rights thereunder, and that the mortgage be foreclosed, and the land sold in satisfaction of the indebtedness. The complaint also alleged that the land at the time of its conveyance to plaintiff was of no greater value than the amount due on the note, and that plaintiff was ready and willing to reconvey the land to Tunison. Tunison was duly served, but failed to appear, and his default was entered. Defendant Richter answered the amended complaint, pleading the filing of said original complaint and the relief asked thereunder, and the fact that plaintiff had preserved a bill of exceptions to the order dissolving the injunction, as showing an election by plaintiff to stand upon his legal title acquired under said deed, and pleading said facts as operating an estoppel against plaintiff to have the relief sought in his amended complaint. Upon the trial the court found the facts substantially as alleged in the amended complaint, and, without finding or passing expressly upon the question of an estoppel, awarded plaintiff the relief sought. From this judgment defendant Richter appeals.

The contention of appellant is that the conveyance from Tunison had the effect to merge plaintiff's rights under the mortgage in the legal title carried by the deed, and relieve the land of the mortgage lien, thereby leaving it subject to the lien of appellant's judgment, and liable to sale in satisfaction thereof. It is well established that equity will interpose to prevent a merger where from the circumstances it is apparent that it was not the intention of the grantee that a merger should take place; and where it appears to be for the interest of the grantee that there should be no merger of the lesser estate, such will be presumed to have been his intention. The rule is thus expressed by Mr. Jones: "There is generally an advantage to the mortgagee in preserving his mortgage title; and, when there is, no merger takes place. It is a general rule, therefore, that the mortgagee's acquisition of the equity of redemption does not merge his legal estate as mortgagee so as to prevent his setting up his mortgage to defeat an intermediate title, such as a second mortgage, or a subsequent lien, unless such appears to have been the intention of the parties, and justice requires it; and such intention will not be presumed where the mortgagee's interest requires that the mortgage should remain in force. The intention is a question of fact." Jones, Mortg. § 870. And, further: "Even where the parties have undertaken to discharge the mortgage upon the uniting of the estates of the mortgagor and the mortgagee in the latter, it will still be upheld as a source of title whenever it is for his interest, by reason of some intervening title or other cause, that it should not be regarded as merged. It is presumed as matter of law that the party must have intended to keep on foot his mortgage title, when it was essential to his security against an intervening title, or for other purposes of security; and this presumption applies although the parties, through ignorance of such intervening title, or through inadvertence, have actually discharged the mortgage and canceled the notes, and really intended to extinguish them. The circumstances of the case must, however, be such that no injustice will be done to any one else, as where the mortgagee has taken a conveyance of the property in satisfaction of the debt, and, though he has discharged his mortgage, he has done nothing else to preclude the supposition that he intended to take the property in satisfaction of the debt. It may, therefore, be deduced from the authorities, as a general rule, that when the mortgagee acquires the equity of redemption, in whatever way and whatever he does with his mortgage, he will be regarded as holding the legal and equitable title separately, if his interest requires this severance. The law presumes the intention to be in accordance with his real interest, whatever he may at the time have seemed to intend." Id. § 873. These principles are not questioned by appellant, but he contends that plaintiff,—having a right either to stand upon his legal title, or repudiate it, and have recourse to his mortgage,—by bringing his action to enjoin the sale of the land, with knowledge of appellant's judgment, apparently upon the theory that he held the absolute title free from the lien of that judgment, plainly manifested the intention to assert a merger, and made an unequivocal election to stand upon such legal title, which effectually estopped and precluded him, as against appellant, from thereafter resorting to his mortgage, and proceeding upon the theory that no merger had in fact been intended; and it is claimed that the court below erred in not finding upon said plea of estoppel, and that the judgment must, for that reason, be reversed.

But we do not regard the facts relied on as constituting an estoppel against plaintiff. Certainly, the mere fact that plaintiff in his original complaint proceeded upon a somewhat erroneous theory as to the relief which he was entitled to have under the facts alleged cannot, in reason, be held to constitute such conclusive evidence of an election as to preclude him from thereafter and in the same action so amending his complaint as to entitle him to the relief which the facts otherwise warranted. The only obstacle under the original complaint to the relief which he was eventually awarded was the failure to make Tunison, the mortgagor, a party defendant. But for that defect, plaintiff could have had, under his prayer for general relief, all that the judgment now gives him. This defect was susceptible of being cured by the amendment, which it was clearly within the discretion of the court to allow, and thereupon the original complaint was superseded in the action for all purposes. Nor do we see anything in aid of appellant's contention in the fact that subsequent to the amendment of his complaint plaintiff saw fit to preserve a bill of exceptions to the order dissolving the injunction, and thereafter, as incidentally appears, took an appeal from that order. This mere tentative effort to preserve his right to have that order reviewed did not necessarily imply an election or intention to eventually abide by the attitude assumed in the original complaint. Such intention was in fact negated by amending his complaint, and proceeding to judgment thereunder. Moreover, it does not appear that plaintiff ever took any further steps towards the prosecution of said appeal. It is true that a party having inconsistent remedies may not pursue both, but must choose between them; and, having clearly elected to proceed upon one, will be debarred from invoking the other. But what amounts to such election is not always clear. The general rule undoubtedly is that the remedy first sought must be pursued to judgment (Herm. Estop. § 1057), and the cases relied on by appellant mostly present instances of that character. Some of them go to the extent of holding that, where a party has brought his action in pursuit of one remedy, he cannot, by dismissing it before judgment, be permitted to pursue another and different remedy, but that the commencement of the first is a conclusive election by which he is bound. Whether this extension of the doctrine is one sustained by the reason of the rule, and so to be commended, need not be determined, since the facts do not, as we have seen, bring this case within it. While the amendment of the complaint worked a change in some respects in the character and extent of the relief which could be awarded thereunder, it was not, as appellant, in effect, contends, in any just sense a discontinuance or abandonment of the action as originally brought. The doctrine of election, as applied to a choice of remedies, which precludes a party from claiming repugnant rights, is but an extension of the general principles of equitable estoppel, and proceeds upon a like theory, that the inconsistent attitude of the party will put his adversary to some disadvantage. Here appellant has lost no advantage which he had a legal right to claim. He may still look to the equity of redemption in satisfaction of any lien he may have by virtue of his judgment. It follows that appellant was not injured by the failure of the court below to find upon his plea of estoppel, and this conclusion renders it unnecessary to pass upon the other questions argued. The judgment is affirmed.

In re HALE'S ESTATE. (S. F. 935.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1898.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—DISTRIBUTION —SOLVENCY OF ESTATE—BONDS FROM LEGATEES.

1. Evidence that an estate was worth $462,000, with an admitted present indebtedness of $250,000, an undetermined demand for $160,000, and a probable expense of settling the estate of $24,000, and that the income thereof was insufficient to pay interest, expenses, and taxes, does not sustain a finding, for the purpose of an order of partial distribution, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1658-1663, that the estate was but little indebted, and that deferred payments amounting to over $5,000, and annuities aggregating $150 per month, could be paid annuitants without loss to creditors.

2. Failure of a court to take a bond from legatees receiving a partial distribution is error, unless excused by Code Civ. Proc. § 1663, authorizing it, when the time to present claims has expired, and all claims allowed are paid, or sufficiently secured, and the court is satisfied the estate will not be injured.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition by Mary Hale and others for an order for the payment of annuities from the estate of Joseph P. Hale, deceased. From an order therefor, the administratrix and others appeal. Reversed.

A. D. Keyes and Galpin & Zeigler, for appellants. Mat Clarken, Osgood Putnam, and M. Cooney, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. By his will the deceased, among other dispositions, left to Mary Hale and Margaret Ryan, his sisters, and John Hale, a brother, each a bequest in the nature of a life annuity in the sum of $50 per month. The will was probated in May, 1893. In June, 1896, the respondents filed petitions in the court below setting up that said annuities had not been paid; that the estate was in a condition to pay the same; and praying a distribution thereof; and asking that the amounts accrued thereon, respectively, be ordered paid at once, and that thereafter the monthly payments be made as they should fall due. The widow, as administratrix with the will annexed and as a devisee under the will, and the daughter, as a devisee, and certain creditors of the estate, made opposition to the granting of the petitions, setting up that the estate was largely indebted, and that such distribution could not then be had without detriment to the interests of the estate and injury to the creditors. The petitions were heard together, and the court made findings of fact, upon which it based an order granting the distribution asked. The order directed the administratrix to pay to Mary Hale $2,492.36, to John Hale a like sum, and to Margaret Ryan $622.20, found to be the amounts, respectively, accrued and unpaid upon said annuities, and directed the administratrix to thereafter make payments upon said annuities monthly as they should fall due. These amounts were directed to be paid out of any funds then in the hands of the administratrix, or which should thereafter be received by her from the rents or profits of a certain parcel of real estate upon which, by the terms of the will, said annuities were made primarily chargeable. From this order the parties making the opposition thereto appeal.

1. The objection most strongly urged against the propriety of the order is that the evidence does not sustain the findings upon which the order rests, and we are satisfied that this objection must be sustained. The material facts found by the court were: "That the estate of said deceased is but little indebted, and that the shares of said Mary Hale, Margaret Ryan, and John Hale, prayed for in their said petitions, may be allowed to them without loss to the creditors of said estate, and that there will remain in the hands of the administratrix undisturbed, after the payment and delivery to them of their respective shares, sufficient property of the said estate to pay in full all claims and debts against any and all creditors of said estate, and also all costs and expenses of administration, and all devises and legacies under the will of said testator."

This finding is placed among the conclusions of law as a legal deduction from certain probative facts found by the court, but it is, nevertheless, a finding of facts, and, indeed, embraces the essential, ultimate facts which are indispensable under the statute to authorize and empower the court to make the order in question. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1658-1663, inclusive. These sections authorize an order of partial distribution only in the event that "it appears that the estate is but little indebted, and that the share of the party applying may be allowed to him without loss to the creditors of the estate." Id. §§ 1661, 1663. Without the existence of these facts, the court cannot competently make such an order, even in the absence of opposition thereto. In re Painter, 115 Cal. 635, 640, 47 Pac. 700. The contemplation of the statute is that, unless these facts exist, there is no right to partial distribution, no matter what the condition of the estate may be in other respects.

Neither the probative findings of the court nor the evidence in the case sustain the finding as to the existence of these jurisdictional facts. The evidence was without conflict, and shows, in substance, this: The value of the entire assets of the estate remaining at the time of the hearing, exclusive of certain corporate stock in the Flores Hale Company, the value of which was not ascertained, was shown to be about $462,000, consisting almost exclusively of real estate. The allowed claims and demands existing and unpaid against the estate at that time amounted, as found by the court, to $235,000. This amount, however, covers only the principal of the allowed claims, and does not include unpaid interest on the unsecured claims, which item, ignored by the finding, amounted at the time to about $25,000, augmenting the indebtedness by that sum. The finding also ignores the existence of a rejected claim for the sum of $160,000, a suit for which was then pending against the estate and undetermined. Of the total amount of the admitted indebtedness about $117,000—consisting of one claim of $50,000 and another of $67,000—was secured by mortgage on the real property of the estate. Another claim of about $3,000 was secured by personal property in the hands of the creditor, and the balance of about $107,000 was unsecured. The interest on the mortgage indebtedness the administratrix had been compelled to keep paid in order to avoid threatened foreclosure and forced sale of the property, which, as the evidence tends to show, would have entailed great sacrifice and loss to the estate. The interest on the unsecured claims, as indicated above, had not been paid, but had accumulated since their allowance, a period of about three years. The income from the property of the estate was shown to be at the time of the application about $1,500 per month. The interest on the mortgage indebtedness alone is shown to amount to considerably more than $700 per month; the necessary expense of maintaining and caring for the property of the estate, collecting rents, etc., was upward of $400 per month, exclusive of taxes and interest; the taxes on the property of the estate are about $3,500 a year, the amount of the insurance not appearing; the family allowance to the widow is $350 per month,—thus making an aggregate monthly outgo, without payment of the interest accruing on the unsecured debts, of some $1,700 or $1,800. The amount of ready funds in the hands of the administratrix at the date of the application is not shown, but at the date of her last previous statement, rendered some two months prior thereto, there appeared but a little over $300 cash on hand, and no sales of property had been made thereafter. These figures are given in round numbers, but they are, we think, in every instance, within the limits shown by the evidence. In fact, the only real attack upon this showing by respondents is the claim that the item of 58,000 shares in the Flores Hale Company, above referred to, found to be an asset of the estate, should be included in estimating the value of the property, and which they claim was shown to be worth from $100 to $200 per share. But there is no proper basis for this claim. While the court finds this stock to be one of the assets, it ex industria fails to place any value upon it; nor was there any competent evidence from which such value could be ascertained. The property of the company is situated wholly in Mexico, and the stock has never paid any dividends, nor has it any market value. It was returned unvalued in the inventory, and there the finding of the court properly left it. Even if the vague estimate of the witnesses as to its possible value could be regarded for any purpose, its consideration was for the court below, and it has ignored it.

We have, then, an estate valued at $462,000, with an admitted present indebtedness, including interest, of over $250,000, an undetermined demand for $160,000, and a probable additional expense of $24,000, found to be the probable expense of closing the estate, aggregating a possible indebtedness of considerably over $400,000. This statement leaves no necessity for argument to show that the finding that the estate is but little indebted is not supported by the evidence. In estimating the indebtedness for the purposes of this order, the court could not ignore and leave out of account the undetermined demand of $160,000 while it still remained a possibility, however improbable its recovery may have appeared, since, obviously, the court could not definitely say that it would not eventually be established. But, independently of this consideration, the amount of the fixed obligations shown, considering the value of the assets and the condition of the estate generally, wholly negative the finding. It is true, as said in Crock-er's Estate, 105 Cal. 368, 38 Pac. 954, that the requirement of the statute that the estate shall be but little indebted is to be construed relatively, and not absolutely, and "merely refers to a condition of things in which the debts are small when considered in connection with the value of the estate." But, whether this requirement of the statute be construed relatively or absolutely, the condition shown to exist in this state does not bring it within the statute.

Nor can it be truly said, under the evidence, that this order can be sustained without injury to the creditors of the estate. It does not follow that the latter will not be injured because there may remain assets sufficient to meet their demands at some possible future time. Where claims have been established, creditors have a right primarily to have them first paid before the property is taken by the devisees or heirs; and, if the distribution of property to the latter is to result in postponing or deferring that payment, the creditors are thereby injured. The statute expressly contemplates that it is only where the distribution will not injuriously interfere with the ability of the estate to meet the demands of creditors that it may be had. Here the evidence shows beyond question that to take the money necessary to pay respondents, at this time, will not only necessarily deprive the administratrix of the means to pay the accruing interest on the allowed demands and the current expenses of administration, but will in all probability greatly embarrass the estate by requiring a sacrifice of its property at forced sale. Such a result is not within the purposes of the statute. It in no way aids respondents' position that the payment to them is ordered to be made only out of funds derived from the income of property upon which their annuities are primarily made a charge. That property is as much chargeable with the debts and other obligations of the estate as any other, if it shall be necessary to resort thereto for such purpose, and the evidence does not show that such resort will not be required.

2. There is but one other objection which we deem it necessary at this time to notice. The court below very clearly erred in dispensing with the necessity of a bond by the respondents to answer for their proportion of the debts of the estate. The only circumstances under which the giving of such bond may be excused upon a partial distribution is where it appears that the time for presenting claims against the estate has expired, "and all claims that have been allowed have been paid or are secured by mortgage upon real estate sufficient to pay them, and the court is satisfied that no injury can result to the estate." Code Civ. Proc. § 1663; St. 1889, p. 93. The evidence here admittedly shows that a large proportion of the demands were unsecured by mortgage or otherwise, and that such unsecured demands had not been paid. The case was therefore not one in which the court was authorized to dispense with the requirement of a bond. For these reasons the order must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

WHEELER v. ELDRED et al. (S. F. 759.)<sup>1</sup>

EXECUTION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Allowing execution on judgment of foreclosure more than five years after entry is within the sound discretion of the court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, as amended in 1895, providing that "in all cases the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution" after lapse of five years from entry, "by leave of court, on motion, or by judgment for that purpose, founded on supplemental pleadings."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county.

Action by Sam Wheeler against Horace A. Eldred and others. From order denying plaintiff's motion, he appeals. Affirmed.

Henley & Costello, for appellant. J. A. Cooper and J. H. Seawell, for respondents.

BRITT, C. In this action a judgment of foreclosure, directing the sale of certain mortgaged lands, was entered in favor of the plaintiff on April 23, 1890. The period of five years allowed by the statute for issuing process as of course on the judgment having expired, and no sale having been made, the plaintiff noticed a motion in January, 1896, for leave to carry the judgment into execution, pursuant to section 685, Code Civ. Proc. It is provided in said section, as amended in the year 1895, that "in all cases the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion, or by judgment for that purpose founded upon supplemental pleadings," etc. The court denied the motion.

Several interesting questions are raised in argument touching the effect, and even the validity, of said amended section of the Code. Only one of them need be now examined. Plaintiff does not contend that the denial of his motion was, in view of the evidence before the court at the hearing, an abuse of discretion, if the court can exercise discretion in such cases; but he claims that, under the statute, the court had no discretion to refuse his application. In our judgment, this position cannot be maintained. By statute in New York, "after the lapse of five years from the entry of a final judgment, execution can be issued thereupon * * * (2) where an order is made by the court granting leave to issue the execution." Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. § 1377. And it is there held by the court of appeals that the effect of this provision, in a case within its terms, is to render the allowance of a writ of possession on a judgment for the recovery of lands a matter "resting wholly in the discretion of the court." Van Rensselaer v. Wright, 121 N. Y. 626, 25 N. E. 3. See Bank v. Eden, 17 Johns. 106, which asserts discretion in the court whether it would allow a scire facias on a judgment of more than 20 years' standing. Also, as to the discretionary power of a court of equity to refuse, upon circumstances, to carry a former decree into execution when by reason of neglect to enforce the same, or for other cause, it becomes necessary to file a bill for that purpose, see Attorney General v. Day, 1 Ves. Sr. 218; Lawrence Mfg. Co. v. Janesville Cotton Mills, 138 U. S. 552, 11 Sup. Ct. 402. Aside from authority, it seems to us manifestly politic, at least in actions where title to real property is involved, that the court should not be bound to allow the enforcement of the judgment after lapse of five years; otherwise, the judgment becomes a perpetual incumbrance by mere neglect of the owner thereof to execute it. We think, therefore, that the provision of said section 685 that "the judgment may be enforced by leave of the court," is permissive as regards the power given to the court in actions like the present, and that the court must determine, in the exercise of a sound discretion, whether the dormant judgment shall be enforced. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

BROKER—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATION TO PRINCIPAL—CONTINUANCE.

1. A broker who fraudulently represented to the principal, whose money he was loaning, that the security was good, is liable, though the principal was in a position to have examined the security.

2. The recovery in action by principal against broker, for fraudulently representing that the worthless property on which loan was made was good security, is not affected by the question whether he shared the money with, or delivered any part of it to, the pretended borrower.

3. There is no error in denying continuance because of defendant's sickness; there having been a previous continuance on this ground, on stipulation that there should be no further postponement on that ground, and it not appearing that defendant's presence would have been of any avail.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by Sarah V. Rubens against Mary N. Mead, executrix. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. Rose and C. Edgerton, for appellant.
W. D. Gould and J. D. Pope, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant's testator, Alexander J. Mead, was engaged in the business of loaning money upon real-estate security for others who might intrust such business to him, and advising them in reference thereto, and was employed by the plaintiff for that purpose. Under his advice, and upon his representations as to the value and condition of the land offered as security, the plaintiff made certain loans of money, for which he took in her name the promissory notes and mortgages of the borrowers. The land so offered was of no value, and the loans were not repaid. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the amount of money so loaned, upon the ground, as alleged in her complaint, that, at the time the loans were made, Mead knew that the land was worthless, and that the representations made by him and his advice to her were made and given with the intention and purpose on his part to defraud her of the money. The court found that the allegations of the complaint were true, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant has appealed, upon the ground that the decision is not sustained by the evidence.

We are of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence before the court to sustain its decision. The appellant questions its sufficiency only in reference to one of the loans,—the one made to Harris,—and urges that the statements of Mead were only matters of opinion, and that, as the plaintiff had full opportunity to test their correctness by examining the land for herself, she could not hold him liable for any erroneous opinion. Mead, however, was the agent of the plaintiff, and was not dealing with her as a contracting party, and the rules applicable to statements made by a vendor of the quality of the article offered by him have no application. The plaintiff was entitled to rely upon the statements of Mead. He was bound to act with the utmost good faith towards her, and is not at liberty to say that she would not have been defrauded if she had been more vigilant, and had been suspicious of his good faith. It was sufficiently shown that the land was worthless, and the evidence justified the court in finding that Mead knew this fact, and fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that it was a good security for the loan. When he visited her for the purpose of inducing her to make the loan, he told her that the security was thoroughly good, and that he knew that it was. It is true that he had previously told the plaintiff's daughter that he had not seen the land; but he also told her that he had himself owned the land, and had just sold it to Harris, and that he considered it a desirable loan. Harris said to her that he was unable to show her the land, but referred her to one Gardemeyer, who appears to have had relations with Mead in some respect. Mead did not pretend to have much knowledge of Harris,—only that he thought him a straightforward business man,—but impressed upon the plaintiff that the security of the land was all that she needed to be concerned about.

As the cause of action against Mead is not for the money which he received from the plaintiff, but for fraudulently inducing her to part with it, it is immaterial whether he shared it with Harris, or delivered it all to him. He stated that he had "just sold" the land to Harris, and manifested to the plaintiff a great desire that she should make the loan; and, as the money was loaned to Harris through him, it was presumptively delivered to him as a part of the scheme to defraud the plaintiff. Harris made no appearance after the loan had been made, and could not be found by the plaintiff.

The court did not err in refusing to grant a continuance on the ground of the defendant's illness. The cause had been once continued upon this ground, upon the stipulation that no further request for a postponement on that ground should be made; and it was not shown that her presence would be of any avail, or that she knew of any fact bearing upon the case. The judgment and order are affirmed.

3. Default judgment entered before expiration of time to answer will be set aside, though the only answer filed, which was subsequent to entry of default, was improperly signed by defendant, instead of by his attorney, who had appeared, and had not been displaced; as, but for the default, proper answer might have been filed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county.

Action by Maria C. Crane against John N. Crane. From default judgment and order denying motion to set it aside, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Collier & Evans, for appellant. J. W. McIntyre, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Suit for divorce, division of common property, etc. The question on appeal relates to the action of the court below in denying defendant's motion to set aside a default entered against him, and to vacate the judgment subsequently rendered on the ex parte application of plaintiff. Said motion was made in due season, and on the grounds of surprise and excusable neglect, and that the default was entered before plaintiff was entitled thereto. Defendant appeared in the action by attorney, and his demurrer to the complaint was overruled. Afterwards, on June 27, 1896, the attorney for plaintiff, as appears from his affidavit used in opposition to defendant's said motion, "entered into a verbal stipulation with the attorney for defendant, giving him a further week, ending Saturday, July 4, 1896, in which to answer." On Monday, July 6th, an answer prepared and signed by defendant in person was served on the attorney for plaintiff, and filed with the clerk of the court; but after service of such answer on him, and before the filing thereof, the plaintiff's attorney caused the entry of the default. The course taken by the attorney for plaintiff seems to have been the result of the understanding on his part that an answer should not be filed after July 4th. It is only fair to him to say that he makes no point on the fact that his stipulation was not in writing; but as he agreed with opposing counsel that the latter should have a week ending Saturday, July 4th, in which to answer, and as both that day and the day following were legal holidays, it is clear that the effect of the agreement was to extend the time for answering to July 6th, inclusive; and the default entered on that day was premature. Code Civ. Proc. § 13; Blackwood v. Packing Co., 71 Cal. 461, 12 Pac. 493. This was so although the stipulation was not made a matter of record. It was yet sufficient to repel the imputation of negligence on the part of defendant. Huart v. Goyeneche, 56 Cal. 429; Johnson v. Sweeney, 95 Cal. 304, 30 Pac. 540. Defendant's conduct in presenting an answer signed by himself personally was irregular, the attorneys by whom he had previously appeared not having been displaced in any manner (Board v. Younger, 29 Cal. 147); but the circumstance is of little importance in the case, for the entry of default, if rightful, precluded the filing of any answer at all. Had the default not been entered, non constat but that an answer free from any legal objection would have been duly filed. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to set aside the default, and allow an answer properly signed to be filed within a reasonable time.

(L. A. 331.)<sup>1</sup>

DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE FOR INTEREST—TAX-PAYER.

In an action against a city to set aside, as illegal and void, its contract for waterworks, and to enjoin the issuance of bonds therefor, where it appeared that the issuance of the bonds would necessitate a special tax for 40 years, and directly affect the value of all realty subject to it, the trial judge is disqualified, by virtue of his owning land in such city and paying taxes thereon, since he is "interested" in the action, within Code Civ. Proc. § 170.

Harrison and Van Fleet, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Consolidated actions by Albert Meyer and the San Diego Water Company against the city of San Diego and others. R. Nicolls and others intervened as plaintiffs. From an order refusing plaintiffs' and interveners' motion for a change of venue, they appeal. Reversed.

L. L. Boone, for appellants. Works & Works, W. H. Fuller, Trippet & Neale, Gibson & Titus, H. E. Doolittle, and T. L. Lewis, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The plaintiff instituted an action against the city of San Diego, and against the Southern California Mountain Water Company, for the twofold purpose (1) of setting aside as illegal and void a contract between the city and the water company defendant, involving an expenditure of $1,500,000 of the moneys of the city to be obtained by the sale of its bonds; and (2) to enjoin the issuance and sale of the bonds to carry out the contract.

The bond issue had been voted at a special election called under an ordinance submitting to the electors the proposition of incurring a bonded debt of $1,500,000 "for the acquisition by said city, for the use of said city and of its inhabitants, of and from the Southern California Mountain Water Company, of a water right, reservoir sites, a meter-house site, and rights of way, and for the construction by said city of waterworks for the use of said city and its inhabitants." The controlling acts under which the election was held and the bonds voted are the statutes relating to the issuance of municipal bonds for public improvements. St. 1889, p. 399; St. 1891, p. 132; and St. 1893, p. 61. These acts prescribe, not only the mode by which such indebtedness may be incurred, but ordain as well the limit of indebtedness, the character of the bonds, the rate of interest, and the place of payment. They also enjoin upon the municipal authorities the duty of levying and collecting a special annual tax sufficient to pay interest, and provide a sinking fund for the ultimate redemption of the bonds.

Plaintiff is a taxpayer of the city. Other taxpayers were allowed to intervene in the cause. The San Diego Water Company had instituted a similar suit against these defendants, and the actions were consolidated.

Before the trial there was presented a motion for a change of venue, upon the ground of the disqualification of Judge Torrance, in whose department the action was pending. Grounds identical with those urged as disqualifying Judge Torrance were asserted to exist in the case of the other judges of the superior court of the county. The affidavits used at the hearing show that the judge was the owner of real property situated and taxed in the city of San Diego for municipal purposes, and taxable for the payment of a bonded indebtedness such as that the validity of which is a question in the case. It also was made to appear that the issuance of the bonds in controversy and the carrying out of the contract between the city and the defendant water company would necessitate a special tax for 40 years, and directly affect the value of all real property subject to it. Upon the other hand, a determination that the contract and proceedings were illegal would result in a decree enjoining the issuance of the bonds, and relieve all property within the municipality from the burden of the bond-redemption tax. The trial judge concluded that he was not disqualified, refused to grant the motion, and retained the action. From this ruling and order the San Diego Water Company and certain interveners prosecute their appeals.

By section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that no justice, judge, or justice of the peace shall sit or act in any action or proceeding to which he is a party or in which he is interested. This is but an expression of the ancient maxim that no man ought to be a judge in his own cause,—a maxim which appeals so strongly to the sense of justice that it is said by Lord Coke to be a natural right, so inflexible that an act of parliament seeking to subvert it would be declared void. Co. Litt. § 212. It is a principle which finds expression in the constitutions of many of our states, which declare the right of a citizen to be tried by judges as free and impartial as the lot of humanity will permit. It is a principle whose strict observance is dictated both by natural justice and an enlightened public policy; for it is not enough that a judicial decision be sound. It is of next importance that the tribunal rendering it be free from the charge of interest or the taint of partiality, else public confidence will be destroyed and judicial usefulness gravely impaired.

But what is the "interest" which will disqualify? for it is manifest that just bounds must be set to the meaning of the word, since, if a judge be not disqualified, it is as much his duty to retain the action as it is to remove it when the recusal is well founded. Heinlen v. Heilbron, 97 Cal. 101, 31 Pac. 838.

In the oft-quoted case of Hesketh v. Brad-dock, 3 Burrows, 1856, the interest imputed to the jurors, and to the officer who returned them, rested upon the fact that they were members of the municipal corporation which was seeking to recover a penalty due. The whole penalty was but five pounds, yet the proceeding was quashed by the court of king's bench, Lord Mansfield saying: "The law has so watchful an eye to the pure and unbiased administration of justice that it will never trust the passions of mankind in the decisions of any matter of right. * * * There is no principle in the law more settled than this: that any degree, even the smallest degree, of interest in the question depending, is a decisive objection to a witness, and much more so to a juror, or to the officer by whom the juror is returned. If, therefore, the sheriff, a juror, or a witness be in any sort interested in the matter to be tried, the law considers him as under an influence which may warp his integrity or pervert his judgment, and therefore will not trust him. The minuteness of the interest won't relax the objection, for the degrees cannot be measured. No line can be drawn but that of a total exclusion of all degrees whatsoever." But this, it should be noted, is rather a declaration of the principle than a definition of the disqualifying interest; and while in terms this case does not include the judge as coming within the principle of disqualification, it is not to be doubted that it applies with equal strength, and with more reason, to such an officer. Dimes v. Canal Co., 16 Eng. Law & Eq. 63. The disability of a witness to testify because of interest induced great hardship and led to many absurdities. Thus, one was not debarred from being a witness if it was determined that his interest was equally balanced, nor was the heir apparent to an estate incompetent to testify in support of the claim of his ancestor, though his expectation of inheriting might be immediate and well-nigh certain. Again, the interest of a parent in a child, or of the child in the parent, was not a disqualifying interest, but only such as to affect the credibility of the witness. The injustice and hardship of the rule as to witnesses soon became so apparent that by statute it was entirely abrogated, and now no interest disqualifies a witness, its sole effect being to impair his credit.

In the case of jurors, however, who are judges of the fact, and of the magistrates, judges, and justices, who are judges of the law, and frequently both of the law and facts, there has been far less relaxation of the principle; and this, if for no other reason, because the courts themselves, in their desire to preserve the administration of justice free from the taint of unfairness, have inclined to a strict enforcement of the principle, and also because there are well-defined limits to the power of the legislature, should it ever seek to overthrow so salutary a rule. Thus, in North Bloomfield Min. Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 315, this court, citing section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, declares that the provision should not receive a technical or strict construction, but rather one that is broad and liberal; and quotes with approval the language of the supreme court of Michigan in Stockwell v. Board, 22 Mich. 350, to the following effect: "The court ought not to be astute to discover refined and subtle distinctions to save a case from the operation of the maxim when the principle embodied bespeaks the propriety of its application. The immediate rights of the litigants are not the only objects of the rule. A sound public policy, which is interested in preserving every tribunal appointed by law from discredit, imperiously demands its observance." And in Heilbron v. Campbell, 23 Pac. 122, it is said again by this court: "It should be the duty and desire of every judge to avoid the very appearance of bias, prejudice, or partiality, and to this end he should decline to sit * * * in any case in which his interest in the subject-matter of the action is such as would naturally influence him either one way or the other.

Upon the latter proposition, that of the power of the legislature to modify or abrogate the rule, statutes have been passed and upheld by the courts which remove the disqualification of jurors and of judges who are merely corporators of a municipal corporation and taxpayers therein, which corporation is a party interested. These statutes have been countenanced by the courts upon the ground that the interest of the juror or judge is so remote, trifling, and insignificant that it may fairly be supposed to be incapable of affecting the judgment or of influencing the conduct of the individual. These statutes, it is to be remembered, however, are in derogation of the common-law rule, and it will always be a judicial question, as to any particular statute, whether or not, by its terms or in its effect, it violates this fundamental principle of judicial decision. Thus, Judge Cooley: "But, except in cases resting upon such reasons, we do not see how the legislature can have any power to abolish a maxim which is among the fundamentals of judicial authority. The people of the state when framing their constitution may possibly establish so great an anomaly, if they see fit; but, if the legislature is intrusted with apportioning and providing for the exercise of the judicial power, we cannot understand it to be authorized, in the execution of this trust, to do that which has never been recognized as being within the province of the judicial authority." Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) p. 508. The only other exception to the operation of the maxim is that which arises in the nature of the government of the state, and has its existence in absolute necessity. Thus, to illustrate, where the legality of a bonded indebtedness of the state comes before its tribunals, they must act, or the right remain forever without the possibility of its remedy. In such cases, however, the judges are as fair and impartial as the lot of humanity doth permit, and trial before such is all that the constitution, or Lord Coke's jus nature, can preserve to any man.

It has been pointed out that in most of the states the common-law rule disqualifying a juror for interest by reason of the fact that he is a corporator of the city or town which is a party to the suit has been changed by statute, and that these statutes have been upheld by the courts upon the ground of the remoteness and contingency of the interest. In our own state, section 602 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares the grounds upon which challenges for cause may be taken; and subdivision 5 provides, as a ground of challenge, "interest on the part of the juror in the event of the action, or in the main question involved in the action, except his interest as a member or citizen of a municipal corporation." Nothing herein expressly removes the disqualification of the judge, which, alike with that of the juror, existed at common law. But, if the interest of a juror so situated is too remote to disqualify him as a trier of fact, equally, it may be argued, would a like interest be insufficient to disqualify a judge; and thus, without express statutory enactment upon the question, the conduct of judges in trying actions, where the sole ground of their disqualification is the fact that they are corporators and taxpayers of the municipal corporation which is a party thereto, has always been countenanced and upheld. Yet here it may be remarked that the state is not without some statutory enactments upon the question. Many may be found conferring upon municipal courts and the judges therein jurisdiction of petty offenses for the violation of ordinances and for the collection of revenues under such ordinances. It has never been, and at this day may not be, seriously questioned that a judge of such municipal court is not disqualified by reason of interest merely because of the fact that he is a member and taxpayer of the municipal corporation, either in civil cases where its ordinances are under consideration, or in criminal cases where the penalties, fines, and forfeitures for the violation of such ordinances accrue to the municipal treasury.

In a very great number of the cases which have come under review in the consideration of this question, nearly all have to do with the interest of the judge or juror as a member of such public corporation, and in these, where the ancient rule has not been modified by statute, that rule is for the most part observed in all its strictness. Of these cases there may be cited as instructive upon the question: State v. Stuart, 23 Me. 112; State v. Woodward, 34 Me. 293; Com. v. Ryan, 5 Mass. 90; Pearce v. Atwood, 13

Mass. 324; Trustees v. Bailey, 10 Fla. 213; Moses v. Julian, 45 N. H. 52; Inhabitants of North Hampton v. Smith, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 390; Foreman v. Town of Mariana, 43 Ark. 324; Peck v. Freeholders of Essex, 21 N. J. Law, 656; Sauls v. Freeman, 24 Fla. 209, 4 South. 525; Com. v. Reed, 1 Gray, 472; Ellis v. Smith, 42 Ala. 349; Fine v. Public Schools, 30 Mo. 166; Stockwell v. Board, 22 Mich. 341; Fiske v. Paine (R. I.) 28 Atl. 1026; Dimes v. Canal Co., 16 Eng. Law & Eq. 63; Oakley v. Aspinwall, 3 N. Y. 547.

In Inhabitants of North Hampton v. Smith, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 390, Chief Justice Shaw, with his usual clearness, has defined this disqualifying interest. He says: "(1) We think it is not to be a mere possible, contingent interest, not an interest in the question or general subject to which the matter requiring adjudication relates, but one that is visible, demonstrable, and capable of precise proof. * * * It must, therefore, depend upon facts capable of being precisely averred and proved, and thus put in issue and tried. (2) It must be a pecuniary or proprietary interest,—a relation by which, as debtor or creditor, an heir or legatee, or otherwise, he will gain or lose something by the result of the proceedings,—in contradistinction to an interest of feeling or sympathy or bias, which would disqualify a juror. [It may be here remarked, to prevent misunderstanding, that, by an amendment to section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, bias or prejudice upon the part of the judge is now made a ground of disqualification, and a reason for the removal of a cause.] (3) It must be certain, and not merely possible or contingent. It must be direct and personal, though such a personal interest may result from a relation which the judge holds, as the member of a town, parish, or other corporation, where it is not otherwise provided by law, if such corporation has a pecuniary or proprietary interest in the proceedings."

Thus, the interest which one has in a public question, merely because he is a member of the civic body to be affected by the question, is not the interest which the law has in mind. In the case from which we have just quoted, the judge in probate was not held to be disqualified because in a will before him there was a bequest of money to trustees to be devoted to the use and benefit of indigent persons in certain towns, of one of which the judge was an inhabitant. So, in Foreman v. Town of Mariana, supra, the judge, who was an inhabitant of the town, was not for that reason held to be disqualified to sit in and determine upon proceedings for the annexation of territory to the town, although an election had been called to pass upon the question of annexation, and the judge had voted thereat. And so, in Sauls v. Freeman, 24 Fla. 209, 4 South. 525, the fact that the circuit judge, with other registered voters of the county, had signed a petition addressed to the county commissioners, asking for a change of the county site, did not disqualify him for interest from sitting in a mandamus proceeding to compel the commissioners to call an election upon the question. In these and like cases the so-called "interest" of the judge is found to be remote, doubtful, and speculative, in no way certain in fact, nor susceptible of precise measurement.

But, upon the other hand, where, in any litigation, there is any certain, definable, pecuniary, or proprietary interest or relation which will be directly affected by the judgment that may be rendered, in every such case, without exception, so far as an exhaustive examination of the authorities goes, the disqualification of the judge is held to exist. Has the judge any pecuniary or personal right or privilege directly affected by or immediately dependent upon the result of the case? As that question is answered, so is answered the question of his disqualification for the interest which we have been considering. In Hellbron v. Campbell, 23 Pac. 122, the action was between divers claimants to a tract of land to which the judge himself asserted title. The judge was not a party to the suit, nor would the judgment rendered be binding between him and the other litigants. Yet this court in bank held the interest to be disqualifying, and properly so; for, though generally speaking, an interest in the legal question, as distinguished from a pecuniary interest in the result of the case, is no valid ground of disqualification, there is to this the well-settled exception that where the judge has a lawsuit pending or impending with another person, which rests upon a like state of facts, or upon the same point of law as that pending before him, this is a valid ground of recusation. Davis v. Allen, 11 Pick. 466; Moses v. Julian, 45 N. H. 52.

In Mining Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 315, the action was by the city of Marysville to restrain the mining company from prosecuting its hydraulic work, because the effect of its mining operations was to injure the lands of the corporation. The judge owned land, not within the municipality, but similarly situated, and equally affected by the mining operations complained of. In an action for an injunction by the city against the mining company it was held that the judge had such a direct and immediate interest in the result of the action as to disqualify him.

Even more immediate and direct is the interest of the judge in the case at bar than that which appeared in the North Bloomfield Min. Co. Case. The disqualification does not spring from the fact that the judge is a citizen, inhabitant, and taxpayer of the city of San Diego, nor yet from the fact that the municipality is a party litigant in the action. It arises from the circumstance that he owns property within the city which may or may not be liable for the burden of a special tax for the period of 40 years, as he shall decide. The validity of this tax is directly called in question. The judge himself, under the circumstances shown, could have instituted as plaintiff this identical action. "The rule is well settled that where the parties interested are numerous, and the suit is for an object common to them all, some of the body may maintain a bill on behalf of themselves and of the others." Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 97, 98; 1 Freem. Judgm. § 178; Brown v. Trousdale, 138 U. S. 389, 11 Sup. Ct. 308; Gamble v. City of San Diego, 79 Fed. 487. He would have been entitled to intervene as well as those who in fact have intervened. The judgment which he renders in the case will be binding upon his rights and his property. His interest is in the outcome of the litigation, and it is a direct, measurable, pecuniary interest.

The distinction between this case and that of City of Oakland v. Oakland Water-Front Co., 118 Cal. 249, 50 Pac. 268, is readily to be observed. Here, as has been said and shown, the judge is to decide directly whether or not property which he owns shall be made subject to the burden of a special tax. In the Oakland Water-Front Case the city sought to recover lands which had been granted to it by the state under certain trusts. Even if the city succeeded, it was at least doubtful whether the control of these lands would result in profit or loss to its finances. It was still more doubtful whether their management would affect the tax rate of the city in the slightest degree. The judge had no other interest in the litigation than that which he possessed in common with other taxpayers, and which arose from the fact that he was an inhabitant and taxpayer of the city. It was not a direct, measurable, or pecuniary interest in the litigation or its outcome. The interest was remote, contingent, and speculative. It might thus be fairly stated: "If the city recovered the property, and if it successfully managed or sold it, the result might be to lessen the rate of taxation, and thus, under all these contingencies, to reduce in some slight, indeterminate, and undeterminable extent the tax rate upon the judge's property. Clearly, such a remote and contingent interest is readily to be distinguished from that in the case at bar, where the judge, in a cause directly involving the legality of a tax imposed and to be imposed upon his land, does by his ipse dixit declare whether the burden shall remain or be removed.

In City of Austin v. Nalle, 85 Tex. 520, 22 S. W. 668, 960, the question of the interest of the judge under circumstances identical with those of the case at bar was presented, and the court reached the conclusion here declared. The same principle was invoked and the same ruling made in Wetzel v. State, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 17, 23 S. W. 825, and again in State v. City of Cisco (Tex. Civ. App.) 33 S. W. 244.

It is urged that the case of Wade v. Travla

Co., 72 Fed. 985, is authority against this position. This is in a measure true. It was an action in the circuit court of the Western division of Texas, and the question of the disqualification of a federal judge by reason of his pecuniary interest, under facts similar to those here presented, was considered by the court. Its decision upon the proposition is in the following language: "Authorities examined by the court leave the question in some doubt, and, for the purpose of having it definitely determined by an appellate tribunal, we have concluded to hold that that disqualification on the part of the district judge does not exist, and we suggest to counsel the propriety of preserving proper exceptions in order that the point may be conclusively settled by the court of appeals." It may be conceded that so far as it goes this case is against the conclusion which we have reached; but it should be said in this connection that it is the only case of its kind, and, as appears from the language of the learned judge, he decided as he did only in order that the question might be definitively laid at rest by the appellate tribunal.

As it is uncontradicted in this record that the same disqualification which existed in the case of Judge Torrance existed as to the other judges of the superior court of the county, it follows from what has been said that the motion for change of venue should have been granted. The order is therefore reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; GAROUTTE, J.; TEMPLE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal. I also concur generally in the opinion of Mr. Justice HENSHAW, except that I desire to a little more pointedly emphasize the distinction between the case at bar and a case where a city in which the judge is a taxpayer is a party, and where there is merely a possibility that a judgment against the city might result in an increased levy of taxes, and a judgment in favor of the city might bring about a reduction of taxation. In the latter case—and in others that could be mentioned, where a similar principle applies—the interest is too shadowy, indirect, remote, and contingent to be within the rule that a man cannot be a judge in his own case. See City of Dallas v. Peacock, 33 S. W. 220; City of Oakland v. Oakland Water-Front Co. (Cal.) 50 Pac. 268, and cases there cited. But in the case at bar the interest of the judge was not indirect, remote, or contingent; it directly involved the immediate imposition of a special annual tax upon his property to continue for 40 years.

VAN FLEET, J. I dissent. The case is not, to my mind, distinguishable in principle from that decided in City of Oakland v. Oakland Water-Front Co., 118 Cal. 249, 50 Pac.

268, where it was held that the trial judge was not disqualified. The interest of Judge Torrance in the subject of litigation is not different in kind, however much it may differ in degree, from that possessed by the trial judge in that case. In my judgment, the principle announced in the opinion of the court is one susceptible of indefinite extension, to the great detriment of the practical administration of justice, and the application of which to the facts of this case is, I think, opposed by the weight of modern authority.

I dissent: HARRISON, J.

STUFFLEBEEM et al. v. HICKMAN et al.

(Sac. 410.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

TRESPASS—CLAIMANTS UNDER LESSEE.

Owner of land who leases it with understanding that the lessee, if he cannot keep stock of strangers off, shall charge them for the use thereof, cannot maintain trespass against one who, on his cattle intruding thereon, arranges with the lessee to use the land for his stock for the season for a certain amount; and it is immaterial whether the money so collected belonged to the tenant or landowner.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Action by J. H. Stufflebeem and others against A. W. Hickman and others. Judgments for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. G. Lamberson, for appellants. Geo. G. Murry, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought in a justice's court to recover damages for trespass upon real property, by entry thereon with cattle, horses, and other stock, and depasturing the land from May 1, 1893, to November 27, 1893. The cause was, upon the coming in of a sworn answer showing that the trial would involve the issue of possession to the locus in quo, transferred to the superior court for trial. A jury trial was had and a verdict rendered in favor of defendants, upon which judgment was entered for costs. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Defendants A. W. Hickman and Henry Mentz answered jointly, and, among other things, admitted the ownership by plaintiffs of the two sections of land described in the complaint, to wit, sections 27 and 33 in township 20 S., range 29 E., Mt. D. B. and M., county of Tulare, state of California. They denied, however, that plaintiffs were in the possession thereof, or entitled to the possession thereof, during the period when the alleged trespasses were charged to have occurred. On the contrary, they averred that plaintiffs leased said lands to one John McKiernan, who was in possession thereof by virtue of said lease during all of said time; that said McKiernan sublet the same to them, etc. In other words, they claimed to have been lawfully in possession as subtenants under John McKiernan, who was lawfully there.

The only question in the case worthy of comment relates to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. The testimony was somewhat brief, and by no means conclusive; but, such as it was, giving full credence to that of the defendants, as the jury doubtless did, and as in the case of a conflict we are bound to do, in favor of the verdict, we think it sufficient to support the conclusion reached by the jury. The testimony of J. M. McKiernan was in substance that in 1893 he considered he had a verbal lease of the land from plaintiffs; that "he made the lease with John Stufflebeem, one of plaintiffs." He says: "I told John Stufflebeem that I wanted to gather my cattle, and wanted a place to put them, and that I would keep the stock off his land if he would let me use it. He said, if I did not come back on him for pay, all right. I said if I could not keep the stock off the land, I would make them pay for it." It further appeared that the stock of these defendants and of one Hubbs did intrude upon the land, and that thereupon McKiernan arranged with these defendants for them to use the land for their stock for the season, in consideration of twenty dollars, which they paid, and pastured their stock thereon from the early spring until, say, July, when they took it away. A similar arrangement was made and a like payment had from Hubbs. It also appeared that McKiernan was to repair the fence, which he claimed he did. That McKiernan was in possession, and that he sublet to defendants, was not seriously disputed. The conduct of plaintiffs in the premises also lends strength to the theory of defendants. For nearly three years after these transactions, the sole claim of plaintiffs seems to have been that they were entitled to have from McKiernan the $40 which he had received from the subtenants. Failing to recover this, the present action of trespass was brought.

The case of Rogers v. Duhart, 97 Cal. 500, 32 Pac. 570, is relied upon by plaintiffs as in point, and as conclusive in their favor. In that case it was apparent that the defendant had clearly violated the terms under which he was permitted to depasture the land. In this case, we think, the jury was justified in finding from the evidence and conduct of the parties that it was understood that, if McKiernan could not keep the stock of strangers off the land, he was to charge them for the use thereof. Whether or not the plaintiffs were entitled to the moneys thus collected by McKiernan is a question not necessary to be determined in this action. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

FARMERS' & MERCHANTS' BANK OF
STOCKTON v. RICHARDS et al.

(Sac. 251.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

FRAUD AS DEFENSE.

1. No defense to note is shown by answer alleging that, by false representations of plaintiff's officers, defendant was induced to make the note in payment of others previously given for money borrowed by him from plaintiff; no damage being shown.

2. Fraudulent representations, to be defense to note, must be such as to cause defendant to execute the note.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. K. Law, Judge.

Action by the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Stockton against L. A. Richards and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Van R. Paterson and Jas. A. Louttit, for appellants. Budd & Thompson and Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff, a corporation, sued in this action on a promissory note for the sum of $2,703, dated October 6, 1894, made by defendants in plaintiff's favor, and secured by pledge of certain shares of stock, the property of defendant Richards. Judgment was for plaintiff, directing the sale of the stock, and against defendants, personally, for the deficiency, if any, to remain after applying the proceeds of sale to the amount due on the note, etc. The question here is on the propriety of an order of the court below sustaining a demurrer to defendants' answer.

It was alleged in the answer, in substance, among other things, that, at and prior to the date of the note, D. S. Rosenbaum, P. B. Fraser, and D. A. Guernsey were officers of the plaintiff, and were the general managers of its affairs; that the same three persons were co-partners of defendant Richards in the business of farming; that at said date such co-partnership was indebted to said Richards in a sum exceeding $8,000, as his said co-partners and also the plaintiff well knew; that with the intent to procure the execution of said note, and of defrauding said Richards, his co-partners, the said Guernsey, Rosenbaum, and Fraser, falsely represented to him that he had no credits to his account with said co-partnership as one of the members thereof, but was indebted to the same; that Richards, believing such representations to be true, and having no knowledge of the true state of the partnership accounts, "made and executed the promissory note set forth in the complaint herein on the 6th day of October, 1894, in payment of other notes theretofore given by the defendant Richards to plaintiff for money borrowed by him from plaintiff"; that he would not have executed the note but for the said false representations; and that the other defendant, Loughhead, signed the note merely as surety for Richards. It was further averred that said note is held by plaintiff in trust for the sole benefit of Guernsey, Rosenbaum, and Fraser, "for the fraudulent purposes hereinabove alleged." In the last analysis the answer stated no more than that, by the alleged false representations of plaintiff's officers, defendant Richards was induced to make the note in suit in payment of other notes previously given for money borrowed by him from plaintiff. How Richards was injured by this novation is not made to appear. His later obligation is not shown to have been more onerous than the former ones. Fraud without injury gives, in general, neither ground of action nor defense. Again, why should the information that Richards was indebted to the partnership of Guernsey, Rosenbaum, Fraser & Richards have constrained him to execute the note to plaintiff? The relation of cause and effect between the alleged false representation and the execution of the note to plaintiff does not appear from the nature of the alleged transactions, or from any other averments of the answer. That such relation existed was essential to the defense. Kerr, Fraud & M. (Bump's Ed.) p. 74; Byard v. Holmes, 34 N. J. Law, 296. The allegation that plaintiff holds the note in trust for Richards' co-partners, construed with reference to other parts of the answer, is but a statement of matter of law unsupported by averments of fact. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

1. A judge who at one time owned stock in a corporation, but who has disposed of it, is not disqualified from trying an action brought by the corporation to compel a transfer to it of real estate.

2. An allegation in a complaint by a corporation to compel a transfer to it of real estate, that the owners "agreed and contracted that they would sell and deliver to the plaintiff all the real property aforesaid," in consideration of the delivery to them "by plaintiff of forty thousand shares of its capital stock," is sustained by evidence that the owners made the contract with the promoters of the corporation, and that the corporation accepted the contract.

3. A mining corporation brought suit to compel a transfer of mining property to it in accordance with a contract with the owner, and an heir of the owner and a holder of stock in the corporation answered that the majority of plaintiff's stock was held by the owner of an adjoining mine, and that he did not intend to use the property in controversy for mining purposes, but intended to drain the adjoining mine upon it. Held, that this was not a defense.

4. An agreement to sell and convey to a corporation certain real property for an agreed quantity of corporate stock, which stock was delivered, but which conveyance was never executed, constitutes a resulting trust.

5. The statute of limitations, as a bar to the enforcement of a contract to convey property, does not begin to run as long as the purchaser is in possession of the property.

6. Where a vendee goes into possession before the conveyance is executed, and subsequently conveys by deed to the vendor a specified portion of the property, reserving the right to use it for mining purposes, which deed is recorded by the vendor, the occupancy by the vendor of the lot conveyed is not adverse to the title of the vendee to the original tract, so as to set in motion the statute limiting the vendee's cause of action for specific performance.

7. Where the promoters of a corporation contract for the purchase of land for the corporation, which contract is ratified by the corporation by paying the agreed price and entering into and continuing in possession, mere neglect to convey or to demand or compel the conveyance will not bar the right to compel it.

8. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 564, authorizing the court in which an action is pending to appoint a receiver "after judgment, to carry the judgment into effect," in an action to compel the transfer of real property, where defendants are numerous, and some of them are minors, a receiver may be appointed to take the legal title of the property, and make the conveyance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county.

Action by the Scadden Flat Gold-Mining Company against Elizabeth Scadden, administratrix, etc., and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Thos. S. Ford and G. E. Riley, for appellants. Fred Searls and Lindley & Eickhoff, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. In 1878, Henry Scadden, Thomas Scadden, and Richard Roberts were the owners of the Scadden Flat Quartz Mine, near Grass Valley, in Nevada county, the interest of each being an undivided one-third. In August of that year, a corporation was formed under the name of "Scadden Flat Gold-Mining Company," each of said owners and A. B. Brady and John Tremberth being named in the articles of incorporation as the directors to serve for the first year. It is alleged in the complaint, and found as a fact by the court, that in September, 1878, said Henry Scadden, Thomas Scadden, and Richard Roberts agreed and contracted with said corporation to sell and convey to it the said mining property, and put it in possession thereof, in consideration of the transfer and delivery to them and their order, by the corporation, of 40,000 shares of its capital stock, the whole number of shares being 60,000; the remaining 20,000 shares to be sold for the benefit of the corporation. Of the 40,000 shares 5 shares each were to be issued to Brady and Tremberth, to qualify them as directors, leaving to each of the Scaddens and Roberts, respectively, 13,330 shares; and said shares were issued to said persons respectively, and the corporation went into possession of the property. The remaining 20,000 shares were sold to sundry purchasers, and the corporation realized therefrom $15,000, which was invested in machinery and other improvements upon the property. Active operations were conducted by the corporation upon the mining property for a year or more, during which time over $40,000 were expended in work in the mine and in the erection of a mill. The board of directors met frequently, and directed the operations of the corporation, which were conducted by the superintendent, Roberts, who reported to the board, of which Henry and Thomas Scadden were members, one of them being president. Prior to the formation of the corporation, Henry and Thomas Scadden had each mortgaged his respective interest in the mining property, Henry to secure $4,400, and Thomas for $1,500, which incumbrances existed at the time the corporation was organized. A deed was prepared for the purpose of conveying said mining property to the corporation, but Roberts refused to execute it until the property should be released from said mortgages. On September 11, 1878, 8,000 shares of stock were issued to Henry Scadden, and these shares were afterwards transferred to his mortgagee, and the mortgage was released; and Thomas Scadden also used 6,666 shares of his stock to release the mortgage upon his interest, and the remainder of the stock to which each was entitled was also issued during the same month. The deed, however, was not executed by either of the Scaddens at any time, nor by Roberts until long afterwards. Work was prosecuted by the corporation for a year or more, and was then suspended. The mill was leased to other parties for some months, and not long afterwards was destroyed by fire. Meetings of the board were held from time to time after work ceased until March 3, 1881; but none were held thereafter until September 11, 1895, about which time Roberts conveyed his one-third interest in the property to the corporation. Henry and Thomas Scadden both died, intestate, before the commencement of this action, and the defendants are their personal representatives and heirs at law, and the object of the action is to secure a transfer of the legal title to said two-thirds interest in said mining property to the plaintiff. Other facts, so far as material, will be noticed as we proceed. The findings made by the court are very full, and, it is conceded, support the judgment. The grounds upon which appellants contend for reversal will be noticed in the order in which they are presented.

1. "The judge of the court below was disqualified from trying the case." All that appears in the transcript upon this point is as follows: "Mr. Ford (Counsel for Defendants): We offer to show by Judge Caldwell that, immediately prior to the commencement of the action, stock was purchased from him by the Hague syndicate, and that it had no value from 1880 to 1895." "The Court: I sold the stock. I don't know whether the sale was to Mr. Hague, for I let Mr. Searls have the stock. I do not know what its value was during those years. I only know what I paid and received for it." From this it is argued that the judge was interested in the result of the action. No objection was made to the court proceeding with the trial, nor was the question raised in any manner in the court below. It may be said, however, that it clearly appears that the judge had no interest in the action. He had disposed of all the interest he ever had in the property. The interest which disqualifies is a direct and immediate interest in the result of the action. Mining Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 315; City of Oakland v. Oakland Water-Front Co., 118 Cal. 249, 50 Pac. 268.

2. It is insisted that the complaint alleges an express contract for the sale of the property by the Scadden brothers and Roberts to the corporation, and that this allegation is not sustained by the evidence. The allegation is that said owners "entered into and made an agreement and contract," by which they "agreed and contracted that they would sell and convey and deliver to the plaintiff all the real property aforesaid and the possession thereof in consideration of the delivery to them and their order, by plaintiff, of forty thousand shares of its capital stock; and plaintiff agreed" to deliver said stock in consideration of the sale, conveyance, and delivery of the property to it; and the court found that this allegation was true. Mr. Brady, the secretary of the corporation, testified that Thomas Scadden, Henry Scadden, and Richard Roberts made an agreement, prior to the formation of the corporation, to convey the property to the corporation when formed, and to receive stock therefor, as hereinbefore stated; that they received the stock; that a deed was prepared, but was not executed; that Roberts refused to sign it until the mortgages upon the other interests should be removed; and that the corporation worked the mine. The minute book of the corporation, attested by Henry Scadden as president, and Mr. Brady as secretary, shows an instruction to the secretary to reserve 20,000 shares to be sold at 75 cents per share; that H. Scadden asked consent to have 8,000 shares issued to him, to be placed as security with L. R. Webster on the mortgage held by Webster, and this was done. "Thomas Scadden, having sold one-half of his interest in the above company, asked permission to have said stock issued to J. T. Morgan." The corporation also sold the 20,000 shares of treasury stock, built a mill, made assessments upon the stock, and managed and operated the property as owner. These facts show that in some manner the corporation was informed of the previous agreement and purpose of the owners of the property, and by its acts, if not otherwise, accepted the proposition of the owners, and such acceptance completed the contract between the former owners and the corporation; and the corporation, having issued and delivered all the stock, and taken possession of the property and operated it, complied with the conditions of the contract upon its part, and became the owner of the property; and Henry and Thomas Scadden and Roberts were thereafter simply trustees of the legal title for the corporation. "The promoters are not the corporation, and their contracts cannot be its contracts. This is so, though the promoters become at the creation of the corporation its only stockholders, directors, and officers. After it comes into existence and operation, it may, by adopting arrangements thus made for it in advance, make them its contract precisely as it might make similar contracts had no previous engagements been entered into. There can be no difference between its making a contract by adopting an agreement originally made for it in advance by its promoters and its making an entirely new contract." Battelle v. Pavement Co., 37 Minn. 89, 33 N. W. 327. The supreme court of Massachusetts said: "A corporation may be bound to fulfill a contract made in its name and behalf, in anticipation of its existence, by afterwards accepting the benefits of the contract, as it may acquire a right to enforce such a contract against the other party by his acceptance of performance by the corporation." Match Co. v. Hapgood, 141 Mass. 145, 7 N. E. 22. See, also, Chater v. Refining Co., 19 Cal. 219, 247. The contract alleged in the complaint is fully sustained by the evidence.

3. Appellants' third point is not clear. It is thus stated: "There can be no conveyance of the property described in the judgment." The complaint describes the property by metes and bounds, giving courses and distances, and the judgment follows the description in the complaint. Upon the trial the plaintiff read in evidence an unexecuted deed, made at or about the date of the incorporation (and which was shown to have been prepared by the clerk of the secretary) as part of the transaction, and tending to show that a conveyance of the property to the corporation was part of the contract. The property by name, and as to all the courses but one, was identical with that described in the complaint. There was a difference of four-tenths of an acre in the area. But the answer expressly admitted "that on September —, 1878, Henry and Thomas Scadden and Richard Roberts were owners in and possessed of the ground in controversy"; and the ground in controversy is that described in the complaint; and, if the plaintiff is entitled to recover, it must recover the ground so described.

4. It is further contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to relief because it refuses to do equity. A special defense was pleaded, to the effect that one Hague had acquired a majority of the stock in the plaintiff corporation; that he was the owner of an adjoining mine; that it was his purpose to use the mine here in controversy for the purpose of draining his mine, and not for the purpose of working the Scadden Mine; and that this would work an injustice to one of the defendants, who is a stockholder in the Scadden Flat Mine. This constitutes no defense to this action. No controversy concerning the relations between the corporation and its stockholders as to the use that is or may be made of the property by the corporation arises in this case. If the rights of the defendant Jacob U. Scadden, as a stockholder, shall be violated by the corporation, he can bring an appropriate action. It constitutes no reason why he, as one of the holders of the naked legal title in trust for the corporation, should not be required to convey that title to it.

5. It is also contended that this action is barred by the statute of limitations, or by unreasonable delay in bringing this suit. Appellants contend that the evidence shows nothing more than a constructive trust; that such a trust is born of fraud, and presupposes an adverse claim from its beginning; and that section 343, Code Civ. Proc., which prescribes a four-years limitation, applies; and that, for the purpose of avoiding that section of the Code, an express trust is set forth in the complaint. In this, appellants are mistaken. The complaint alleges an agreement to sell and convey the property to the corporation for a certain quantity of stock, that the stock was delivered, but the conveyance was not executed. This constitutes a resulting trust, and differs from a constructive trust in that the latter is forced upon the conscience of the trustee against his will, and generally to prevent the consummation of a fraud, while an express trust differs from a resulting trust only in the manner in which it is proven; but, when proven, a resulting trust is enforced in the same manner as an express trust. Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 547, 568. That a purchaser who has paid the purchase price may be barred of an action against the seller to enforce the trust resulting from such transaction is not doubted; but the statute will not begin to run so long as the purchaser is in possession, for, if it would (as was stated in Love v. Watkins, supra), "these curious results must follow: That the equitable owner of land is barred of his right while holding possession according to his right, and without an adverse claim or possession; and a person out of possession acquires title to real estate by the statute of limitations against a person in possession holding adversely. * * * And I have never yet met with a case, whatever the character of the trust, where the statute has been held to bar the rights of the beneficiary in favor of the trustee, when the beneficiary has continued in possession according to his right, and no adverse claim made by the trustee. Such a case would be at variance with the fundamental idea of statutes of limitation that possession draws to it, or rather extinguishes, all adverse claims and titles."

The court found that the plaintiff, in September, 1878, entered into full possession of the property, and has held and retained possession of it from that time, and has never been dispossessed, and has every year since 1878 paid the taxes assessed thereon. It is contended that the finding that plaintiff has been in possession ever since 1878 is not justified by the evidence. There is some conflict in the evidence upon this point, but I think there is sufficient to sustain the finding. In the finding that plaintiff has had possession ever since 1878 there is an exception of a small portion of the surface, a lot of about 130 by 220 feet, which was conveyed by the corporation to Thomas Scadden on May 6, 1889; the deed conveying only the right to the surface, and reserving all rights for mining purposes. This deed was recorded at the request of Thomas Scadden a few days thereafter. The occupation of this lot, which was fully described, was under the title created by it, and could not be adverse, but, on the contrary, was an acknowledgment of the ownership and right of the corporation. After the mill was burned, but little work was done in the mine. Mr. Morgan testified that in recent years the mine was worked by some parties whose names he did not remember; that a man named Pierce worked as a tributer, and paid a percentage to the corporation; that the witness had the shaft repaired five or six years ago. There was also evidence that some of the Scadden boys worked there occasionally for short spaces of time when not employed elsewhere, and accounted to their father; but the court found that plaintiff had no actual notice thereof, and that the work done was so limited that plaintiff could not be presumed to have had knowledge of it. But there is no evidence of any repudiation of the rights of the corporation by word or act brought home to it. In

Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 416, 417, 27 Pac. 1082, it was said: "Time begins to run against a trust only from the time it is openly disavowed by the trustee, and the adverse claim is clearly and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust. * * * Full performance by Hartman created an indefeasible estate in equity, which could not be defeated or divested by Olivera without positive and unequivocal repudiation of the trust relation, and notice of such repudiation to the beneficiary." Mere neglect of the trustee to convey, or of the cestui que trust to demand or compel the conveyance, as in this case, is not sufficient to bar the right of the purchaser to compel a conveyance.

6. It is urged that "the defendants could not be compelled to grant land to the corporation to perform acts ultra vires." This point relates to the use of the mine to drain other mines, and has been sufficiently noticed under No. 4.

7. It is contended that plaintiff never had possession beyond the mill and shaft. This point does not merit serious consideration. The evidence shows an agreement to convey the Scadden Flat Mine to the corporation. It had been patented. Henry Scadden and Thomas Scadden had each mortgaged their interests in the property. They had issued to themselves stock in said corporation in accordance with the agreement. Portions of this stock they transferred to the mortgagees, and procured the release of the mortgages. One-third of the entire stock, representing one-third of the entire property, by their own act as directors, or with their concurrence, was sold to third parties, and the proceeds used by the corporation to improve the property. The corporation at once took the management of the property. There is no evidence that either of the Scaddens thereafter had possession of any part of the property except a portion of the surface conveyed by the corporation to Thomas Scadden in 1889, nearly 11 years after the corporation was formed and the management and control of the property assumed by it. They dealt with the stock as representing the entire property, and with the corporation as owner of the entire property, and placed no restriction upon the possession given whereby any part of the property was excluded.

The court, owing to the difficulty of compelling the defendants, who were numerous, and many of whom were minors, to execute a conveyance to the plaintiff, appointed a receiver, in whom the legal title was vested by the decree, to make the conveyance; and this, it is argued, was erroneous. Section 564, Code Civ. Proc., authorizes the court to appoint a receiver, "(3) after judgment, to carry the judgment into effect," and appellants suppose the appointment of a receiver was made thereunder. This provision is very comprehensive, and we see no reason why the mode here adopted is not proper. Where the means to carry into effect the jurisdiction of the court is not specifically pointed out by the code or statute, "any suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may be conformable to the spirit of this code." Code Civ. Proc. § 187. A person to execute conveyances ordered by a court of equity is frequently appointed, and is usually designated a "commissioner"; but we think it immaterial whether he be called a "commissioner" or a "receiver," since his powers and duties are fixed by the decree, and need not be inferred from the name or title of the officer.

The value of the work done by Jacob U. Scadden was immaterial, as was also his belief that his father owned the mine, and the court did not err in so ruling. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ROSENTHAL et al. v. PERKINS et al.
(Sac. 346.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

ATTACHMENT — REDELIVERY BOND — RELEASE OF SURETIES—ASSIGNMENTS FOR CREDITORS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 555, provides for the release of attached property on the giving of a bond for redelivery to the proper officer, if judgment be for plaintiff. Laws 1880, c. 87, § 17, makes an assignment within one month after the attachment operate as a dissolution thereof, and section 45 permits a plaintiff who had a valid lien of attachment on property released under a redelivery bond to prosecute the case to final judgment in order to fix liability of sureties. Held, that section 45 does not apply to attachments within one month preceding the assignment, the sureties being released by dissolution of the attachment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Madera county; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by N. Rosenthal and L. Kutner, partners, against R. E. Perkins and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appealed. Reversed.

L. L. Cory and Wm. T. Searles, for appellants. Francis A. Fee, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. On August 18, 1893, the plaintiffs in this action commenced an action in justice's court against one James Brusie to recover the sum of $269.82, and procured a writ of attachment to issue, and the same was levied on personal property of the defendant, Brusie. On August 21st Brusie executed a redelivery bond, upon which the defendants in this action were sureties. The said bond or undertaking was conditioned as required by section 555, Code Civ. Proc., and upon its execution the constable released the property. The foregoing facts were formally and sufficiently alleged in the complaint, and the plaintiffs then proceeded to allege that afterwards, on the 6th day of September, 1893, Brusie, upon his own petition, was, by an order of the superior court of Madera county duly given and made, adjudged an insolvent debtor; that afterwards said superior court made an order permitting the said suit of the plaintiffs against Brusie to be proceeded with "for the purpose of fixing the liability of the said sureties, defendants herein, upon said bond or undertaking given for the release of said attached property, and for no other purpose"; that on September 25, 1893, judgment was rendered by the justice of the peace against Brusie for the sum of $317.32, including interest and costs; that afterwards plaintiffs demanded of Brusie and of his assignee in insolvency, and of each of the said sureties, "the return of the property attached in accordance with the conditions of said undertaking, or that they pay the value thereof"; but that each of them refused to comply with such demand, and prayed judgment for said sum of $317.32, with interest and costs. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and the defendants answered, alleging substantially the same facts concerning Brusie's insolvency which were alleged in the complaint. Defendant Perkins pleaded his discharge in insolvency. The cause was tried by the court, findings were filed following the allegations of the complaint, and judgment was entered thereon for the plaintiffs. The defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The question presented in this case is whether the adjudication of Brusie's insolvency within 30 days after the attachment was issued, and after the redelivery bond was executed, and the property released from the attachment thereunder, operated to relieve the sureties thereon from liability. That the adjudication of insolvency did have that effect, I think, is clear. Section 17 of the insolvency act of 1880, then in force, provides that the "assignment shall relate back to the commencement of the proceedings in insolvency, and by operation of law shall vest the title to all such property and estate, both real and personal, in the assignee, although the same is then attached on mesne process as the property of the debtor, and shall dissolve any attachment made within one month next preceding the commencement of the insolvency proceedings. Such assignment shall operate to vest in the assignee all the estate of the insolvent debtor not exempt by law from execution." Laws 1880, c. 87. It has been held in other jurisdictions that the dissolution of the attachment discharges the obligation of the sureties in a redelivery bond. See Drake, Attachm. §§ 341b, 341c, and cases there cited. Whether that is true here in cases where the attachment is dissolved upon motion of the defendant upon the ground that it was improperly or irregularly issued, we need not inquire, though all the cases cited by Drake under said sections were cases of bankruptcy and cases of like character, where the redelivery became impossible by operation of law; and in that class of cases I think the author's conclusion is sound, and the case before us is of that class. This is apparent upon the face of section 555, Code Civ. Proc., under which the bond here in suit was given, and from the condition of the bond itself, which is "that, in case the said plaintiff recover judgment in said action, the defendant will, on demand, redeliver such attached property so released to the proper officer, to be applied to the payment of the judgment, or will pay," etc. The attachment having been absolutely dissolved by the adjudication of insolvency, and as no writ of execution could issue upon the judgment, there was no "proper officer" to whom the defendant could deliver the property, and hence the demand required the defendant to do a thing which by operation of law had become impossible, and the failure to do it could give no right of action upon the bond. The demand may be made by the plaintiff in the action as well as by the officer, but it is necessary that there should be an officer clothed with authority to receive the property and sell it. Brownlee v. Riffenburg, 95 Cal. 447, 30 Pac. 587. This the officer could not do without an execution.

Besides, section 552, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "If the execution be returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, the plaintiff may prosecute any undertaking given pursuant to section 540 or section 555, or he may proceed, as in other cases, upon return of an execution"; and in Brownlee v. Riffenburg, 95 Cal. 448, 449, 30 Pac. 588, it is said this section "in effect declares that unless or until an execution is issued and returned, no such prosecution shall be had"; that is, that said section makes the issuance and return of an execution a condition precedent to the right to commence an action upon the bond. This is the general rule, and applies in all cases except the one which will be presently noticed. Respondents cite the last clause of section 45 of the insolvent act, which reads: "Provided, that where a valid lien or attachment has been acquired or secured in any such action, and an undertaking has been offered and accepted in lieu of such lien or attachment, the case may be prosecuted to final judgment for the purpose of fixing the liability of the sureties upon such undertaking; but execution against the insolvent upon such judgment shall be stayed." It is contended that this provision authorizes this action against the sureties. It will be observed, however, that section 17 of the act operates to dissolve only those attachments "made within one month next preceding the commencement of insolvency proceedings." Attachments made more than one month before insolvency proceedings are commenced are not affected, and therefore are not dissolved, but remain valid for all purposes. In such case the property attached is not released by operation of law, and the attaching creditor has all the rights and remedies he would have had if the defendant in the action had not been adjudged an insolvent, save and except that of an execution against him where the attached property has been released by giving a redelivery bond; and in such case the allegation that more than one month after the attachment was made the debtor was adjudged insolvent, would relieve the plaintiff from alleging that an execution had been issued and returned unsatisfied. In this case the sureties on the bond, not being liable thereon, could not prove a claim against the insolvent under section 41 of the act, as supposed by respondent. The questions in this case must be determined under our own statutes and decisions, and it is therefore not necessary to review the cases cited from other jurisdictions. As the complaint cannot be amended so as to state a cause of action, the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, with directions to dismiss the action.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, with directions to dismiss the action.

ABBOTT v. '76 LAND & WATER CO.

(Sac. 310.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

CONTRACT—ACCEPTANCE—OPTION.

There is no contract authorizing action for damages by one given option to buy within certain time, where he does not give notice of acceptance of offer, though the offer is withdrawn before expiration of the time.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county.

Action by M. O. Abbott, substituted for Joseph Marriott, against the '76 Land & Water Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

O. L. Abbott, for appellant. Daggett & Adams, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. A demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment of dismissal was entered, and the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint is very long, but for the purposes of this opinion the facts alleged may be stated as follows: The defendant is a corporation owning large quantities of land and certain water rights, canals, and ditches, by means of which much of its lands, including the 640-acre tract in controversy, may be irrigated. For several years prior to October 1, 1886, the defendant leased portions of the lands to different persons under cropping contracts, and these contracts contained a clause giving the cropper the right to purchase the land described in the contract, for a price and upon terms therein stated, at any time before the expiration of the lease. The price fixed in these contracts included a water right of 40 inches of water for each 40 acres. The defendant also advertised that it would let its lands upon these terms, and also had adopted a resolution to that effect. Joseph Marriott had occupied the land here in question for several years prior to October 1, 1886, under leases or contracts containing the option to purchase above stated; but the lease for the year commencing October 1, 1886, did not contain such option. In May, 1887, the land commenced to increase in value, and by October 1st its value had about doubled. In July, 1887, the defendant announced that it withdrew all its lands from sale under these options. It is further alleged that about September 25, 1897, Marriott elected to purchase the land in question, claiming that under the usages and resolutions of defendant he had the right to purchase, but did not notify or inform the defendant of his election, nor tender or offer to pay the purchase money, but would have done so if he had not believed the statements of defendant withdrawing its land from sale; that he was not aware that his right to purchase could be enforced notwithstanding the withdrawal until a few weeks before this suit was commenced; that he was always able, ready, and willing to pay, and now offers to pay, the sum at which said land was scheduled, viz. $17,800; that in July, 1890, defendant sold the water right incident to said land for $64,000, and has had said money on interest at 6 per cent. per annum; that because of said representations he surrendered possession of the land, the annual rents and profits of which were $1,600. The prayer is that defendant be required to convey the land, that it be charged with the $64,000 received for the water right, and interest thereon, and with the rents and profits, from all which he offers to deduct the price of the land, and accept a judgment for "a balance of trust fund amounting to $80,220." The present plaintiff, having succeeded in some way to Marriott's rights, was substituted as plaintiff.

Placing the most favorable construction possible upon the complaint, and assuming that the previous usages, customs, and resolutions of the defendant are to be considered as incorporated in Marriott's lease made in October, 1886, and assuming further that defendant could not take away his right of purchase by its withdrawal of the option and announced determination not to sell or convey, still there was no contract of sale created between the parties. The acceptance of the offer must be communicated to the party making the offer, or there is no contract. The withdrawal of the option, or the announcement that it would not sell or convey the property, could not relieve Marriott from the necessity of communicating his acceptance of the offer, though it might possibly obviate the necessity of a tender of the purchase money, or an offer to pay it, if he had taken the necessary step to create a contract by notifying the defendant, before the expiration of the lease, of his acceptance of the offer. The allegations of the complaint in this regard amount simply to this: that Marriott mentally concluded that, if the defendant had not refused to sell, he would buy; that for seven or eight years he acquiesced and gave no voice to his desire to purchase, when he was advised that he could have compelled the defendant to sell and convey, and still could do so with the added advantage of being relieved from any payment on account of the purchase, and of recovering $80,220 with which to start business on the ranch. The most remarkable feature of the case is that he should have been so advised. The demurrer was properly sustained without leave to amend, and the judgment of dismissal should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

6 Cal. Unrep. 27
TODHUNTER et al. v. ARMSTRONG. (Sac. 316.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)
MASTER AND SERVANT—CREATION OF A LIEN—DEFENSE IN EJECTMENT.

1. One who takes charge of another's ranch, with the understanding that he is to receive for his services a certain sum per month, and, after paying from the gross proceeds the operating expenses, including his own salary, and deducting what was due for supplies and equipments furnished by him, to return the balance to the owner, and who does not agree to bear a part of any loss which may occur, is merely a hired man, and not a tenant.

2. A verbal understanding that he was to remain in possession of the property, and have a lien thereon till he was paid, is no defense to the owner's action for recovery of possession.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Glenn county.

Action by George F. Todhunter and others against W. S. Armstrong. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Ball, for appellant. S. Millington, R. E. Hopkins, and Hiram W. Johnson, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. Plaintiffs commenced this action in January, 1896, to recover possession of a tract of land in Glenn county, called the "Willows Rancho," alleging that they were the owners of the said land in fee, and entitled to the possession thereof, and that defendant in September, 1895, entered into and took possession of the said land without any right thereto, and without the consent of plaintiffs, and had wrongfully withheld the possession thereof from the plaintiffs. Defendant answered, and filed a lengthy cross complaint, in which he set up facts which it is claimed entitled him to retain possession of the said property. The following facts, among others, are alleged in the cross complaint: Long before February, 1891, and up to the time of his death, in January, 1893, W. B. Todhunter, the father of plaintiffs, was the owner of the land described in the complaint, and other lands situate in Yolo and Sacramento counties, and also a large amount of personal property. He had employed defendant for many years, and there existed between them great confidence and trust. He resided in Yolo county, and in February, 1891, entered into an agreement with defendant, by which it was mutually agreed that defendant should remove to and take full charge of the said Willows rancho. He was to take with him certain horses, harness, wagons, and farming implements, of the value of $535, which he then owned, and was to use the same, together with such implements and teams as Todhunter should furnish, in the cultivation and improvement of said land; to employ all necessary help, and furnish board for the men employed; to purchase such machinery and articles as might be needed, from time to time, on the rancho; and to sell the surplus produce, and out of the proceeds defray expenses, and upon final settlement turn over the residue to Todhunter or his heirs. For his services and the use of his said property defendant was to retain out of the proceeds of the sales for himself $50 per month, and 50 cents a day for the board of each person employed on the ranch and boarded by him, and upon final settlement was to be paid $535, the value of the property furnished by him, and a small sum due from Todhunter to him at the time the agreement was made. No time was fixed when said venture should terminate, but it was understood and mutually agreed that defendant was to remain in possession of said property and have a lien thereon until he was settled with and paid. Under this agreement the defendant, on February 20, 1891, took possession of the said property, and continued in possession thereof until Todhunter died; and after his death the agreement was maintained by his heirs and representatives until this suit was brought. Both Todhunter and defendant performed all the conditions of the said agreement to be by them respectively performed, but no complete accounting or settlement was had between them prior to his death, or has since been had between the representatives of his estate and defendant. In September, 1893, the plaintiff George T. Todhunter was duly appointed by the superior court of Yolo county administrator with the will annexed of his father's estate; and in June, 1894, as such administrator, he filed in court an account of his administration, to which he attached a statement of the account of the defendant, therefore rendered to him for allowance and payment, and asked to have the same heard and considered by the court in connection with his said account. Thereafter the matter came on regularly for trial before the court, and was submitted for decision, and "the court duly made and filed its decision, whereby there was found to be due and owing from the estate to the said Armstrong the sum of $1,732 for transactions had under said agreement between" certain dates named, and no part of this sum had been paid. In September, 1895, George F. Todhunter, as such administrator, procured and induced the court to make and enter of record its decree and judgment, distributing the estate of said decedent to his heirs and devisees, and discharging said administrator. The distribution was made in accordance with a written agreement made and entered into by all the heirs entitled to share in the estate, and upon the representation that there were still outstanding claims against the estate, but that all the claimants consented that a decree be entered distributing the estate in the manner provided in said agreement. The creditors of the estate, and particularly this defendant, did not in fact consent that any decree of distribution be then entered, and the representation that they did so was false, and made for the purpose of defrauding them and preventing the collection of their claims against the estate. By the decree there was distributed to the plaintiffs herein the land here in controversy, together with a large amount of other real and personal property, and it was expressly provided that all the indebtedness of the estate, except a certain mortgage on lands in Yolo county, should be assumed and paid by them. The prayer was that the plaintiffs take nothing by the action, and that defendant have judgment against them for the sums alleged to be due him, and that he have a lien, coupled with possession, on the land described in the complaint for the payment of such judgment. The plaintiffs answered the cross complaint, denying most of its material averments.

The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiffs. From that judgment and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

At the trial the plaintiffs introduced in evidence the said decree of distribution, and proved that 15 days before the action was commenced they served on defendant a written demand for the possession of the said premises. The defendant was then called as a witness in his own behalf, and testified that since the 20th day of February, 1891, he had continuously resided on the land in suit; had cultivated and improved the property, raised, harvested, and disposed of the crops each year, and such parts of the crops as were not used on the ranch, for the ranch, had been sold and accounted for; that he had full control of the property, and paid the taxes and accounted for everything raised thereon; and that he went upon the property, and took the control and management thereof, under and by virtue of an agreement made with W. B. Todhunter. He was then asked to state fully what that agreement was. Plaintiffs objected to the question, and to the admission of any evidence as to the terms of the contract under which defendant claimed the right to hold possession, unless the contract was in writing; and the objection was sustained.

There is no pretense that the agreement sought to be proved was in writing; and, as pleadings are construed most strongly against the pleader, it must be assumed that the terms of the agreement, as set out in the cross complaint, are as favorable to defendant as the facts would justify.

It is claimed for appellant that by the agreement the relation of landlord and tenant was created between the parties; that appellant became a tenant at will, and as such was occupying and holding the property when this suit was brought; that his tenancy could only be terminated by a written notice, given by the landlord, to remove from the premises within a period of not less than one month, to be specified in the notice; and hence that this action could not be maintained, no such notice having been given. Civ. Code, §§ 789, 790; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1161, 1162. Whether appellant was a tenant of the property or not is the controlling question in the case; for if he was not a tenant, but only a general manager or superintendent, then the rulings of the court below on the admission of evidence, and the findings of the court based upon the evidence admitted, were all justified and proper. We fail to see how the agreement set out can be said to have created any relation of landlord and tenant between the contracting parties. It is true appellant was to, and did, have the full control and management of the farm, but for his services in so doing he was to receive only a salary of $50 per month. After paying from the gross products of the place the expenses of operating it, he was to receive no part of the residuum, and was to bear no part of the loss, if any loss should occur. In short, he was, in our opinion, simply a laborer or hired man, and was subject to be discharged at any time. Numerous authorities are cited by appellant relating to tenancy and partnership, but, as no tenancy or partnership is shown to have existed, they are not in point, and need not be specially noticed.

Some stress is laid on the words, "It was understood and mutually agreed that defendant was to remain in possession of said property and have a lien thereon until he was settled with and paid." But such an oral agreement would not create a lien, and, if it did, would not constitute a defense to an action brought to recover possession of the property.

After a careful consideration of the case, we conclude that there is no valid ground for a reversal, and that whatever right appellant may have to recover the amount alleged to be due him must be asserted against respondents under the condition attached to the decree of distribution, that they should assume and pay all outstanding and unsecured debts of the estate. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PLASS v. PLASS et al. (S. F. 782.)<sup>1</sup>

TENANCY IN COMMON—OUSTER—EJECTMENT—WHO MAY MAINTAIN—COMMUNITY ESTATE—NONSUIT.

1. A denial in the answer of plaintiff's title and right of entry, in an action by a tenant in common against his co-tenant to be admitted into possession, is equivalent to an ouster as of the date of the commencement of the action.

2. One claiming land as heir at law or devisee cannot maintain ejectment against the executors of deceased.

3. One claiming as tenant in common under St. 1850, p. 254, § 11, which provides that, on the death of a spouse, one half of the community property shall go to the survivor, and the other half to the descendants of the deceased, may adjudicate his right to be let into possession in ejectment.

4. Where the evidence supports a complaint good against a general demurrer, a motion for nonsuit should be overruled.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county.

Action by Charles Plass against Catherine Plass, executrix, and Phillip Plass, executor, of the last will of Charles W. Plass, deceased. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. E. Johnston and John T. York, for appellant. Percy S. King, M. M. Estee, and Chas. A. Shurtleff, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action in ejectment. The trial was by the court, and at the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony the court granted a motion for nonsuit, and gave judgment for defendants, from which plaintiff appeals, and comes here upon bill of exceptions.

The evidence was that plaintiff is the son of defendants' testator; that plaintiff's mother, the testator's first wife, died July

7, 1859; the defendant Catherine Plass is plaintiff's stepmother, and the other defendant is his brother. Plaintiff testified as follows: "I was born in the state of New York on November 9, 1847, and subsequently came with my father and mother to California. My father had been here before that time. We went to reside on the tract of land first described in the complaint, and my father lived there continuously until he died, in 1895." The land referred to was acquired by plaintiff's father by purchase, October 11, 1856. The other land described in the complaint was deeded to plaintiff's father, July 3, 1863, four years after his mother died. A deceased sister of plaintiff died April 3, 1865, being then the wife of one N. C. Brooks, leaving one son who survived her, but is now dead. Brooks conveyed to one G. A. Lamont his interest in the demanded premises, December 14, 1895, and Lamont conveyed the same to plaintiff, January 17, 1896. What interest, if any, Brooks had in the premises does not appear. Petition for the probate of the will of defendants' testator was in evidence, in which the demanded premises were claimed to be part of the estate of deceased; also order admitting will to probate, with proof thereof. It also appeared that defendants entered upon their duties as executors, and were, when the action was commenced and tried, acting as such under said will. The will devised the property to the surviving wife of deceased and the brother of the testator, "to hold the same in common and undivided" during their natural life, and at their death to go to the testator's sons, Charles Plass, Jr. (plaintiff), and Phillip Plass (one of defendants). A rental value was proved, which, with the foregoing, comprises all the evidence.

It is well settled that, in an action by a tenant in common against his co-tenant to be admitted into the possession, a denial in the answer of the plaintiff's title and right of entry is equivalent to an ouster as of the date of the commencement of the action. Miller v. Myers, 46 Cal. 535; Phelan v. Smith, 100 Cal. 158, 34 Pac. 667. The ouster is therefore admitted by the pleadings.

If plaintiff has any title or right of possession, it must be by virtue of the statute of 1850 (St. 1850, p. 254, § 11), as a "descendant" of his deceased mother, who died while that act was in force, or as an heir at law or devisee of his father. Clearly, he can claim no right of action by ejectment, in the latter capacity, against the executors. Meeks v. Hahn, 20 Cal. 620; Chapman v. Hollister, 42 Cal. 462; Meeks v. Kirby, 47 Cal. 168; Harper v. Strutz, 53 Cal. 655. Can the action be maintained upon the facts disclosed?

Appellant claims, as we understand counsel, that the demanded premises were community property, having been acquired during the marriage of plaintiff's father and mother, and that by her death, in 1859, plaintiff took an interest in the property under the act of 1850, which reads: "Upon the dissolution of the community by the death of either husband or wife, one half of the common property shall go to the survivor, and the other half to the descendants of the deceased husband or wife, subject to the debts of the deceased." The right of possession is claimed under this law.

It was held in Broad v. Broad, 40 Cal. 493, that the words "shall go" in the act mean "shall vest," and apply equally to the descendant of the deceased husband or wife, as the survivor, and that upon the death of the mother the children of the marriage became tenants in common with the father. That was an action for the partition of the premises, and the direction in remanding the case was to render judgment that each of the two plaintiffs (children of the mother) is the owner in fee of the undivided quarter, and the defendant is the owner in fee of the undivided one-half, of the premises. Broad v. Murray, 44 Cal. 228, was a similar action, and was decided upon the authority of Broad v. Broad, affirming the principles enunciated in that case. Johnston v. Bush, 49 Cal. 198, was a case in ejectment brought by the descendants of the deceased mother to recover the undivided one-half of the premises, claiming to be tenants in common with the grantee of the father under the act of 1850. Defendant had judgment, and the cause was remanded for a new trial, affirming Broad v. Broad, supra. Cook v. Norman, 50 Cal. 633, was an action in ejectment by the children of the deceased mother to recover an undivided one-fourth of the premises. After the death of his wife, Cook, surviving husband, sold the premises in good faith, but it did not appear whether the sale was necessary to pay the community debts or whether the proceeds were so applied. It was found by the trial court that when the community was dissolved by the death of the wife there was a large amount of outstanding community indebtedness. It was held here that it was competent for the husband to convey the community estate to satisfy debts of the community, and that a purchaser in good faith from the surviving husband is not bound to show, in support of his title, that the sale to him in point of fact was necessary to provide payment of the community debts; that the husband had power to sell as survivor of the community the same as during its existence. It was said, however, referring to Broad v. Broad and Broad v. Murray, supra: "It is not doubted, as against the husband, the interest of the children of the community is to be taken as vested, and entitling them to have an accounting or partition, or other appropriate relief."

As to the property acquired by plaintiff's testator after the death of plaintiff's mother, the judgment of the court was clearly correct, as it is in course of administration, and plaintiff can claim an interest only through his testator. As to the property acquired in the lifetime of plaintiff's mother, we think it sufficiently appeared to be community property in which at her death he had some interest, subject, however, to the debts of the community. The construction given to the act of 1850 was stated in Johnston v. Savings Union, 75 Cal. 134, 16 Pac. 753, to have been that the descendants of the wife took subject to the payment of the community debts; that no probate administration of the estate of the deceased wife was necessary; but that the control of the property was in the husband, as survivor of the marital partnership, for the purposes of settling up its affairs. In Packard v. Arelanes, 17 Cal. 525, the court said: "No special remedy exists for the enforcement of the claims of creditors, or the protection of persons interested in the preservation of the property; but the general powers of the courts are sufficient to furnish any relief necessary for these purposes." In that case the wife died first. The husband continued in possession of the property, made a will, and died, and executors were duly appointed. Soon thereafter letters of administration were taken out on the estate of the deceased wife, and the administrator presented claims against the estate of the husband, and obtained a large judgment on report of the referee. The trial court set aside the report, and its judgment was affirmed here, leaving the estate of the husband to be administered under the will. There is no evidence in the present case whether or not the plaintiff's testator settled up the affairs of the community in his lifetime. The property acquired during the community being common property and subject as such to his control, when he died it passed into the possession and control of his executors, subject to the debts of the community. The probate court now has jurisdiction of the estate and the property. But the particular interest claimed by plaintiff in the property is adverse to the estate, and the probate court has no jurisdiction to determine the rights of those claiming adversely to the estate. In re Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 44 Pac. 734. In that case it was said to be the duty of the court, where serious questions arise as to such claims, to delay final decree until such claims can be determined in another forum. Burgel v. Prisser, 89 Cal. 70, 26 Pac. 787, was an action in ejectment where one-half the land was inherited from the father, and two-thirds of the other half from the mother, whose estate was being administered upon, and it was held that the heirs could not, pending the administration of the mother's estate, recover in ejectment the portion inherited from her as against her administrator, who is entitled to the possession of the whole estate. But it was said: "If the judgment had merely determined that plaintiffs were tenants in common, and should be let into possession with defendant, there could have been no objection." And it was further held that it was proper for the court, before which the ejectment suit is tried, to ascertain and settle the respective interests of the parties. While plaintiff was not entitled to judgment, as prayed, for exclusive possession, we cannot see why his rights could not be determined in this action. If he acquired any right or title through the death of his mother distinct from and adverse to the right or interest of his father in the same property, he should have been permitted to show it in this action. Therefore the nonsuit should not have been granted. The grounds on which it was asked were: (1) Plaintiff had not shown possession or right of possession or ouster; (2) that he had not shown any title, even indirectly; (3) that the estate is in process of administration, and defendants are executors, and ejectment would not lie against them. We think, if all the facts shown had appeared in the complaint, it would have been good against a general demurrer, and in such case the motion should be overruled. Warner v. Darrow, 91 Cal. 309, 27 Pac. 737. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

WOODBURY v. NEVADA SOUTHERN RY. CO. (L. A. 383.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1898.)

SUBSTITUTION OF ATTORNEYS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 284, giving a party a right to change his attorney of record, the court is justified in ordering the change on request of the party.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by Woodbury against the Nevada Southern Railway Company. An appeal is taken from an order for substitution of attorneys for defendant, and from a refusal to set aside said order. Affirmed.

H. C. Dillon, for appellant. A. B. Hotchkiss, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The Nevada Southern Railway Company, the defendant in the above-entitled action, made its application to the superior court for the substitution of M. W. Conkling as its attorney of record therein in the place of A. B. Hotchkiss, and the court made its order for such substitution. From this order, and from a subsequent order refusing to set it aside, the present appeal has been taken.

Whether the request for the substitution of attorneys that was presented to the superior court was made by the defendant was a question of fact for that court to determine, and its conclusion that it did make the request will not be reviewed here upon the suggestion of the displaced attorney that the court did not properly consider the evidence before it. The right of a party to change his attorney of record is conferred by section 284, Code Civ. Proc., and it is only necessary for him to prefer his request for such change in order to justify the court in making an order therefor. People v. Norton, 16 Cal. 436; Lee v. Superior Court of San Joaquin Co., 112 Cal. 354, 44 Pac. 666. The orders are affirmed.

MODESTO BANK v. OWENS et al. (Sac.
255.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1898.)

NOTICE OF APPEAL—PROOF OF SERVICE—CHATTEL MORTGAGE—AFFIDAVIT—MORTGAGE OF CROPS — FORECLOSURE.

1. While proof of service of a notice of appeal must be made, it is not essential that it be attached to the notice.

2. Where a chattel mortgage is given to a firm, the statute requiring an affidavit to be made by all the parties is sufficiently complied with, as to the firm, by an affidavit of one of the partners "of and for the firm, * * * the mortgagee in said mortgage named."

3. A mortgage of land, together with all rents, issues, and profits thereof, will not create a lien on a crop subsequently raised, where it is not executed in the manner required for the execution of chattel mortgages, and will not affect a subsequent mortgagee of the crop.

4. A mortgagee of a crop is not required to foreclose his lien in order to prevent its seizure under a mortgage of the land.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county.

Action by the Modesto Bank against W. C. Owens and others. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Nicol & Orr, for appellants. Maddox & Stonesifer, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. August 24, 1892, defendant W. C. Owens made to plaintiff a mortgage upon certain lands to secure an indebtedness due it. After a description of the land, the mortgage contained the following words: "Together with, all and singular, the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof." It was not executed as the Code requires chattel mortgages to be executed. In the fall of 1894, Owens seeded the land to wheat. Defendants Haslacher & Kahn contracted to furnish money to enable Owens to put in the crop their advancements to be secured by a crop mortgage. Of this contract, plaintiff was fully advised before the crop was put in. The wheat was put in under the contract, and the crop mortgage given, executed in due form. Haslacher & Kahn appeared, and made their defense in the action. The court, upon the bringing of the action, appointed a receiver, who took the crop into possession. The court found the facts as to the crop mortgage, and that the indebtedness to Haslacher & Kahn had not been paid. As matter of law, it was found that the proceeds of the sale of the crop should be applied to the payment of any deficiency due the plaintiff after the sale of the real estate, and the residue, if any, should be brought into court, to abide the further order of the court. The decree is in accordance with this finding, and it is from this part of the decree that this appeal is taken. It is made to appear (perhaps somewhat irregularly) that subsequent to the judgment the receiver harvested and sold the grain, and that the proceeds are now held to await the result of this appeal, there being a deficiency judgment. The mortgage involved in this case, and the judgment entered, are in all material respects like those considered in Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 40 Pac. 104, and 44 Pac. 484. Indeed, the decision rendered in that case seems as apt and appropriate to the main question involved here as it was to that case. This case was tried before that decision was made, or, in all probability, a different conclusion would have been reached. The counsel for respondent recognize this, but still make a commendable, though desperate, attempt to maintain their judgment. The new points are highly technical, but will be briefly noted:

1. The notice of appeal was filed June 28, 1895, and there is not attached to it any evidence of service. About two weeks thereafter an affidavit was filed, showing service. The contention is that section 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not make this affidavit a part of the record, although in fact brought up, and there is therefore no proof of service, and the jurisdiction of this court is not made to appear. Section 950 does not expressly require or authorize the appellant to bring up proof of the service. If unauthorized, it would no more constitute a part of the record when attached to the notice of appeal than it would when not so attached. It has always been supposed that proof of service should appear in the transcript; but, if no law or rule authorizes its being made a part of the record to be certified to this court, then such is not required, and the fact of its absence constitutes no ground for a dismissal. That such proof is not attached to the notice is of no consequence. It has repeatedly been held that proof of the service of the notice must be made, and the proof of the fact found in the transcript has always been considered sufficient.

2. It is contended that the chattel mortgage of Haslacher & Kahn is void because it was not accompanied by the affidavit of all the parties thereto. The mortgage names "Haslacher & Kahn" as parties of the second part. The affidavit was made by Louis Kahn, "of and for the firm of Haslacher & Kahn, the mortgagee in said mortgage named." The complaint avers that Haslacher and Kahn are partners, and that their firm name is Haslacher & Kahn. It is said that the statute requires the affidavit to be made by "all the parties thereto," and does not authorize any one to make it on behalf of another. If this be true, a corporation can never be a party to a chattel mortgage, for an oath cannot be administered to a corporation. Nor can an agent act for either party in giving or receiving such a mortgage. For some purposes a partnership is regarded as an entity. In re Dennery, 89 Cal. 101, 26 Pac. 639. Many corporations, savings banks, and others, have taken such mortgages and they have been upheld. To hold otherwise would be "to stick in the bark."

3. It is said that Haslacher & Kahn had notice of plaintiff's mortgage, and therefore were not incumbrancers in good faith. The plaintiff's mortgage did not cover the crop, but constituted a lien upon the land only, and therefore it did not matter whether they knew it or not. No amount of notice could make it a chattel mortgage. As I understand Simpson v. Ferguson, it is there held that such a mortgage does not constitute a lien upon the growing crops, even as against the mortgagor.

4. There is no point in the claim that Haslacher & Kahn cannot be heard because they did not ask to have their mortgage foreclosed. They were not required to foreclose at all, and at any rate the time had not arrived when the answer was filed when they could take the crop in satisfaction of their debt. They had an interest in the crop, and had a right to contend that plaintiff had no lien upon it. As plaintiff had no such lien, he could not foreclose as to it; and there was no occasion for Haslacher & Kahn to ask for such relief, even had they been entitled to it. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. PLYLER. (Cr. 359.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1898.)

CRIMINAL LAW—SEPARATE TRIALS—WITNESSES—
VARIANCE—NAMES—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDI-BILITY OF WITNESSES—CONTINUANCE.

1. Separate informations requiring separate trials may be filed against defendants complained of as being joint offenders.

2. The state has a right to call as a witness a person charged with the same offense as that of defendant, and it is immaterial that he refused to testify on the ground that his evidence might incriminate him.

3. An information charging that the offense was committed on Charles Harris, and evidence that his true name was Isaac Crossley, does not constitute a variance, where he testified that the former name was the one he had always been known by in the community.

4. Giving an instruction that "a witness who has willfully sworn falsely in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others" in lieu of one that, "if any witness examined before you has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, it is your duty to distrust his entire evidence," was error, since the former omits the element that the testimony must be on a material matter, and the latter follows the Code provisions (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3).

5. A refusal to grant defendant a continuance was an abuse of discretion warranting a reversal where it appeared that the wife of defendant, who had been subpoenaed, was a material witness, and the only person who could and would testify to facts showing his innocence, and that she was temporarily sick, as shown by physicians' certificates, so that her attendance would endanger her life,—all of which was not contradicted; nor was the error cured by a statement by the state in open court that they had authentic information that she was no longer ill, but about on the streets, and the court's offer to issue an attachment for her, which neither side then requested.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county.

George F. Plyler was convicted of mayhem, and he appeals. Reversed.

D. W. Burchard, L. O'Neal, W. A. Maguire, and H. C. Moore, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant, convicted of mayhem, appeals from the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial.

1. Complaint was laid before a magistrate jointly charging defendant and others with the offense. The defendant and one Schoedde were together held over for trial. In due time the district attorney filed separate informations against them. This precluded a joint trial, and defendant insists that it was error. The argument advanced is that after the defendants had been jointly held for trial the district attorney had no power other than to file a joint information against them. The defendants were of right entitled to a joint trial, and each to the aid and assistance of the other in his defense. This right was denied them by the course which the prosecuting officer adopted. It is further said that the law gives to defendants jointly charged the privilege of separate trials (Pen. Code, § 1098), but secures no such right to the people. It is true that the law, contemplating the embarrassments which may arise to defendants upon joint trials, and the desire which one may have to make a defense not acceptable to his co-defendant, has humanely accorded the privilege of separate trials. But that is aside from the vital question. Is it mandatory upon the district attorney, under the indicated circumstances, to file a joint information? We are not advised of any law so declaring. It is within his discretion to inform against them either jointly or severally. The state may determine whether it will proceed against defendants accused of the commission of a single crime, either jointly (with the privilege to each of them of securing a separate trial) or separately, as was done in this instance. Unquestionably, a grand jury may so return indictments, and the same course should be and is open to the district attorney.

2. Schoedde, over whom at the time of Plyler's trial was pending an information for the same offense, was called to the witness stand by the prosecution, and declined to answer questions put to him, upon the ground that his answers would tend to criminate him. The court sustained him in his position, and no evidence was elicited from him. It is urged that this was error, tending to prejudice defendant's case before the jury. Either the district attorney was of exceptionally sanguine temperament, or his hope of eliciting any valuable testimony from a witness situated as was Schoedde must have been extremely slight. Still, error cannot be predicated upon his futile effort, even though it was followed by all the injurious effects which defendant portrays; for Schoedde still was a competent witness for the prosecution, and he could refuse to testify only by the exercise of the privilege of which he availed himself. Ex parte Stice, 70 Cal. 51, 11 Pac. 459. It was not error, therefore, to call him to the witness stand, whatever may have been the resulting consequences to defendant.

3. The complaint charged the offense to have been committed upon the person of Charles Harris, and the information followed the complaint. At the preliminary examination the complaining witness swore that his name was Charles Harris, and not Isaac Crossley. Upon the trial he testified that he had been known as Charles Harris in the city of Santa Cruz during all of the six years of his residence there, and had been known by no other name; but that his true name was Isaac Crossley. He explained that he swore falsely as to his name to shield his family, and save them from knowledge of the outrage of which he was the victim, for the mayhem was castration. In the case of People v. Christian, 101 Cal. 471, 35 Pac. 1043, the complaint charged, and the defendant was held to answer for, an assault committed upon George Magin. The information alleged an assault upon George Massino. The variance being urged, upon the ground that the defendant was tried for an offense upon which he had never been examined, the point was held well taken. But that case cannot avail defendant. This complaint and information alike charged a crime committed upon Charles Harris. Harris testified that such was the name by which he had always been known in the community. Here was no variance. There was an absolute identity in names and person, and the fact, disclosed upon the trial for the first time, that the complaining witness' true name was something different, did not constitute a variance, and could not have injured defendant in the slightest degree.

4. Defendant proposed the following instruction: "If any witness examined before you has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, it is your duty to distrust his entire evidence." This instruction was modified by the court, and thus given: "A witness who has willfully sworn falsely in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others." As given, the instruction closely approximates to the language of subdivision 3 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The subdivision is but a brief paraphrase of the terse maxim, "Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus." The code provision, like the Latin maxim, is not a complete exposition of the law. Well understood by jurists, it would be misleading to the nonprofessional mind. It requires construction and amplification. This it has received. People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 491; People v. Soto, 59 Cal. 367. The proposed instruction is an accurate exposition of its meaning, and should have been given. The charge delivered by the court omits the very important element that the willful false testimony must be upon a material matter.

5. This disposes of all of appellant's objections necessary to be considered in contemplation of a new trial, which must be ordered for the following reason: Defendant pleaded upon July 27th. His trial was set to commence upon Monday, about three weeks later. Upon the morning of that day his counsel moved the court for a continuance, based upon an affidavit of defendant that his wife was under subpoena, and was a material witness for the defense; that by her he expected to prove, and that she would testify of her own knowledge, that defendant did not commit, participate, aid, or abet in the commission of the alleged offense, and that he had no knowledge of the commission of it, or of any offense, upon the person of Harris, until after the crime had been perpetrated; further, that she was the only witness by whom he could prove any of these facts; that she was taken sick of a miscarriage two or three days before the date set for trial, and was at the time in such a precarious condition of health as made it impossible for her to attend the trial; that he could not safely proceed in her absence; that by a month from that date she would have recovered her health, and be able to appear and testify. This affidavit was accompanied by the certificate of two physicians to the effect that they had examined the witness upon the Saturday preceding the day set for trial, and found her much prostrated, suffering from the indicated sickness, and completely incapacitated from making any exertion. Her attendance at court would be dangerous to her life. It was offered to procure affidavits covering the ground of the certificates, but no objection was urged to the form of their presentation. In addition to this, one of defendant's counsel testified in corroboration of the matters contained in the affidavit. This was the first continuance asked by defendant. The time—a month—was not unreasonable. There was no counter showing, yet the motion was denied. The reason for the refusal is not assigned, and none can be perceived. If the defendant could offer such evidence, and it was credited, it meant his complete vindication. There is no doubt, then, of its materiality. The court could not, with propriety, have discredited the affidavit. It was supported by the oath of defendant's counsel, who swore that to his own knowledge defendant's wife would give the testimony outlined. That the court abused its discretion in refusing to grant the motion is a conclusion which cannot be escaped. For far less has this court ordered new trials. People v. Dodge, 28 Cal. 445; People v. McCrory, 41 Cal. 458; People v. Brown, 46 Cal. 102. During the trial of the case the district attorney made the following statement to the court: "I have received information, which I believe to be authentic, that the witness [Mrs. Plyler] is no longer ill, if she ever was, and is up and about the streets of San José, and that, if the defense desire her attendance, they have time to procure her now." Counsel for defense answered that, though she had been subpoenaed by the defense, their information was that she was still too ill to be produced in court. The judge expressed his willingness to issue an attachment for the witness at demand of either side, and, neither party requesting it, there the matter dropped. This could not cure the error. If the district attorney was justified in his belief that the witness was malingering, or had recovered from her illness, he should have caused her to be produced in court, and thus have saved the case from the injury worked by the court's refusal to grant the continuance. The defense, holding the conviction that the witness was still very sick, properly declined to ask for an attachment. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

DAVIS v. STATE. (Sac. 280.)

STATES—LIABILITY FOR INTEREST ON BONDS.

St. 1893, p. 57, authorizing suits against the state on disputed claims, is simply a waiver of the state's prerogative not to be sued; and therefore, while a holder of Indian War bonds is entitled to recover from the state the face value of interest coupons attached thereto under Act 1851, Act 1893 does not allow a recovery of interest on such coupons.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by Samuel Davis against the state. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for only a portion of the relief asked, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Thornton and Freeman & Bates, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the State.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover the amount due upon certain interest coupons which were attached to bonds issued by the state of California under an act passed

February 15, 1851, "together with legal interest thereon from the respective dates of maturity of said coupons." The court below rendered judgment for the amount of the coupons, as shown by their face, but refused to give judgment for interest upon said coupons, as prayed for by plaintiff. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The coupons sued on were attached to certain bonds which are generally known as the "Indian War Bonds." The facts with respect to said bonds are fully stated in the opinions of this court in the cases of Sawyer v. Colgan, 102 Cal. 283, 36 Pac. 580, and Molineux v. State, 109 Cal. 378, 42 Pac. 34, and there need be no further statement of them here. See, also, St. 1851, p. 520. Appellant contends that the court below erred in not giving judgment for interest on the coupons from the date of their maturity, and this is the only alleged error for which a reversal is asked. The question here raised by appellant was before this court in the two cases above cited, and was determined against his present contention. When Sawyer v. Colgan, supra, was decided, there was in existence no statute or law allowing the state to be sued; and in that case the plaintiff brought mandamus against Colgan, the state controller, to compel him to draw his warrants for certain bonds and coupons issued under the said act of 1851, with interest upon the same from the dates of their maturity; but this court held that "the state is not liable to pay interest on its debts unless its consent to do so has been manifested by an act of the legislature or some lawful contract of its executive officers. U. S. v. North Carolina, 136 U. S. 211, 10 Sup. Ct. 920; Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 204, 26 N. E. 778." This was a direct adjudication that interest upon the coupons sued for in the case at bar cannot be recovered against the state. Afterwards, on February 28, 1893, the legislature passed an act allowing itself to be sued (St. 1893, p. 57); and appellant contends that some new right is given him, with respect to interest on these coupons, by said last-mentioned act. Shortly after this act went into effect, one Molineux commenced an action against the state upon certain coupons detached from said Indian War bonds of 1851, identical in character with those sued on here, and sought to recover interest upon the coupons from their respective dates of maturity. That case was therefore identical in every respect with the case at bar. The court below rendered judgment in favor of Molineux, for the coupons and interest, as there prayed for; but on appeal this court modified the judgment of the lower court by disallowing the interest, and held that no right to recover interest on said coupons had been created by the said act of February 28, 1893. Molineux v. State, supra.

The authorities above cited definitely determine the point made by appellant adversely to his contention. This, counsel for appellant concede; but in several briefs and in oral arguments they have strenuously, elaborately, and ably argued that those cases—and particularly Molineux v. State—were wrongly decided, and should be overruled. We do not deem it necessary to review their learned arguments, and to again enter upon a discussion of the question involved. It is sufficient to say that, after full consideration of their views, we are satisfied with the conclusion heretofore reached. It may be added, however, that counsel seem to treat the act of February 28, 1893, as an admission that the state is liable for interest on the coupons, and a legislative declaration that the state will pay it, and that, in our opinion, this view of that act is entirely unwarranted. Counsel say, in one of their briefs, that the act "was passed in part, at least, to pay this debt, and others like it." But there is no special reference in the act to the claim here sued on, nor is there any reference to any particular demand whatever. The act is a general one. The title is "An act to authorize suits against the state, and regulating the procedure therein." It is not its purpose to admit the validity of any asserted demand, and to require the controller to draw his warrant for its amount, which would be the natural form of an act for such a purpose. On the contrary, it relates to disputed claims,—claims "not allowed by the state board of examiners,"—and authorizes persons asserting such claims "to bring suits thereon against the state in any of the courts," etc., and expressly declares that "it shall be the duty of the attorney general to defend all such suits." The act is a mere waiver, within certain bounds, of the state's sovereign prerogative not to be sued. It says to one whose claim has been rejected by the board, "If you still think that you have a legal claim against me, I authorize you to sue me and I will abide by whatever the court shall decide." The act only put the appellant in the same position, with respect to his asserted claim, which he would have occupied at any time during the last 40 years, if during that time there had been an existing general act allowing the state to be sued; but, if such had been the case, while he could have sued for interest on the coupons, he could not have recovered, because, as we have seen, such interest does not constitute a cause of action against the state. It clearly was not the intent of the act to increase the liability of the state on the coupons in question; or, indeed, to give any new right, other than the right to sue, to any claimant whomsoever. There never was any question about the liability of the state to pay the face of the coupons, for that was expressly provided for by the act of 1851. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

DORSEY et al. v. NEWCOMER et al. (Sac. 395.)

MINING PARTNERSHIPS—ASSETS.

Property of a mining partnership existing only by reason of Civ. Code, § 2511, providing that a mining partnership exists when two or more persons who own or acquire a mining claim for the purpose of working it actually engage in working the same, does not include mining ground not actually worked, and not used in connection with the ground worked, nor purchased by partnership funds.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county.

Action by Thomas B. Dorsey and others against J. T. Newcomer and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. B. Robinson, J. B. Curtin, and Byron Waters, for appellants. F. W. Street, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to obtain an accounting in a mining partnership, a dissolution of the co-partnership, the payment of the partnership debts, and distribution of any surplus funds remaining. In the complaint it is alleged that on the 10th day of June, 1895, Caleb Dorsey and J. T. Newcomer were the owners of 10 designated mining claims, with quartz mill, tools, etc. Caleb Dorsey owned an undivided three-fourths interest, and Newcomer the remaining one-fourth. A conveyance from Caleb Dorsey to plaintiffs Thomas B. Dorsey, Edward W. Dorsey, and E. Snyder Dorsey of a part of his interest February 5, 1896, is averred, and also that Caleb Dorsey died April 21, 1896, and plaintiff E. L. Ewing is administratrix of his estate. It is then charged that debts were incurred in working, operating, and developing said mines and mining property. The findings of the court are generally in accordance with the complaint, but it is found as follows: "That plaintiffs or their grantors or predecessors and defendants have not, at any of the times in the complaint mentioned, engaged in working upon, or extracting any mineral from, any of the said mining claims, other than the Snell claim or mine, and all the mining work in which they joined or did during the time that they were co-owners in the said mines and mining claims was done upon said Snell mine and mining claim; that said Snell mine and mining claim is not adjacent to any of the other mines or mining claims described in the complaint, but is situated wholly separate from, and does not, on any side thereof touch upon or adjoin, any other of said mines or mining claims." Notwithstanding this absolute finding that the alleged partners were not at any time engaged in working any of the mining claims except the Snell claim, and that all the work done by them as co-partners was done upon said claim, in finding 6 the court finds that Caleb Dorsey and J. T. Newcomer had done work upon all the claims; that Caleb Dorsey and all the parties plaintiff and defendant had been working the Snell quartz mine and the True Business mine. In finding 7 it appears that the partnership had forfeited all mines except the Snell and True Business and the Horse Shoe, which last is wholly included in the Snell. In the decree it is ordered that the Snell mine, the True Business mine, and a certain quartz mill be sold to pay the debts of the partnership.

The partnership, if one existed, was not formed by an actual agreement between the partners to form one, or to do business as partners. It exists by reason of the law as expressed in section 2511, Civ. Code: "A mining partnership exists when two or more persons who own or acquire a mining claim for the purpose of working it actually engage in working the same." It is not always easy to determine what constitutes the partnership property of a mining partnership. The statute provides that the mining ground owned and worked by partners in mining, whether purchased by the partnership or not, is partnership property. It does not follow that property other than the ground owned and worked may not also be partnership property. No doubt, other property acquired by the partnership for the purpose of aiding in working the mining claim, such as a mill or mill site, would also be property of the partnership. So other mining ground acquired for the purpose of working with the mining ground already being worked, and so situated that it can be worked with the original claim as parts of one mine, would be partnership property. And, generally, it may be admitted that property acquired by the partnership by the use of partnership funds, as distinguished from the individuals constituting the firm, may be so regarded. But the statute evidently distinguishes between ground owned or acquired for the purpose of working, and ground actually worked. It is only the last that in general can be regarded as partnership property, when not acquired by the partnership, or by the use of its funds. The findings as to the actual working of any claims other than the Snell are, at the best, contradictory. Such findings would not sustain a judgment which must be based upon the proposition that they were actually worked by the partnership. If it can be said that there is a finding to the effect that, if the Snell mine could be placed upon a paying basis, the parties intended then to develop the True Business, that is not enough. An agreement that upon the happening of some contingent, future event, they would work a mining claim, tends rather to show that they have never worked it. The finding as to the forfeiture of some of the mining claims is clearly outside of the issues in the case. If the partnership was actually working those claims, no partner could assert title, to the prejudice of the creditors of the partnership. But there was no issue upon the subject. Neither in the complaint, nor in any other pleading, were facts constituting a forfeiture pleaded. No issue was tendered or made upon this subject. The plaintiffs do not contend that, under the evidence or findings, work in mining was done upon any of the claims which are declared to have been forfeited. They therefore did not belong to the partnership, and whether they had been forfeited or not was immaterial.

Inasmuch as the findings contradict each other in respects which are material in determining the relief which should be awarded, a new trial must be had. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. VIDAL. (Cr. 343.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1898.)

LARCENY—POSSESSION—EVIDENCE—OTHER CRIMES.

1. Accused was arrested in possession of a mare, driving her harnessed to a buggy, and leading another horse, two or three days after the theft, and at a place 30 miles from the pasture from which she was stolen. When arrested he spoke of the horses as his own, and claimed to be taking them to pasture, but denied his identity, claiming to be his brother, and had very recently shaved his mustache. His account of his whereabouts was inconsistent with the testimony of witnesses who had seen him. Held, that the evidence sufficiently corroborated the inculpatory possession of recently stolen property to warrant a submission to the jury.

2. A city marshal called by the state to prove the flight of accused was permitted to testify that he had been looking for accused for about two weeks before the crime in question was committed, and from other parts of his testimony it appeared that he wanted to and did arrest him for a different crime than that charged, and wholly disconnected from it. Held, that the admission of such testimony was error.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county.

Francisco Vidal was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial he appealed. Reversed.

Graves & Graves, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. The defendant, convicted of grand larceny, appeals from the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial.

It is first contended that, as matter of law, the evidence on behalf of the people is insufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment, for that defendant was convicted upon the uncorroborated circumstance that he was found in the possession of a mare recently stolen. People v. Swinford, 57 Cal. 86; Same v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 463. The testimony tended to show that the stolen animal was the property of George Walker; that she, with other animals, was running in an inclosed pasture; that her owner had seen her on August 30th or 31st. On September 1st she was gone. The gate of the pasture was locked, but it could be opened by lifting the gate from its socket and swinging it outward. The defendant was arrested at Santa Margarita, at 10 o'clock of the night of September 2d. Santa Margarita is about 30 miles from the place where the mare was taken. Defendant was driving her harnessed to a buggy, and leading another horse. When arrested he spoke of the horses as his own, asked what was going to be done with "his rig," and declared that it had been his intention to take it to Mr. Boronda's ranch and put the horses in pasture. At the time of his arrest he denied his identity, and asserted that he was not Francisco Vidal, but his brother. He had very recently shaved his mustache. He explained his movements and whereabouts for the preceding two days, and his account was inconsistent with the evidence of witnesses who had seen him, and who were familiar with the localities which he declared he had visited. This is a fair résumé of the evidence offered on behalf of the people.

It is urged that these circumstances are not corroborative of the single inculpatory fact of the possession of recently stolen property. The defendant offered no evidence, so that the case stands upon these facts alone. Though the corroborating evidence is not very strong, still we think it sufficient to authorize the submission of the case to the jury.

The witness Cook, who aided in making the arrest of defendant, had testified that he first learned that the horses had been stolen upon September 1st. He was then asked: "How long prior to that time had you been looking for this man, if at all?" An objection was interposed to the question, and the district attorney stated that his object was to show the flight of the defendant. The court overruled the objection, and the witness answered: "I had been looking for him for about two weeks." A motion was then made to strike out the answer, and it was denied. As the witness had testified that he was looking for the defendant for two weeks before he knew of the larceny of the horse, it is manifest that he was in search of him for some reason entirely disconnected with the charge. The witness was the city marshal of San Luis Obispo. From other parts of his testimony, elicited upon direct examination under objection of defendant, it is made to appear that he was looking for defendant, with Sheriff Matthews of Salinas City, to arrest him upon another separate and distinct criminal charge, and in fact he was arrested upon that charge, and not for the larceny of the horse. Under pretense that the evidence to be adduced was to show the flight of the defendant charged with the particular crime under investigation as evidence of his guilt, the court permitted testimony to go before the jury to the injury of defendant, involving a charge against him of a separate and distinct crime in no way connected with the one before the court. The injury worked to defendant by this is apparent, and because of it the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

APPEAL—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW—TRESPASS OF AGENT—LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL.

1. Where a case has been tried on the theory that vindictive damages might be recovered, an objection that the complaint does not warrant such damages cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

2. Defendant's agent seized by force a quantity of raisins belonging to plaintiff, under a mortgage which did not cover them. He represented one of his draymen to be an officer, and, during the loading, held and assaulted plaintiff. Defendant, with knowledge of these facts, kept the raisins. Held that, by accepting the benefits of the agent's acts, defendant ratified and adopted them, and was liable therefor.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by H. Avakian and others against George B. Noble and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. L. Cory, for appellants. Sayle & Caldwell, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. Action to recover damages for a trespass committed by defendants, in seizing and carrying away from plaintiff's possession a quantity of raisins. The substantive averments of the complaint are that while plaintiff was the owner and in possession, and entitled to possession, of a certain lot of raisins, of the value of $300, the defendants "unlawfully, oppressively, and with force and arms," took and carried them away, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $2,300. The verdict was for plaintiff for the sum of $525; and from a judgment entered thereon, and an order denying them a new trial, defendants appeal.

1. The first point made is that the verdict was in excess of what plaintiff was entitled to recover under his complaint; that, being for a sum above the value of the raisins, as alleged, it is manifest that the jury, in addition to the actual damage suffered, awarded something by way of smart money or punitive damages for the wrong committed, while the facts stated do not authorize an award of punitive or exemplary damages. It is quite obvious from the averments of the complaint that the purpose of the pleader was to allege facts bringing the case within section 3294 of the Civil Code, which provides: "In any action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud or malice, actual or presumed, the jury, in addition to the actual damages, may give damages for the sake of example, and by way of punishing the defendant." It may be conceded that, as against a special demurrer for uncertainty or ambiguity, the complaint would be bad, and that plaintiff would have been required to allege in a more specific manner the circumstances showing oppression or malice in the doing of the act complained of, in order to entitle him to damages in excess of the actual value of the property taken. Mallory v. Thomas, 98 Cal. 644, 33 Pac. 757; Lamb v. Harbaugh, 105 Cal. 680, 39 Pac. 56. But defendants interposed no such demurrer, and after verdict the intendments are in favor of the sufficiency of the pleading. The circumstances of the trespass are alleged in very general terms, it is true; but it appears from the record that the trial proceeded upon the theory that the complaint was sufficient to bring the case within the principles stated in the above provision of the Code, and that in accordance with that theory evidence was admitted, without objection, showing the circumstances of aggravation under which the property was taken. In such a case the objection now made comes too late, and the complaint must be held sufficient to sustain the judgment.

2. The circumstances of the taking, as the evidence tended to disclose, were, in substance, these: The defendants, who were in the raisin-packing business in the city of Fresno, held a chattel mortgage, in the name of one of the firm, upon the plaintiff's crop of raisins for the season of 1894. In November of that year they sent one Tripp to plaintiff's place, to find if he had delivered to them all the raisins included in their mortgage, which covered the product of plaintiff's own vines. Tripp found the lot of raisins in controversy packed in sweat boxes on plaintiff's premises, and at once demanded of the latter that he deliver them at defendants' warehouse. He was informed by plaintiff that the raisins were not covered by the mortgage, but were a lot plaintiff had purchased from one Sanborn. Tripp insisted upon the delivery of the grapes to defendants, and, upon plaintiff's refusal to comply with his demand, went to Fresno, procured a dray and two men, and, returning to plaintiff's place, directed his men to load the raisins and deliver them to defendants. Plaintiff undertook to prevent this, when Tripp, representing that one of his assistants was a deputy sheriff, and that they intended taking the raisins at all events, forcibly seized plaintiff and held him while the raisins were loaded and carted away to defendants' warehouse. In the struggle, plaintiff was thrown down, and somewhat bruised and injured. Defendants knew on the day of the taking that Tripp had had trouble in getting the raisins, and that he was arrested for the assault on plaintiff, and subsequently paid a fine; and plaintiff on that day or the next went to defendants, and informed them of the acts committed by Tripp, and also that the raisins were not covered by the mortgage, and demanded their return. The demand was refused, and this action was brought. It is not denied that the manner of the taking was exceedingly stronghanded and outrageous, nor that, if defendants were responsible for the acts of Tripp, they would be liable in punitive damages; but defendants contend that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the implied finding of the jury that they authorized the malicious or violent acts of their agent in the premises. This contention is wholly untenable. It is not necessary to inquire whether the evidence was sufficient to justify an inference that the course pursued by Tripp was in pursuance of previous directions or authorization by defendants, since the evidence, while somewhat conflicting, clearly warranted the jury in finding that, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances attending the seizure of the raisins, they adopted and ratified the acts of Tripp, by retaining and accepting the fruits thereof. Ratification under such circumstances is equivalent to express precedent authority.

3. There is complaint of error in the giving and refusing of instructions, but we discover none. Reading the instructions as a whole, they fully and fairly presented the law to the jury, and left no room for misapprehension on the part of the latter. We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1618, making void all contracts between an heir and an executor for higher compensation than that allowed by law, an agreement by the heir to compensate the executor for extraordinary services, or for attorney's fees in addition to that fixed by the court, is void.

5. The waiver of the right to apply for an allowance will not validate an agreement by an heir to pay an executor a higher compensation than allowed by law.

6. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 470, providing that where the variance is not material the court may order an immediate amendment, the court may at the close of the trial order an amendment to conform to the proofs, where the opposite party is not misled or prejudiced thereby.

Action by H. C. Firebaugh against Blanche M. Burbank and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henning & Bowen, for appellant. R. A. Redman and J. D. Pope, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. By the complaint herein the plaintiff seeks to recover upon a written contract made to him by the defendants November 4, 1895, for the payment of $9,500, in installments of $500, payable on the 10th day of each month thereafter. In the answer originally filed, the defendants pleaded want of consideration for the execution of the instrument, and that it was made as a donation or gift; and, by amendments thereto subsequently filed, they pleaded that it was obtained by the plaintiff by duress and fraud, and also that it was illegal, and therefore void. The cause was tried by the court, and findings of fact were made in accordance with the answer, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendants, from which the present appeal has been taken.

There was evidence before the court from which it was authorized to make its findings of fact, and the correctness of the judgment must depend upon the sufficiency of these findings to support the judgment. If the findings of fact that are within the issues presented by the pleadings are sufficient to uphold the judgment, it will not be set aside because there are also findings outside of these issues. These latter findings are to be disregarded, as immaterial. The question therefore presented is whether the findings of fact sustain the judgment.

The instrument upon which the action is brought was executed under the following circumstances: By the last will and testament of William Walkerly, deceased, the testator had made two of his nephews his executors, and had given to them the bulk of his estate in trust for certain purposes. Distribution of the estate was made in accordance with the terms of the will November 27, 1893; but upon the appeal therefrom by the widow the supreme court reversed the decree, and, under its opinion rendered upon the reversal (108 Cal. 627, 41 Pac. 772), she became entitled to the entire estate; and, after the remittitur had been filed in the superior court, the hearing for a distribution was set for November 4, 1895. By the reversal of the decree the testator's provision for the nephews had become nugatory, and Bacon, one of the nephews and executors, having died pending the appeal, the testator's widow, who in the meantime had married Mr. Burbank, her co-defendant, formed a purpose to make some provision for the widow of Bacon, and also for the other nephew; and, this purpose having been brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff, he insisted that he was entitled to compensation—fixed by him at the sum of $10,000—for certain services which he had rendered the estate, and that he should be included in the provision which she intended to make. Considerable negotiation was had upon the subject, the plaintiff also claiming that the surviving executor was entitled to compensation for extraordinary services in caring for the estate,—the entire amount claimed in their behalf being $30,000; and Mrs. Burbank was led to believe that the distribution of the estate would be delayed unless she assented to his demand. She was therefore induced to consent that the sum of $21,000, including the surrender to Barker, the surviving executor, of his note for $1,000, be given for the use of the three. The plaintiff insisted that the money which she intended to give should be paid through him, and accordingly a check for the sum of $10,500 was drawn by Barker upon the funds of the estate, then under his control, and given to the plaintiff, and the agreement set forth in the complaint was executed by the defendants. It is not claimed on this appeal that the plaintiff had any claim against the defendants, except such as he was entitled to assert by reason of his claim against the estate. The agreement of the defendants with the plaintiff stands in the same position, and is to be considered with the same effect, as if it had been made with the surviving executor. The plaintiff was but the agent of the executors, and the agreement with him was made in behalf of the surviving executor. He was their attorney, and had no claim against the estate of Walkerly, except for services rendered them in behalf of the estate, and to such an amount as should be allowed therefor by the court to the executors. The executors were not, however, authorized to create a charge against the estate for the purpose of defending the decree of distribution against the appeal therefrom. The estate had been distributed to them as trustees, and the defense of the decree was to be made by them as such distributees, and not as executors, and the expense incurred thereby could not be made a charge against the estate. Marey's Estate, 65 Cal. 287, 3 Pac. 896. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Bacon could have had no claim against the estate or against the defendants for services rendered in the administration of the estate.

In the decree of distribution of November 27, 1893, the court allowed the sum of $3,500 for the services of the plaintiff to the executors up to the date of that decree, and refused to make to the executors any allowance for extraordinary services in the administration of the estate. The appeal by the widow from this decree suspended its execution, and until the determination of that appeal the executors were not only precluded from distributing the estate in accordance with its terms, but were required to retain the property in their care and custody. Upon the reversal of the decree, and until a decree of distribution should be rendered in accordance with the opinion of the supreme court, their relation to the estate was the same as it was immediately prior to its entry, in November, 1893. For whatever services they might require the aid of an attorney during this period, the court was to allow them in the settlement of any supplemental account they might present; and they were also entitled to commissions upon any additional property of the estate which might during this interval come into their custody, and be accounted for by them. If they should be required to render any extraordinary services during this time, the court could, upon their making claim therefor, allow them such sum as it might deem just and reasonable. A mere change of the character of the property, such as the collection of outstanding claims that had been distributed in kind, or, as in the present case, the collection of policies of insurance for property destroyed by fire, would not entitle them to commissions upon the amounts so collected, since the property of the estate would thereby be only changed in form, but not increased in value, and no additional estate would be accounted for. But, before the court could make any allowance from the estate, the surviving executor was required to present his account, and to show to the satisfaction of the court that it was necessary to employ an attorney in the suits or proceedings for which the expenses of his services are claimed, and that the amount of such fees is reasonable, and was a necessary expense in the care and management of the estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1616. The executor is not entitled to any "further allowance" in addition to the commissions fixed by statute unless he shall show that he has rendered some extraordinary services, and shall make a claim therefor, and it shall appear to the court that such claim is just and reasonable. Delaney's Estate, 110 Cal. 563, 42 Pac. 981. He is the officer of the court who is intrusted with the custody of the estate for the purpose of administration pending its transmission from the ancestor to the heir, and his relation to the court, as well as to the heir, is of a fiduciary nature; and it is the policy of the law that the court shall have a supervisory control of all his acts and transactions, and of all claims which he may have against the estate, and that he shall not directly or indirectly make any profit out of the estate, or appropriate to himself any of its property without the sanction of the court. The provision in section 1618, Code Civ. Proc., making void all contracts for higher compensation between an heir and an executor, is not limited to contracts made directly between the executor and the heir, but includes all contracts or agreements by which the executor will receive, either directly or indirectly, any greater compensation than has been fixed by the statute, or any compensation other than such as may be previously ascertained and determined by the court, and applies to every contract which has for one of its objects the payment of such greater compensation, as well as to those which are made solely for such payment. A contract made in violation of this provision is against the policy of the law, and is therefore unlawful; and, when the object of a contract is unlawful in part, the entire contract is void, unless the lawful portion thereof is severable from that which is unlawful. An agreement by the heir to compensate the executor for extraordinary services, or for the expenses incurred in employing attorneys other than such as may have been previously fixed by the court, is as fully within the prohibition of the statute as an agreement to give him a greater rate of commission than is fixed by the statute. The relation between them is that of a trustee and his beneficiary, and the law presumes that such an agreement by the heir has been obtained through the undue influence of the executor, and will not enforce it against the heir.

The agreement upon which the present action is brought is a part of the transaction between Mrs. Burbank, the heir to the estate of Walkerly, and Barker, the surviving executor of his will, for the payment of the sum of $21,000 for commissions and extra services claimed by the executor for the administration of the estate subsequent to November 27, 1893, of which the executor was to receive $8,000 for himself and $8,000 for the plaintiff, in compensation for services rendered as his attorney in the management of the estate. There is no mode of ascertaining by the terms of this contract what portion thereof was intended for commissions, or the amount which the executor was entitled to receive as commissions. The account which was filed by him upon the hearing of the distribution was settled and allowed by the court, and no claim for commissions was included therein. No application for an allowance for extraordinary services was made to the court, nor any claim for the expense of attorneys' fees; and, as we have seen above, in the absence of any allowance therefor by the court the executor was not entitled to any compensation for such services or expenses, and an agreement by the heir to pay him therefor is void. The claim by the plaintiff that the waiver on the part of the executor to apply for such allowance was a sufficient consideration for the agreement cannot be sustained. If the object of a contract is unlawful, the contract is void, irrespective of the consideration upon which it is made. Even if it be conceded that such waiver would uphold an agreement to pay the legal amount of commissions to which the executor would be entitled, the proposition is inapplicable to the present case. Barker testified at the trial that the object of the agreement set forth in the complaint was to compensate him for commissions and extra services; and as the amount of the estate which he had received subsequent to the former decree, aside from the policies of insurance, was less than $50,000, the money which was received by him at the time the instrument was executed was largely in excess of the compensation fixed by statute.

During the trial, evidence was offered and received on behalf of defendants, to which the plaintiff objected on the ground that it was immaterial and irrelevant to any issue before the court; and at the close of the trial, and after argument by counsel, the court announced that it would direct findings and judgment in favor of the defendants, but stated that it would be necessary to amend the answer in order that it might conform to the proofs. An amendment to their answer was accordingly filed by the defendants, and thereafter the plaintiff made a motion to reopen the case for the purpose of receiving additional evidence in his behalf under the issues raised thereby, and also demurred to the amendment upon the ground that it stated no defense to his cause of action. After argument thereon the court denied the motion, and overruled the demurrer. The defendants had the right to present by their answer any matter which would constitute a defense to the cause of action set forth in the complaint, and the court was authorized to permit them to plead such matter by amending their answer, even after the trial had commenced. If, without such amendment, evidence was received at the trial which did not constitute a material variance, the court could either find the fact in accordance with the evidence, or it could direct the pleadings to be amended to conform thereto. Code Civ. Proc. § 470. When this evidence was offered, the plaintiff did not claim that he was misled by its introduction, or in any way prevented from maintaining his cause of action upon its merits. Nor did he upon his motion to reopen the cause, or afterwards upon his motion for a new trial, make it appear to the court that he was prejudiced thereby, or in any way prevented from introducing evidence, or that he was able to present any evidence that would tend to overcome this testimony. The evidence thus introduced, and the findings made thereon, are therefore to be regarded as if the defendants had amended their answer presenting these issues prior to entering upon the trial, or even prior to the introduction of any testimony. A similar observation is to be made upon the introduction of certain depositions which were taken before the first amendment to the answer was filed. If the matter contained in these depositions was relevant to the issues before the court when the cause was submitted for decision, it was properly considered by the court in making its decision. The judgment and order are affirmed.

SPAULDING v. HOWARD et al. (No. 12,497.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—LIMITATIONS—FINDINGS—OFFICERS—PRESUMPTIONS—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that in foreclosure suits a decree may direct a sale of the property by the sheriff, etc., the proceedings to sell are analogous to, but not necessarily the same as, in sales on execution, under sections 682 and 684, requiring that the writ of execution shall bear the seal of the court, and be subscribed by the clerk; and hence the omission of the clerk's signature from the order of sale in foreclosure is not necessarily fatal to its validity.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15, establishing a rebuttal presumption that an official duty was regularly performed, a finding that "an order of sale was duly issued" raises a presumption that, if the signature of the clerk of the court was essential to its validity, it had been subscribed.

3. The presumption, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15, that an official duty has been regularly performed, must be rebutted, if at all, on trial.

4. Where the assignee of a recorded mortgage began a foreclosure suit, and omitted to make the mortgagees in a second recorded mortgage parties, and, eight years after the accrual of his right of action against them, made such second mortgagees parties, they having successfully foreclosed the original mortgagor's equity of redemption, free of the first mortgage, without knowledge, actual or constructive, of the assignment, it was proper to find as a fact, and not as a conclusion of law, that by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 312, 335, 337, barring mortgages in four years, whatever interest said assignee had in the premises was barred.

5. In the absence of any record showing that there were double findings, the presumption is that the court based the judgment on those appearing in the judgment roll alone, ignoring any others.

6. A court may change or modify findings before judgment without ordering a new trial.

7. Where there are two sets of findings made at different times before judgment, and either or both will support the judgment, the changes in the original findings are not error.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lake county.

Action by John Spaulding against J. W. Howard and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff against defendant Howard, and a judgment in favor of the other defendants, and plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

Mr. Nichols and Fox & Kellogg, for appellant. F. E. Baker, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage brought originally by Alvinza Hayward

(for whom plaintiff John Spaulding, as assignee of Hayward, was substituted) against J. W. Howard, one of the defendants, mortgagor. Succinctly stated, the facts are: That said J. W. Howard, on August 8, 1872, executed his note for $405.48 to one Joseph Hewitt, payable August 8, 1874, and secured by mortgage on lands in Lake county. The note and mortgage were assigned by Hewitt to Hayward, November 4, 1875, long after maturity. The assignment was in writing, and was acknowledged, but was not recorded. On December 9, 1876, Howard executed his note to defendants Ely and Griffin for $1,700, secured by mortgage on the same and other lands. This note was due 12 months after date. Howard's wife joined in the mortgage, which was recorded December 29, 1876. On February 12, 1878, Ely and Griffin commenced action to foreclose their mortgage in the late district court of the Sixth district, in and for Yolo county. In their action Howard and his wife and Hewitt (Hayward's assignor) were made defendants. Summons was duly issued and served; and on July 18, 1878, the court entered its decree of foreclosure, finding that the apparent lien of Hewitt had been discharged, and was subject to that of Ely and Griffin. A copy of the decree was duly docketed and recorded in Lake county on June 1, 1880. On April 8, 1882, an order of sale was duly issued, and the land sold under the foreclosure decree; and Ely and Griffin became the purchasers, and, no redemption having been made, the sheriff's deed was duly issued to them December 1, 1882. On August 7, 1878, Hayward, assignee of Hewitt, brought this foreclosure suit against the mortgagor, Howard, alone, in the late district court of the Seventh judicial district in and for Lake county, and on April 1, 1879, filed his pendens. Summons was published on the original complaint, and decree entered April 9, 1879, foreclosing the mortgage; and the land was sold pursuant to the decree, March 20, 1880, to one William Kohl. On July 9, 1884, without vacating the judgment, plaintiff Hayward caused an alias summons to issue against Howard; and on July 14, 1884, he procured an order vacating the decree, and permitting the action to be prosecuted, as though no decree had been entered. The alleged reason for this proceeding was that the decree was inadvertently entered, and that the court had not obtained jurisdiction of defendant Howard. This alias summons was published without affidavit or order for service by publication other than the ones first made and filed. On May 5, 1884, Hayward obtained an order allowing him to file a supplemental complaint, and to make Ely and Griffin parties defendant, who appeared and answered Plaintiff Spaulding, on September 30, 1880, purchased whatever interest Kohl took at the sale to him; and, by stipulation, Spaulding was substituted for Hayward as plaintiff, and entitled to whatever rights Hayward might be found to have. The court gave personal judgment against Howard for the amount due on his note given to Hewitt, and, as to the other defendants, that plaintiff take nothing by his action. Plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll alone.

It is contended that the findings do not sustain the decree:

(a) Because no valid order of sale was issued under the foreclosure of Ely and Griffin, it being claimed that the writ must be not only issued under the seal of the court, but also subscribed by the clerk; citing Code Civ. Proc. §§ 682, 684. The findings are that the court ordered the land included in the Ely and Griffin mortgage to be sold by the sheriff of Lake county, in which county it was found that their decree had been duly docketed and recorded; that "an order of sale was duly issued out of the superior court of Yolo county, under seal of said court, upon said judgment and decree, and reciting the same, directed to the sheriff of said Lake county, commanding him," etc. The sheriff, under the Code of Civil Procedure, proceeds with the sale by virtue of the decree and such direction as the court may give. Section 726. The proceeding follows by analogy sales upon execution, but not necessarily so. The power to sell comes from the statute and the decree. However, the court found that an order of sale was duly issued upon the decree; and, if the law required it to be certified or attested by the clerk, it will be presumed that this was done. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15. If plaintiff desired to dispute this presumption when the defendants offered their decree in evidence, he should then have made the objection, and brought the question here by bill of exceptions or statement.

(b) The point is made that the conclusions of law and fact must be separately stated; that the conclusion in regard to the statute of limitations is in the findings of fact; that there is nothing in the conclusions of law to the effect that the action is barred; and this being a conclusion of law, and not of fact, plaintiff should have had a decree against all the defendants,—citing Caulfield v. Sanders, 17 Cal. 571; Schroeder v. Jahns, 27 Cal. 278, 279; Paulson v. Nunan, 64 Cal. 290, 30 Pac. 845. Defendants Ely and Griffin pleaded the statute of limitations. Plaintiff's right of action against Ely and Griffin accrued to his assignor December 29, 1876, when the second mortgage was recorded, as his note was then long past due. But defendants Ely and Griffin were not made parties to this action until December 9, 1884, eight years after plaintiff's cause of action accrued against them. Of course, Ely's and Griffin's rights were not affected by the assignment of Hewitt to Hayward, of which they had no knowledge, actual or constructive. The commencement of the action by Hayward did not stop the running of the statute in favor of Ely and Griffin. Jeffers v. Cook, 58 Cal. 150. In the foreclosure by Ely and Griffin they made all persons parties defendant in whose favor any interest appeared of record, and this was all that was required of them. Code Civ. Proc. § 726. Hewitt's interest in the land was thus extinguished, and he was estopped. Hutchings v. Ebeler, 46 Cal. 559. Hayward was in no better position with his unrecorded assignment (Code Civ. Proc. § 726); and Spaulding took only Hayward's rights. The court found that "any cause of action which Hayward, or plaintiff Spaulding, as his successor in interest herein, ever had against said Ely and Griffin, or against either of them, is barred by the provisions of sections 312, 335, and 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure." The court properly, we think, found as a fact, and not as a conclusion of law, that the action was barred.

(c) It is complained that the decree was rendered on findings made May 9, 1887, but that other findings were made February 8, 1886, and were never set aside or any motion made for a new trial, and this is alleged to be error; citing Prince v. Lynch, 38 Cal. 528. Appellant gives no explanation, by bill of exceptions or otherwise, how there came to be two sets of findings; nor does he point out wherein his rights were injuriously affected by the second set of findings. These earlier findings do not appear as a part of the judgment roll, and the judgment does not in any wise rest upon them. We do not see how we can take any notice of them, even if they would have the effect to change the judgment, which they would not, as they are substantially the same as the later ones. In the absence of some proper record showing that there were double findings, we must presume that the court based its judgment alone on the findings in the judgment roll, and that the first findings were properly ignored by the court. Prince v. Lynch, supra, is not in point, for there the court changed the findings after judgment. But the court may change or modify findings before judgment without ordering a new trial. It was held in Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 533, 23 Pac. 217, that this may be done; and where there are two sets of findings, and either or both will support the judgment, changes in the findings before judgment are not error. See, also, Hayes v. Wetherbee, 60 Cal. 396. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

(121 Cal. 167)

STOCKTON COMBINED HARVESTER & AGRICULTURAL WORKS v. GLENS FALLS INS. CO. OF NEW YORK. (Sac. 262.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1898.)

PLEADING—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER—VARIANCE—WAIVER—APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSURANCE—ADJUSTMENT—AGENCY—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 7, providing that a complaint may be demurred to for ambiguity, unintelligibility, or uncertainty, a demurrer will not lie on the ground that a complaint contains contradictory counts.

2. A cause of action arising out of one transaction may be separately stated in counts inconsistent with each other.

3. An objection that the reply fails to deny material allegations of the answer cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469-471, providing that no variance is material unless the adverse party is prejudiced thereby, an allegation in a complaint that defendant agreed to pay a loss incurred by fire on a certain date is supported by a finding that defendant agreed to pay the loss in 60 days after the filing of proofs of loss, and that they were filed 60 days preceding the date alleged as the date of payment.

5. An objection that there is a fatal variance between the complaint and the proof cannot be made for the first time after judgment.

6. The parties to an insurance policy in suit appointed appraisers to adjust the loss on the buildings, and they appraised it at a fixed sum. Other appraisers were appointed to adjust the loss on the contents, who had several meetings with agents of the insurance companies interested. After one meeting, the chairman stated to the arbitrators that the companies (defendant being one of them, and represented at the meeting) had agreed to a certain sum to be paid for the total loss on buildings and contents, and that they should make their award accordingly. One of the arbitrators testified to having informed the agents just before this that he had authority to settle the loss. Insurers' counsel was present, and inquired minutely about the loss. The arbitrators then made out an award for the sum so agreed on, choosing a third person umpire, who signed the award with them. The other arbitrator testified that the chairman had informed them their proposition was accepted, and that they should make out proof of loss and get their money. Held, that the evidence supported a finding that defendant agreed to pay its proportionate share of the award.

7. The record of a former trial will not be examined on the question whether the findings made after a new trial are supported by the evidence.

8. Under Civ. Code, § 1698, providing that a contract in writing can be altered only by an agreement in writing or an executed oral contract, an agreement to settle a loss under an insurance policy, though founded on the policy, is a new agreement, and need not be in writing.

9. In an action on an agreement by insurer to pay a specified sum in settlement of a loss, it appeared that plaintiff's bookkeeper had refused to show the insurance companies the books containing records of the destroyed property. An employé of plaintiff testified that on the succeeding day they were shown the books by him and the bookkeeper. Another witness testified that, after this, one of defendant's agents had in his pocket a paper belonging to plaintiff, showing the value of a portion of the destroyed property, and stated that he had received it from plaintiff. Held, that a finding that plaintiff had not concealed the books and records from defendant was sustained.

10. The agent of other insurance companies who acts for defendant company in settling a loss, signing the agreement for arbitration, and the adjuster's report, and receiving proofs of loss on behalf of all interested companies, is such an agent of defendant as to render his declarations admissible against it.

11. Where a witness in an action on an insurance policy testified that certain machines burned were worthless, it is harmless error not to allow him to state his reasons for his opinion.

12. In an action for an amount agreed to be paid by insurer for burned machinery, evidence that other machines of the same pattern are worthless is inadmissible to prove that plaintiff misrepresented the value of the burned machinery to defendant's adjusters.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by the Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works against the Glens Falls Insurance Company of New York. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. Nicoll & Orr and J. C. Campbell, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. This is an action to recover for insurance on the property of plaintiff destroyed by fire. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying motion for a new trial, this appeal is prosecuted upon bill of exceptions. The case was once before tried, and appealed to this court, and is reported in 98 Cal. 557, 33 Pac. 633.

Submitted upon the brief in this case, upon the same record, are also two other cases, to wit, Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. (No. 261) 53 Pac. 1129, and Same Plaintiff v. Hamburg-Magdeburg Fire Ins. Co. (No. 259) Id. Upon substantially the same record is one other case, to wit, Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works v. American Fire Ins. Co. (No. 260) 53 Pac. 573, but in which one point is urged by appellant not open to it in the other cases. The total insurance upon the property was $127,000. The aggregate amount claimed by plaintiff from all the defendants is $90,000. The pleadings are verified. The complaint contains three counts. The third was stricken out on motion. The first count alleges that plaintiff presented its proofs of loss immediately after the fire, which occurred August 19, 1888, in accordance with the terms of the policies, but that plaintiff and the insurers were unable to agree upon the amount of the loss, and thereupon all parties submitted the question of loss to the arbitrament of certain arbitrators, as the policies provided might be done, viz. to James Brown and A. A. Snyder on the building, and to Fred Arnold and Alex. Neilson on all the other property; that said Brown and Snyder, after investigation, reported to the parties that the loss submitted to them was $22,360 on the building; that said decision and award has been accepted by the parties, and has never been questioned or disapproved; that the said Arnold and Neilson, being unable to agree as to the amount of the loss submitted to them, thereupon, under the terms of the submission, selected one A. A. Snyder as an umpire; that these three, after due investigation, decided and reported to the parties that the loss submitted to them was $67,640 in the aggregate; that thereupon the insurers agreed with plaintiff, "as an adjustment of the entire of its said loss and damage, to pay to said plaintiff the sum of ninety thousand dollars," and that the loss was adjusted at that sum, of which the proportionate share of this defendant was $1,859.25, which defendant promised to pay; that the value of the entire insured property destroyed was greatly in excess of the said awards. The second count differs from the first only in alleging that, upon the disagreement of the arbitrators Arnold and Neilson, defendant and the other insurers "instructed and directed the said arbitrators Arnold and Neilson, as aforesaid, to appoint and select one A. A. Snyder as an umpire to ascertain and agree upon the amount of the said loss and damage, * * * and to adjust the same, and were instructed and directed * * * to fix and determine the said loss and damage at such sum that the same, in addition to the said loss and damage ascertained, fixed, and determined by said arbitrators, Brown and Snyder, as aforesaid, should equal the sum of ninety thousand dollars upon the entire of the said property insured by all of plaintiff's insurers." The complaint then sets forth the several sums apportioned against the different properties insured, and the acceptance and acquiescence of the insurers in the awards thus made, and their agreement to pay, etc.

1. Appellant urges its demurrer to the complaint on the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty, basing its objection upon the inconsistency and contradiction in the two counts in this: that in one it is claimed that the awards were the result of due investigation and decision, while in the other the awards were alleged to be the result of consent and agreement without investigation,—citing Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671. There is no merit in this point. It is not claimed that there is ambiguity or uncertainty in either count considered alone, but the claim is that the first count is rendered ambiguous and uncertain by reason of allegations found in the second count, and vice versa. We do not think that a demurrer, under section 430, subd. 7, Code Civ. Proc., to a particular count on either of the grounds therein mentioned, to wit, ambiguity, unintelligibility, or uncertainty, can be aided by reference to another count or separate cause of action found in the complaint. There is no suggestion that the causes of action separately stated in the two counts may not be united, nor is it suggested that either count fails to state a cause of action. Besides, we see no reason why a cause of action arising out of the same transaction may not be separately stated in different ways, even though they are inconsistent with each other. The defendant is permitted to plead inconsistent defenses (Id. § 441); and there can be no good reason why the same rule should not apply to different counts of a complaint as well as to the answer.

2. Appellant claims that judgment should have been ordered for defendant upon the pleadings. Defendant answered in part by cross complaint, and the claim now is that certain of its allegations were admitted by a failure to deny them. We nowhere can find in the transcript and our attention is not called to any motion for judgment upon the pleadings at the trial. No objection was made to the introduction of evidence on such ground. Defendant introduced evidence in support of the allegations now claimed to be admitted by the pleadings. It nowhere appears that the attention of the trial court was called to these alleged admissions, and it appears that both parties tried the case as if all the allegations of the cross complaint were denied. We do not think appellant can be heard here for the first time upon the point raised. Klopper v. Levy, 98 Cal. 525, 33 Pac. 444; Loftus v. Fischer, 106 Cal. 616, 39 Pac. 1064.

3. The point is urged by appellant that there is a fatal variance between the promise as alleged and as found. The complaint was filed after December 31, 1888. It alleged that the defendant "promised and agreed to pay to plaintiff herein said sum of eighteen hundred and fifty-nine and  $\frac{25}{100}$  dollars on or before December 31, 1888, as and for its proportionate amount of said loss." The promise as found by the court was as follows: "That said defendant, at the time of the settlement and adjustment aforesaid, promised to pay to said plaintiff herein, and said plaintiff promised and agreed to accept from it, the said sum of \$1,859.25 in full settlement of and for defendant's proportionate amount of said loss, such payment to be made to plaintiff within sixty days from the time when formal proofs of loss, prepared in accordance with said settlement and adjustment, should be received by defendant. That such formal proofs of loss were prepared by said plaintiff, and presented to said defendant on the 31st day of October, 1888." The position of appellant is that the promise alleged is to pay absolutely and unconditionally within a specified time, while the promise found is to pay within a specified time after the happening of another event, to wit, the receipt by defendant of proofs of loss, to be prepared in accordance with the alleged settlement; that in the one case the promise would certainly mature at the expiration of the 31st day of December, 1888; in the other it might not mature until after an indefinite period, and possibly never. Appellant cites numerous cases from our Reports where variances have been held to be fatal. The Code of Civil Procedure (sections 469-471) has prescribed the rules as to variances; and section 475 directs the court to disregard any error or defect in the pleadings and proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and it forbids the reversal of a judgment by reason of such an error. The complaint alleged a settlement and a promise to pay at a definite time, to wit, December 31, 1888. The finding is to the like effect, with the addition that it stated a condition, to wit, that certain proofs of loss were to be prepared and served, and it was found that they were so served October 31, 1888. In the point as to time when the loss was payable, the two dates concur. The pleading and findings concur in the essential fact that a settlement was made, and that there was an agreement to pay. We do not think the omission to plead the fact that payment was to follow proofs was such a material element as could in any way have misled defendant or deprived it of full preparation to make its defense. The pleading and the finding both identify the transaction which is the basis of the action. Furthermore, the objection comes too late. No objection was made to the evidence, and no motion was made for a nonsuit on this ground at the trial, and plaintiff was deprived of an opportunity to amend. The complaint was sufficient to support the judgment as rendered, and so were the findings. There was much evidence introduced by both parties relating to the proofs made of the loss. The rule was stated in this court as early as Marshall v. Ferguson, 23 Cal. 66, and has been repeated many times since, and as late as Horn v. Hamilton, 89 Cal. 276, 26 Pac. 833. See Davis v. Baugh, 59 Cal. 568; Eversdon v. Mayhew, 85 Cal. 1, 21 Pac. 431, and 24 Pac. 382; Yik Hon v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 65 Cal. 619, 4 Pac. 666, and cases there cited; Pom. Rem. § 555.

4. It is claimed that the evidence does not sustain either the promise pleaded or the promise found; and it is claimed that the promise which plaintiff was bound to prove was a several express promise upon the part of defendant. The allegations of the complaint, we think, show, as do also the findings, that the defendant and the other insurers agreed to an adjustment of the entire loss at the sum of $90,000, which they agreed to pay plaintiff in full settlement of the damage, and plaintiff agreed to accept the same, and that, as part of the agreement, each company or insurer was to pay its proportionate amount of this agreed total sum. The evidence is quite voluminous, and is contained in volumes 2 and 3 of the transcript, comprising over 2,500 folios. Obviously, we can give but a brief outline of the testimony. It appeared that, shortly after the fire, numerous adjusters representing the different insurers went to Stockton to adjust the loss. Plaintiff presented its claim, representing the loss to be $142,037, and demanded payment of the full insurance of $127,000. This sum was deemed excessive by the insurers, whereupon Brown and Snyder were appointed to appraise, and did appraise, the loss on the buildings; and, as to the propriety and regularity of this appraisal, there seems to be no controversy. Arnold, for plaintiff, and Neilson, for the insurers, were appointed, together with such umpire as they might agree upon, to appraise the other insured property, which consisted of combined harvesters, complete and incomplete, and of various patterns, machinery of all kinds used in a factory for the construction of farm implements and harvesters, engines, boilers, etc. These latter arbitrators being unable to agree upon an award while at Stockton, or to agree upon an umpire, they came to San Francisco, and on October 18, 1888, had an interview, at a joint meeting, with the agents of all the insurers, the object being to endeavor to arrive at a basis of settlement. At this meeting of the agents, Mr. H. R. Mann, of the firm of Mann & Wilson, was made chairman. His firm represented a large number of the insurance companies (of which there were about 60 interested). At the first meeting, Arnold and Neilson were both called before these assembled agents. Their estimates of the loss were presented and found not far apart,—Arnold's something over $90,000, and Neilson's about $2,000 under. The meeting adjourned the first day without results. At the meeting next day the agents reached a conclusion, and the chairman was directed to state it to Arnold, who was in waiting. He came out of the meeting, and his testimony was: "I stated to Mr. Arnold and Mr. Neilson at that time that the companies had agreed to a certain award in the neighborhood of ninety thousand dollars,—I forget the exact figures,—and for them to go ahead and make up their award. * * * When I say they were authorized to make an award for a sum in the neighborhood of ninety thousand dollars, I mean that it was understood that was to be the award for the entire loss; every item under the policies, * * * including the previous award on the building. * * * I meant that the companies had concluded to accept the figures as an award for the arbitrators to act upon. * * * The figures were named by Mr. Arnold, and I think, if I am not mistaken, that they were agreed to by Mr. Neilson, but they were named by Mr. Arnold particularly." Neilson testified as follows: "Mr.

Mann came out and told us: 'The last proposition is accepted,—the ninety thousand dollar proposition. Go on, make up the papers. Go on, and make up your papers.' He further said that "nothing was said by Mr. Mann at that time in regard to making up proofs of loss." Arnold testified that, when Mann came out of the meeting, "he said that the agony is over; to make proofs of loss, and we would get our money, or the company would get their money." He further testified that, when he was before the agents, he was detained there two hours, answering questions as to the loss and the claim of plaintiff; that he informed the agents he had authority to settle the award or loss; that the companies' counsel was present, and asked many questions; that Mr. Mann, who represented $15,000 or $20,000 of the loss, said, as soon as the proofs of loss were made out, they were ready to pay. Shortly after this last meeting,—that evening, or the next morning, according to Arnold's testimony,—he and Neilson went to the office of A. J. Wetzelar, who was one of the adjusters, to make out the awards or proofs of loss agreeably to the settlement. Mr. Neilson testified that they went to Wetzelar's office that afternoon, where he, the witness, had a desk, and completed their work in about two hours. He said: "In Mr. Wetzelar's office we went to work, and the first thing that struck us again here was the third-man question; and we looked upon it that we had to appoint a third man before we could fill up those papers." Snyder, who had a desk in the office, and was in some employment by the companies, and had acted with Brown in appraising the building, was agreed upon as the third man or umpire. "He agreed with us that whatever figures that Mr. Arnold and I made in making up this amount of ninety thousand dollars, that he would sign the papers, not knowing anything about it himself; but he would agree to sign whatever papers we asked him to do,—whatever figures. * * *

We must have explained to Mr. Snyder about how the matter was settled by compromise. My recollection is we did." The witness then explained in detail how they proceeded to make the awards. Among other things, he said: "It didn't make any particular difference whether we put more or less on any particular quality of machines. We wanted simply to arrive at the ninety thousand dollars." He was asked on cross-examination if he had not made affidavit that he had been in the employ of the companies for 12 years, and that the companies had agreed to a full settlement and adjustment of the loss, and if that was correct. He answered: "Well, it might have been. I might have signed that; and to my mind, in a certain way, it was correct, because that was the way we looked at it." This affidavit was made by witness at the instance of one of the companies in a series of actions brought by them to restrain the plaintiff from enforcing the awards made. It showed the award to be as follows:

On stock for.....	$60,240
Fixed and movable machines.....	6,700
Engine and boiler .....	700
Total .....	$67,640
Which said total when added to the award on building.....	22,360
Aggregated said sum of.....	$90,000

"Q. It was your understanding that the entire matter was settled for ninety thousand dollars; that they agreed to pay, and the company had agreed to accept, the ninety thousand dollars? A. That was the general understanding by myself and Mr. Arnold, and everybody else that had anything to do with it." He further testified that the proposition to settle, its acceptance, and the making of the papers were all one transaction to carry out the settlement. The written agreement for submission to arbitrators with the detailed awards under it occupy about 100 folios. The agreement is dated August 30, 1888, and the schedule of loss and damage bears date October 18, 1888.

On December 31, 1888, defendant commenced an action by verified complaint to restrain the plaintiff from commencing a suit to enforce its claim against defendant. Similar action was taken by all the companies on the same day. In this complaint defendant averred, among other things, that "on October 18, 1888, the plaintiff and the other insurers covenanted and agreed with plaintiff, by way of compromise and as an adjustment of said loss (referring to the loss by fire) and damage, to pay to said defendant the sum of ninety thousand dollars; and thereupon the loss was adjusted at ninety thousand dollars, and plaintiff and said other insurers agreed to pay, and defendant agreed to accept, the said sum of ninety thousand dollars in full settlement of said loss, and the proportionate amount to be paid by plaintiff to defendant, pursuant to said settlement and adjustment, was and is the sum of $1,859.25." Similar statements were made by each company in its pleadings. These suits were brought because of the alleged discovery of fraud and concealment on the part of the assured of facts relating to the value of the insured property by which the insurers had been misled in making the agreement and awards above set out. It appeared in evidence that plaintiff executed for the several companies proofs of loss on October 29, 1888, at Stockton, which conformed to the adjustment made by the arbitrators, and the proportionate amount due from each appeared in the separate proofs relating to each company. Attached to the proofs of loss is a report made to the companies by eight adjusters representing all the companies. These proofs reached the companies October 31, 1888, as found by the court; and, by the terms of the policies, the claims were not due or payable until 60 days after proofs of loss were furnished. It appears also from affidavits made by the plaintiff company (defendant here) in its injunction suit referred to, on motion for change of venue by defendant therein, that the "said companies consulted together and agreed with the said Arnold, acting for and in the interest of defendant [plaintiff here], to pay the defendant the said sum of ninety thousand dollars, and the said defendant agreed to accept said sum in full settlement of the loss in the complaint mentioned; that pursuant to said agreement, in said city and county, the papers in the matter of said settlement were drawn and executed, and the adjustment and promise to pay as aforesaid were made." It was perhaps not necessary, after the compromise agreement, for plaintiff to make further proof of loss, but that it did so cannot be held to affect its rights injuriously. It was perhaps also unnecessary for the arbitrators to call in an umpire after being told to make up the papers upon an agreed basis of settlement. But we cannot see that the fact of Snyder acting as umpire and signing the awards with or without knowledge of all the details could in any way change the rights of plaintiff. Nor can we see that the liability of defendant is any less certain because all parties assumed that proofs of loss must also be made under the new agreement, and that the claims would be payable 60 days after these proofs were filed. Defendant cannot be heard to complain of a procedure which was to its advantage.

Counsel for defendant say, in their printed argument: "We have no doubt that it was anticipated by all parties that, upon the coming in of the awards, proofs as required by the policies would be duly presented, and that within or at the expiration of 60 days thereafter, as stipulated in the policies, the loss would be paid. But that there was any independent promise to pay, or any intention upon the part of the companies, or any of them, or any understanding upon the part of Arnold, that there was a new agreement, or that plaintiff had acquired any right outside of the policies, is clearly not so." It is urged that at no time prior to the reversal of the original judgment against defendant did plaintiff or its counsel understand that there had been an independent several promise on the part of defendant to pay; that plaintiff's original theory was that a promise resulted, as matter of law, from the rendition and return of the awards. But it is said that this claim was overthrown in the first appeal (98 Cal. 557, 33 Pac. 633); that the finding of the court upon the first trial was that there was no such promise; and, as there was no evidence of an independent promise upon the second trial, it must follow that the action here must rest upon an implied promise resulting from the submission to arbitration to pay at the time fixed in the policies. It was held in the first appeal that, where the cause of action is upon an agreement to pay the loss after it had been ascertained by arbitrators, it is distinct from a cause of action upon the policy; and where the complaint does not state a cause of action on the policy, but upon the promise to pay the appraised loss, a finding that no such promise was made is fatal to a judgment in favor of plaintiff. In the case now here the cause of action is upon the agreement, and not upon the policy; and in this second trial the court found in favor of plaintiff on the agreement. The case is here now on a different state of facts and on different findings. If the evidence sustains the findings, and the findings support the promise pleaded, we do not see that the decision in the former case can control this case. Nor do we think that the position taken by plaintiff in the first trial—in some respects inconsistent with that assumed now—should deprive it of the fruits of this action if the cause of action as now presented is sustained by the evidence and findings.

There is conflict in the evidence as to the agreement upon which plaintiff sues, but we think there is some evidence tending to establish the agreement as found. Appellant appears to have so understood the result of the meeting at San Francisco, and, on the sixteenth day after the proofs were filed with the companies, it stated the agreement in its pleadings to enjoin plaintiff substantially as it is now found by the court. The evidence is not very clear as to the point that each company separately and independently agreed for itself to pay its proportionate share of the $90,000, but all the facts and the conduct of the parties show that it was so understood, and was not questioned until long after the awards were made and the proofs filed, and then only because of alleged discovery of fraud and concealment by plaintiff. We are asked to review the record in the first trial and the findings there made in support of appellant's contention that the evidence there was stronger than now, and yet the trial court found that there was no agreement to pay the loss outside that in the policy. We cannot do this. The law of that case upon like facts must be the law of this case. But the facts of this case must control the findings, and the court found the facts to be different in the second trial from the facts at the first trial; and by the facts as now found must we be guided.

5. It is claimed by appellant that the contract sued on, conceding that it was made, was an unexecuted parol modification of a written agreement, and hence void,—citing Civ. Code, § 1698; Thompson v. Gerner, 104 Cal. 168, 37 Pac. 900; Benson v. Shotwell, 103 Cal. 167, 37 Pac. 147; Erenberg v. Peters, 66 Cal. 114, 4 Pac. 1091. As we understand the opinion in the first appeal, it was there held that the action, being upon an agreement to pay upon an adjusted claim, is not upon the policy, but upon the agreement, and may be maintained. The agreement is founded upon the policy, but it was in its essential elements a substitution of an entirely new contract so far as it went, and upon a new consideration, to wit, to accept less than the amount of insurance and less than claimed by plaintiff. We cannot see that the fact that the new agreement (which need not be in writing) rested in parol affects the question. All the parties acted upon the new agreement as valid and binding up to the day the money was payable. It was executed on the part of plaintiff and defendant in the matter of having the awards and proofs made in writing, and filed with defendant; and it is practically conceded by defendant that, but for the discovery of the alleged fraud and concealments of plaintiff, the awards would have been promptly paid. We do not think the point now raised, that the new agreement is void because not reduced to writing, is available to defendant.

6. It is urged that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings that the books and memoranda showing cost and value were not concealed, and that plaintiff was not guilty of fraud, and that the property destroyed was in value equal to $90,000. As to the value the evidence is conflicting, but we think it is sufficient to support the finding. We do not deem it necessary to go into this inquiry, which occupies a large part of the transcript, for from the start plaintiff's and defendant's arbitrators very closely agreed upon the value, and as to the value of the building ($22,360) there never was any disagreement. The question of fraud would seem to demand some notice, as it is the principal defense set up. It turned out at this trial that the alleged concealed documents were brought to light through the disclosures of one E. P. Palmer, at the time of the fire the plaintiff's bookkeeper, who it was alleged had kept the books and papers out of sight when the adjusters first visited plaintiff's office to ascertain the cost of the property destroyed; and it was claimed that defendant had no knowledge of these documents until after the agreement of October 18, 1888, and would not have made the agreement if it had received such knowledge. There is no evidence of any intentional concealment by any agent of the plaintiff except this one employé, and it appears that he was told by plaintiff to show the agents of the insurance companies everything, and that he acted wholly on his own motion in not doing so, if it be true, which is stoutly denied, that he withheld the books or concealed them. It was found by the trial court at the first trial that the defendant and the other insurers consented that the arbitrators might find the amount of plaintiff's loss to be $90,000, because of statements made to defendant and the other insurers by plaintiff that there were no books showing cost of construction, value of certain of the insured property, and "that, if defendant and plaintiff's other insurers had known of the books in the possession of plaintiff showing cost of construction and value, they would not have given such consent." The trial court at that time apparently held that the plaintiff was not bound by the fraudulent representations of its bookkeeper, Palmer, under the circumstances, as he had been told to show defendant all books and papers. Upon the first appeal as to Palmer's conduct and plaintiff's liability therefor this court said: "It would seem very clear from these facts that the conduct of Palmer in concealing from defendant the books and inventories referred to, and which conduct was the same in effect as a representation that there were no such books and inventories in existence, was a substantial inducement to the action of defendant in waiving its rights to have an appraisal of plaintiff's loss in accordance with the terms of its policy, and in consenting that such loss might be fixed at ninety thousand dollars without any examination or exercise of judgment upon the part of the arbitrators." It was held that Palmer was acting within the scope of his employment, and the plaintiff, as his principal, was bound by his acts and omissions in the performance of the duty intrusted to him, notwithstanding he may have disobeyed the instructions which he received. Upon the point that the books kept by Palmer were only his estimates, and were incorrect, and that defendant was not injured by their nonproduction, this court held that it was not "material to the question under consideration to determine whether any or all of the matters referred to in this finding would properly enter into the cost of the construction of the property destroyed. * * * It is sufficient to say that the estimate of such cost was made by the person selected by plaintiff for that purpose; and the court finds that such estimate was made pursuant to the directions of the directors, and was entered in the books of plaintiff, and kept and retained in its business office. * * * The books would have afforded some information to the defendant, and to that information it was entitled, not only under the terms of the policy issued by it, but also upon the plainest principles of right and fair dealing; and the plaintiff cannot be permitted to enforce an agreement which the court found would never have been made but for the fraud of plaintiff's agent. * * *"

In the present case the court did not find, as before, that the defendant consented that the arbitrators might fix the loss at $90,000 because of statements made to defendant that there were no books showing cost of construction and value; and consistently, because the court found that defendant was furnished the books which at the first trial plaintiff failed to show were exhibited to defendant. But we are not disposed to hold that even under the findings in this case the rule laid down in the first appeal would be different. We think defendant was entitled to such knowledge as plaintiff possessed, no matter what the motive of defendant was in consenting to the agreement. As we understand the decision in the first appeal, it is immaterial whether the concealed books in fact conveyed such accurate and complete information as would have enabled defendant to ascertain the exact cost of the property. It was entitled to have the information, such as it was; and it seems to us that the only question now is: Did the defendant have this information before or at the time it agreed to settle and adjust the loss as alleged and found? Finding 13 is to the effect that the adjusters of defendant and the other insurers demanded of plaintiff an inspection of its books and vouchers showing the cost of construction of the agricultural implements destroyed; "that, on said demand being made, plaintiff's agent directed one Palmer, its bookkeeper, in whose custody and control all of its books and vouchers then were, to exhibit and present to the adjusters all books of said plaintiff in his possession"; that Palmer then had in his charge "certain books in which were entered lists of materials in and the component parts of certain combined harvesters manufactured by it, and which were damaged or destroyed by said fire, and also estimates made by said bookkeeper of the cost of construction of certain of said combined harvesters"; that plaintiff had no books, papers, etc., "from which could be ascertained the cost of construction or actual value of any property damaged by said fire"; that plaintiff had no books, etc., showing cost of construction or value except such as are above referred to. The finding then is that, "prior to the time of the appointment of said arbitrators and the presentation of said statement and proof of loss, all of the books containing the matters aforesaid were handed to said adjusters representing the defendant and the other insurers, and were then seen and examined by them." Finding 14 is that all the insurers, "at and prior to August 30, 1888, had been afforded by said plaintiff an inspection and examination, and had inspected and examined all books in said plaintiff's possession, or under its control, containing any statement or data or memorandum of cost or estimate of cost of the construction or value of the property damaged or destroyed by fire." These findings refer to the books and papers alleged to have been withheld by Palmer. The finding that they did not afford information sufficient to enable defendant to ascertain the exact cost or value of the property is immaterial, as was held in the first appeal. Such as they were, defendant was entitled to them; and the court found that defendant was furnished them at and prior to August 30, 1888, and prior to the statement and proof of loss, and prior to the appointment of the arbitrators. It was also found by the court that the adjusters informed the arbitrators, Arnold and Neilson, that they, the adjusters, had seen and examined the books, and that there was nothing therein from which could be obtained the cost of construction, and directed the arbitrators to seek their information elsewhere; and it was found that the arbitrators separately investigated the loss and its amount; that the defendant and the other insurers commenced an investigation to ascertain the condition and value of the destroyed property about August 19, 1888, and continued such investigation for several weeks, and did ascertain the true value and cost of replacement of the property; and "that on October 1, 1888, they well knew, and prior thereto had well known, the condition, value, and cost of replacement of all of said property so as aforesaid destroyed by said fire." It appears from the evidence that the adjusters reached Stockton August 23d, and went at once to plaintiff's office, and called on Palmer, and asked to see the books. Palmer declined to show them without instructions from the directors. The next day, August 24th, Shippee, the manager of plaintiff company, to whom this matter of attending to the loss had been confided by plaintiff, went with the adjusters, and instructed Palmer to show them everything.

It is admitted by defendant in the brief of counsel that there was evidence tending to prove that Palmer did in fact show the insurers the books containing estimates or loss, and that they were "fairly examined by them prior to the making of the awards, thus negating the defense based upon the alleged concealment, and necessarily negating the various charges of fraud in that connection." But counsel contend that the testimony to the above effect is unworthy of belief, and cannot for that reason sustain the finding resting upon it. The evidence is conflicting,—flatly contradictory. We are cited to Lind v. Closs, 88 Cal. 6, 25 Pac. 972, and In re Irvine, 102 Cal. 606, 36 Pac. 1013, in support of the proposition that a finding will not be sustained upon the positive testimony supporting it if, in the light of other evidence, it is unworthy of belief; and it is claimed that the challenged evidence is the result of a desire to fit the facts to the law of the case as made by a previous decision,—citing Soule v. Dawes, 14 Cal. 249. Charles Dorr testified at great length upon the point as to Palmer having shown all the books to the adjusters. He was in the employ of plaintiff at the time of the fire, and when the adjusters went to Stockton. He was familiar with the alleged concealed books referred to in the findings, and had himself made entries in some of them, and had furnished data for many of the figures and estimates used by Palmer. He testified positively to the fact that all these books were shown to Wetzel and Dohrman, adjusters for the insurers, by Palmer, and that they were examined by the adjusters; that he himself took the books from their usual place in the desks at Palmer's request and laid them on a table; and that Palmer and the adjusters examined them together for some time. This was the same or the day following the day when Shippee took Wetzel lar to the office. An entry in the transcript apparently made by agreement states that "none of said books show the cost of construction or value of any of the property lost or damaged by the fire. In none of such books is anything showing the material in, or the cost of construction of, any of the Shippee machines." The cases cited by appellant do not warrant us in holding the case here to be an exception to the universal rule that this court will not disturb the findings where the evidence in their support is conflicting. There is nothing inherently improbable in the evidence of Dorr, nor do we find that he made statements at any time contradictory of his evidence. Palmer testified that he did not exhibit these books to Wetzlar and Dohrman, but a witness, one L. H. Day, testified that Palmer told him (witness) "that he [Palmer] had shown to the insurance adjusters all the books and papers which he had in relation to the cost of the harvesters." There is evidence tending to show that Dohrman had in his possession shortly after the fire, which he gave to Wetzlar, a paper (defendant's Exhibit No. 2) deemed of importance by defendant, as showing the cost of the Houser machines, and one of the papers taken away by Palmer, which, as he claimed, was not shown to the adjusters. A witness, one W. B. Starbird, testified that Dohrman showed witness a paper the week after the fire showing the value of the machinery destroyed, of which the witness said: "I should say that was the paper, or a very close copy of it." He further testified: "I asked Mr. Dohrman how the fire adjustment was coming on, not knowing at the time that he was acting as an adjuster. He said it was coming on all right. I said, 'Charley, how do you get at the values?' He says, 'I have figures.' I said, 'In what way?' 'Well,' he says, 'I got them from them.' And at that time he showed me the yellow paper that I have just described." Again, being asked his best recollection as to whether the paper shown him then was the same as shown him on the witness stand, he answered, "Well, I most certainly should think it was." It appeared in cross-examination that Starbird was in Stockton at the first trial, and did not testify, and that, before the second trial, Dohrman died. He explains how he came to make known his possession of these facts at the second trial, and we see nothing improbable in the explanation. Other evidence might be cited tending in the same direction. It is contradicted, and it may be unworthy of belief. But whether so or not, and whether the contradictory evidence was any more reliable than the evidence it controverted, were matters as to which the trial judge was in much better position to determine than we possibly can be. There was evidence on which to base the findings, and they must therefore stand.

As connected with the issue of fraud, it is urged that the findings as to the value of certain machines were not sustained by the evidence. Here, as elsewhere, was much conflict in the evidence; and we cannot say there was none in support of the findings, for there was much. We think there is evidence to sustain the finding that the property destroyed was of greater value than $90,000. Besides, after all parties had reached an agreement as to the entire loss, after much investigation, and the insurers had directed the arbitrators to make up the awards or proofs on the basis of $90,000 for the entire loss, assuming the building to be worth $22,360, it was not very material just what value was attached to any given machine or article insured, except as it might bear upon the question of fraud. The companies were to share the loss in the proportion the policies each held bore to the whole loss; and it was of small consequence whether this or that item was over or under valued in the awards; and, furthermore, the companies made no complaint of the awards when submitted.

7. The bill of exceptions specifies 154 alleged erroneous rulings at the trial in admitting and excluding evidence offered. Appellant has thrown them all into seven classes, and deals with the classes.

(a) Error is claimed in admitting conversations with Charles W. Dohrman, who had died between the first and second trials, the ground being that he was not the agent of this defendant company. I think the evidence shows quite clearly that Dohrman was acting for all the companies, at least in the adjustment of the loss after the fire. He was the local agent for several of the companies at Stockton, and to him was presented the proofs of loss by plaintiff, as agent of all the companies. His name is among those of the adjusters signed to their report. His name is attached to the agreement for the submission to arbitration, in which, with others, he assumes to represent all the companies. No specific question or answer is pointed out in appellant's brief, as objected to. The objection that Dohrman was not the agent of this particular defendant is not sustained.

(b) The witness Palmer, who had been the manager and acting secretary of plaintiff up to the fire, testified, as defendant's witness, that the Shippee harvester machines were unsalable at the time of the fire, and had no value except for the material that was in them. He was then asked by defendant to state his reasons. The court sustained plaintiff's objection to this question. Ordinarily when a witness testifies to a fact involving an opinion, his reasons are sought by the other side to test the weight of the evidence. We think, however, as the witness was speaking of the value of machines, it was proper for defendant to ask him why he had estimated them to be of no value except for old material, and why they were unsalable; but we cannot say that it was reversible error to exclude the evidence. The court was bound to consider what he testified as to value without his giving any reason for his answer.

(c) The court excluded the evidence of defendant as to the operation and value of any machines except those destroyed by the fire. Defendant endeavored to show that the destroyed machines were worthless by showing how other machines of similar pattern built by plaintiff had worked. This evidence was refused upon an objection that the salability or cost of construction or value of one machine cannot be shown by comparison with another. The witness had explained the workings of a machine he had purchased from plaintiff, and had returned to plaintiff. Subsequently, he got a No. 2 Shippee machine, and he was asked: "Did that machine prove a success or a failure?" The objection was at this point made to the evidence, and the offer of defendant was to show that this machine was similar, in fact identical, with some of the burned machines. Respondent claims that the ruling comes within the case of Fox v. Agricultural Works, 83 Cal. 333, 23 Pac. 295; citing, also, Murray v. Brooks, 41 Iowa, 47. Appellant contends that there was no other way to prove the inefficiency of the machines that were destroyed than by proof of the failure of tested machines of similar or identical pattern. We do not see that because the machines in question were burned would change the reason for the rule laid down in Fox v. Agricultural Works, supra. The comparison by the method proposed would be the same whether the rejected machine was in a pile of junk or standing in the field unused, or had been totally destroyed. We think the ruling was correct.

(d) Defendant objected to certain evidence offered by plaintiff, and admitted to show that the Shippee machines had a value in excess of the award, because, if a person could not get a superior machine, the Shippee machine would be a good investment upon such valuation. We do not find upon examining the folios pointed out that the witnesses made their estimates of value upon the contingency that a superior machine was not available.

(e) Some objections were made by plaintiff, and sustained by the court, to the questions of defendant relating to the market value of the machines at the time of the fire. Examination of the record shows that the questions were objected to as not proper on cross-examination, and we cannot see that the court erred in its ruling. We have examined the record where the other alleged errors are to be found, and discover no reversible ruling of the trial court.

8. It is contended that the decision is against law. The point rests upon the contention that certain allegations of the cross complaint were not denied by plaintiff, although it is conceded that the court found against defendant in respect of all these averments. We think that some of the allegations now claimed not to have been denied were clearly denied; others, by affirmative allegations of the plaintiff inconsistent with them. As to all these allegations, the parties submitted evidence pro and con. The trial was conducted as though full denials were made. The point now made cannot be heard here for the first time. Klopper v. Levy, supra. The cause has been ably and exhaustively presented by counsel on both sides of the controversy. We have endeavored to consider and pass upon the salient and essential questions of law and fact called to our attention. Conscious that, in so extended a record, the difficulty in determining the exact relation of all the facts and their legal bearing upon the issues is very great, we yet believe there was evidence justifying the findings and decision of the trial court, and therefore recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

STOCKTON COMBINED HARVESTER & AGRICULTURAL WORKS et al. v. AMERICAN FIRE INS. CO. (Sac. 260.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1898.)

INSURANCE — MORTGAGE CLAUSE — COMPROMISE — PLEADING — AMENDMENT — LIMITATIONS.

1. The liability of an insurance company according to a compromise of a loss with the assured, on a policy providing that any loss shall be payable to a mortgagee as her interest appears, is not affected by the fact that the mortgagee was not a party to the compromise, where she is a party to the suit, and the mortgage has been paid.

2. Where both the assured and a mortgagee to whom a loss is payable under the policy join in an action to recover on a compromise of a loss, the action is not so changed by the filing of an amended and supplemental complaint, after the payment of the mortgage, stating that fact, as to permit the application of the statute of limitations.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by the Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works and others against the American Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. Nicoll & Orr and J. C. Campbell, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. This cause is submitted on substantially the same transcript as Sacramento No. 262 (Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 53 Pac. 565). Two points are presented in this case by appellant not raised in the Glens Falls Insurance Company Case.

The policy names the plaintiff company as the insured, but stipulates for payment of loss to one Eliza R. Buckles. It is now claimed by defendant that the insurers entered into no new agreement with Mrs. Buckles, such as is relied upon by plaintiff in the other cases and also in this; that Mrs. Buckles was not a party to the submission to arbitration, and it nowhere appears that Arnold, arbitrator for plaintiff company, had authority to speak for her, or in fact did represent her. The final draft of the complaint, to which there was a supplemental complaint, and also several amendments, showed that Mrs. Buckles no longer had any interest in the policy, and that the agreements relied upon were made with the plaintiff company. The finding 4 was that on March 14, 1888, there was a subsisting mortgage upon a portion of the property of $25,000 to plaintiff Eliza R. Buckles, and "that the loss in said policy of insurance, if any, was made payable by its terms to the said Eliza R. Buckles," and that, since the commencement of the action, it had been fully paid and discharged, and that her interest in the property had ceased, as alleged in the supplemental complaint. The agreement, as finally alleged and as found, was that defendant agreed to pay plaintiff company. Mrs. Buckles was made co-plaintiff because the loss was by the terms of the policy payable to her, but the insurance was on the company property. When she ceased to have any interest in the policy or property it was proper to so state by supplemental complaint; and we cannot see that the plaintiff company lost its rights thereby. There is no allegation of a joint agreement, between defendant and plaintiff company and Mrs. Buckles, alleged in the complaint as finally amended. The allegation of the finally amended complaint is: "That thereupon said defendant and said insurers covenanted and agreed with said plaintiff, said Stockton Combined Harvester and Agricultural Works, as an adjustment of the entire of said loss and damage, to pay to said plaintiff, the Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works; * * * and said defendant and said other insurers agreed to pay, and said plaintiff agreed to accept," etc. Mrs. Buckles, however, remained a party plaintiff to the close of the action, which was not changed in any essential features by amendments to the complaint. If it was not true that defendant agreed to pay her the amount according to the compromise, it did agree to pay the harvester company; and that liability was not changed by failure to prove that Mrs. Buckles took part in the agreement. She joined in the action, and would be estopped by the judgment in it.

2. It is claimed that the promise sued upon is barred by the statute of limitations. The original complaint appears in the bill of exceptions. The harvester company and Mrs. Buckles are the plaintiffs, and the allegations of the original complaint proceed upon the assumption that both of the plaintiffs are joint parties in interest, although it does not appear that Mrs. Buckles had any interest in any policy except this one, and as to it the policy ran to the company, "loss, if any, payable to" Mrs. Buckles. It was alleged that proofs of loss were made out by plaintiffs, and that the subsequent agreements as to arbitration were between plaintiffs and defendant, and that the still later compromise or agreement to pay $90,000 was made with plaintiffs. The amended and supplemental complaints stated the action to be on a policy issued to the harvester company on its property, loss, if any, payable to Mrs. Buckles; that all agreements to settle and adjust and pay the loss were with the harvester company; and, finally, that Mrs. Buckles had an interest in the property or policy as mortgagee; and that this interest had ceased by payment of the mortgage. The original complaint was on the same policy as was the amended complaint. Both the original and amended complaints set up the same agreement to pay on compromise, the difference being that in the latter it was alleged that the compromise agreement was with the harvester company instead of both plaintiffs. But Mrs. Buckles' interest was still the same, and she ratified or adopted the agreement, so far as she was concerned, by joining in the action on it. The policy was payable to her, whether for the whole amount of the insurance ($1,500), or for the less amount ($936.57) agreed upon by the compromise. She was a proper party in all the forms of the complaint, and when her mortgage was paid, and she no longer had any interest in the policy, it was proper to so state by supplemental complaint in order that the judgment, if any, might be for the party in interest. The cause of action we do not think was changed, and hence the statute of limitations did not apply. We discover no reason why this case should be decided differently from the others; and, upon the authority of the case Sacramento No. 262 (Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 53 Pac. 565), the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C., SEARLS, C.

PIGNAZ v. BURNETT et al. (S. F. 1,184.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1898.)

APPEAL—FAILURE TO FILE TRANSCRIPT—BOND—DISMISSAL.

1. On appeal from a judgment, failure to file a transcript within the required time was not excused by the fact that appellant had proposed, and presented for settlement, a bill of exceptions taken to the court's rulings on motions made after judgment, which the judge had not yet settled.

2. Where there were two appeals in one action,—one from a judgment, and the other from an order refusing to set aside a writ of assistance,—and only one undertaking, which was limited to the appeal from the judgment, the appeal from the order was dismissed.

Department 1. On motion to dismiss appeals. Dismissed.

HARRISON, J. A motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment herein, and also from the order refusing to set aside a writ of assistance, was heretofore made and denied December 2, 1897. 51 Pac. 48. The facts involved in the present motion are quite fully stated in the opinion in that case. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment was then made upon the ground that the transcript had not been filed within the time prescribed by the rules of this court, and was denied for the reason that it was made to appear that a bill of exceptions used on the appeal had been proposed, and was pending for settlement before the judge who heard the cause. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the order was argued upon the ground that the appellants had not filed an undertaking on that appeal, and was denied for the reason that the respondent had not given this, in his notice, as one of the grounds upon which he would make the motion. Upon the application of the respondent, leave was given to renew the motion in its present form, for a dismissal of the appeals upon the ground that the transcript had not been filed within the proper time, and that no undertaking had been filed upon the appeal from the order. Upon the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment, the respondent has presented a copy of the bill of exceptions which was proposed in behalf of the appellants, and upon which they rely to be relieved from their failure to file the transcript herein until it shall have been settled by the judge. An inspection of this document shows, however, that it is a bill of exceptions taken upon the order of the court refusing to vacate its order for the issuance of a writ of assistance, and refers entirely to proceedings taken subsequent to the entry of the judgment. It could not, therefore, be used or referred to upon the appeal from the judgment, and does not extend the time within which the transcript should be filed. See opinion upon the hearing of the former motion in this case, 51 Pac. 48. The appeal from the judgment must therefore be dismissed.

A copy of the undertaking filed on appeal in the court below has also been produced; and, as it appears therefrom that it is limited to the appeal from the judgment, and makes no reference to the appeal from the order, it is insufficient to sustain the latter appeal. The motion to dismiss the appeals is granted.

PACIFIC BANK v. STONE. (S. F. 1,060.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 14, 1898.)
BANK PRESIDENT — HIRING AN ATTORNEY — EX OFFICIO POWERS.

The president of a bank has no ex officio power to bind it for the services of an attorney, and unless he has been empowered to hire an attorney under its by-laws, as authorized by Civ. Code, § 303, or his contract for an attorney's services was authorized by resolution of the directors, or ratified or sanctioned by their words or conduct, the bank is not liable therefor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the Pacific Bank against Frank M. Stone. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sawyer & Burnett and Frank M. Stone, for appellant. Chas. A. Garter and Frederick B. Pierce, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action on promissory note for the sum of $1,550. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals on statement of the case. Defendant pleaded a contract for professional services as attorney at law, rendered plaintiff, by which "plaintiff agreed to cancel and deliver to defendant the note set forth in the complaint, and to extinguish said indebtedness." By way of cross complaint, defendant alleged what, in effect, was a claim on quantum meruit; but he withdrew his cross complaint, and waived all claim thereon. The court found that on or about November 3, 1893, the defendant "entered into a contract with R. H. McDonald, Jr., vice president and acting president of the corporation plaintiff, whereby defendant should render professional services to plaintiff, and that, as compensation for said services, said R. H. McDonald, Jr., as vice president and acting president of the corporation plaintiff, promised and agreed that the note in controversy should be canceled and delivered to defendant"; and that defendant rendered such services to plaintiff, but said note has never been canceled or delivered to defendant. The court further found: "That the board of directors of plaintiff never authorized said R. H. McDonald, Jr., to make said contract with defendant, and never ratified the same; and that none of the members of said board, other than said McDonald, ever knew that said McDonald had made said contract, or that said defendant had rendered said services;" that plaintiff had at that time regular retained attorneys, "who had been and were employed by said board of directors"; "that on said 3d day of November, 1893, the said plaintiff was insolvent and in liquidation, by the decree of the court duly made and given, which decree is now in full force and effect." It should be stated, also, that defendant's employment was especially for the purpose of testing the question as to whether "the bank directors should have charge of the settlement of the bank's affairs instead of the bank commissioners"; and defendant testified that he brought the action by which this question was settled favorably to his contention and to the bank. It was the case entitled Long v. Superior Court, reported in 102 Cal. 449, 36 Pac. 807, as we understand the testimony, although special reference is not made to the case. The opinion in that case recites the decree which is given in the record on this appeal, and is referred to in the findings, and we think sufficiently identifies the case pending in the lower court, referred to in the transcript, as being the case which gave rise to Long v. Superior Court, supra. The regular bank attorneys were Messrs. Dorn & Dorn, one of whom testified that he advised the employment of defendant because he had made a study of the particular question it was desired to have settled; that they, as bank attorneys, "were not attending to these external matters," and were receiving but $100 per month for their services; and that the contract was made in one of the bank rooms. It appears that the bank closed its doors June 22, 1893; and, as we understand the history of the bank, as disclosed by the litigation in this court, and as referred to in the briefs of counsel and the transcript, insolvency proceedings were begun by certain creditors, and the sheriff placed in charge of the bank as receiver in August, 1893. He was succeeded by Mr. Willey on October 10, 1893, as receiver. Later, or about that time, an action was brought by the attorney general, entitled "The People, on the Relation of the Bank Commissioners, vs. The Pacific Bank," under the bank commissioners act, the purpose of which was to place the bank commissioners in charge. On November 3d, the court entered its decree adjudicating the bank to be insolvent, and enjoining it from transacting any further business, and turning over its affairs to the bank commissioners of the state, subject to the control of the court, the court retaining custody of the bank's books and papers. Immediately after this decree was entered, McDonald employed defendant, who knew of all the previous proceedings in court. Defendant's services were performed after this date, and he testified that he brought the suit, and was successful in it, whereby the control of the bank affairs during liquidation was restored to the corporation. It further appears that McDonald resigned as vice president November 18, 1893, and was succeeded by S. F. Long. It appears from the case reported in 102 Cal. 449, 36 Pac. 807, that Director and Vice President Long was the plaintiff. It was after McDonald's resignation and Mr. Long's appointment that most of defendant's services were performed.

Appellant claims, and we think rightly, that the sole question was and is: Was the acting president of plaintiff corporation vested with authority to make the contract in question without the sanction of the board of directors? Appellant puts the question as follows: "The board of directors had been deposed and ousted from the bank by the decree of the superior court. Here arose an emergency. The vice president had the unqualified right, by virtue of his office of acting president, and having the affairs of the bank in charge, to retain an attorney to ascertain the rights of the board. All was confusion in the affairs of the bank. Some one must act. Who, then, other than the head of the institution?" He then points out—that is true—that he performed the service, and was successful, and that the services were beneficial to the bank; and he then asks: "Can a board of directors sit by and take advantage of the work of one employed by their head and chief, and, because no formal resolution has been passed approving the act of that chief officer, receive the benefit of the work and labor, and repudiate the obligation to pay therefor?" When the directors were ousted, McDonald shared their fate, for he was vice president and acting president by virtue of being also a director. There was therefore no emergency calling for action by McDonald which did not equally appeal to all the other directors. What view might be taken of all the facts and circumstances of the case were this an action for the value of work and labor performed need not be considered; for defendant, having alleged a special contract, and relying alone upon that, cannot be allowed to recover on a quantum meruit.

The evidence falls to show that the directors had any knowledge of the specific contract pleaded, or ever authorized or ratified it. The secretary and manager of the bank brought into court the records of the directors for the fall of 1893, from which it appeared that McDonald resigned as vice president November 18, 1893, and S. F. Long was elected in his place. The further evidence was: "Q. Is there anything in the records of the secretary, or otherwise, of the Pacific Bank, that shows at any time the employment of Mr. Stone by the bank? A. No, sir; not that I know of. Mr. Stone: That is not claimed. It is not claimed that the directors employed me." It was admitted that there was no resolution authorizing the directors or Mr. McDonald to employ Mr. Stone as attorney. It appeared that there was no meeting of the directors between August 30 and November 18, 1893.

Appellant does not claim that the board ratified the contract, except so far as their knowledge of his having rendered services would work a ratification. But that falls far short of legal ratification, if knowledge had been proved, which was not, because there was no evidence showing that the directors had any knowledge whatever of the specific contract sued upon, or of its terms, or that McDonald entered into it, and such knowledge cannot be presumed. It did not rest with plaintiff to show lack of ratification, but the burden was upon defendant affirmatively to show the fact. What will and what will not constitute ratification under our Code is so clearly pointed out in Blood v. Water Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 1017, and 45 Pac. 252, as to make superfluous any further statement of the law upon the subject. See, also, Underhill v. Improvement Co., 93 Cal. 300, 28 Pac. 1049; Blen v. Mining Co., 20 Cal. 603. Appellant quotes from Streeten v. Robinson, 102 Cal. 542, 36 Pac. 946, where it is said: "The authority of the president or other head of a corporation to employ an attorney when the exigencies of his company require it has been repeatedly recognized,"—citing, also, numerous other cases. We have examined these cases, beginning with Pixley v. Railroad Co., 33 Cal. 183; and in no one of them is the doctrine laid down that the president of a corporation has by virtue of his office alone the power to bind the corporation in a transaction like the one we have here. In all the cases, as was true in the case in 102 Cal. 542, 36 Pac. 946, the president or other head of the corporation was shown to have been the general business manager; or he had admitted relations to the corporation from which authority might be inferred; or there was specific knowledge and acquiescence brought home to the directors; or there was a general custom or usage proven that the president or other manager had exercised like powers with the consent and acquiescence of the directors. It is true that Mr. Morse, in his work upon Banks and Banking (volume 1, § 143), lays down the doctrine that to take charge of the litigation of a bank is the function of the president by virtue of his office. But this doctrine is controverted by Mr. Thompson in his treatise on the Law of Corporations (volume 4, § 4620). The cases cited by Mr. Morse presented the question of the authority of the attorney to bring the action for, or to appear and defend, the corporation, and in which the interests of third parties were involved. In such cases the courts presume the authority to so appear. But a distinction is made where the attorney himself sues the corporation upon a contract for services rendered. An instructive case is that of Bright v. Cemetery Ass'n, 33 La. Ann. 58. Bright was employed by the president of defendant company to conduct certain litigation, for which the attorney was to be paid as a contingent fee one-third of the amount of the tax from which he might succeed in relieving his client. There was no evidence showing the participation of the board of directors in the contract, or any act of such board to authorize their president to enter into the alleged contract in behalf of the company. The action rested where appellant appears to place his right to recover here, to wit, upon the inherent or ex officio powers of the president. Section 5 of the charter of the defendant company provided that "all the powers of this corporation shall be vested in a board of directors," etc., which is the statute law in this state. The court said: "It is elementary that corporate bodies are artificial beings or persons, who can act only in the mode prescribed by the law creating them, or in the manner specified in their organic law or charter. It is true that, in many corporations, acts of administration in their ordinary business pursuits can, and must of necessity, be performed by the president or other authorized officer; but such authority must be provided for by special laws, or by stipulation in the charter, and must apply to well-defined acts within the essential object or objects for which the corporation was created." After pointing out the declared objects of the defendant corporation, the court said: "But this power could not possibly be extended to cover such a contract as forms the basis of this suit. The record shows that the company had a regular attorney, and, in our opinion, no authority short of the action of the board of directors could justify the president to employ and retain a special attorney, outside of usual legal business, to represent the association in a litigation of great moment and magnitude, which would be rife with vital consequences to the company, and would entail the payment of a large fee." Upon the point as to when the authority will be presumed, the court said: "Plaintiff fails to recognize a necessary distinction, which qualifies this rule in its application, between cases where the attorneys' authority to appear is to be tested with reference to the effect of their professional acts on the interest of third parties, and cases when, suing for their fees, their authority or employment is specially denied by the parties whom they represented in legal proceedings. In the latter cases they must prove a retainer or contract, as alleged, by legal evidence; and, if the alleged contract was with a corporation, the contract must be shown to have been made by the person or persons duly authorized thereto, for corporate bodies can act or contract only in the manner and form prescribed by law or by their charter." The case was reargued on motion for rehearing, and the authorities again carefully examined, and the motion was denied. We can perceive no reason why a bank president should be clothed with ex officio powers greater than those of the president of any other corporation. As director, he derives his authority from the same source as presidents of other corporations organized under the statute; and, as the presiding officer, his functions and powers, in the management of the corporate business, are no greater than those of any other director. Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 28 Pac. 788. The statute provides that "a corporation may, by its by-laws, where no other special provision is specially made, provide for: * * * (4) The qualifications and duties of directors. * * * (5) The compensation and duties of its officers." Civ. Code, § 303. "The corporate powers, business and property of all corporations formed under this title must be exercised, conducted and controlled by a board of not less than five nor more than eleven directors," etc. Id. § 305. And by section 308 it is provided that the president of the board of directors must be one of their number, and "must perform the duties enjoined by law or the by-laws of the corporation."

We do not doubt but that authority to employ an attorney may be given to the president orally or without formal resolution by the directors, or that, where he has employed an attorney without such or any authority, the directors may orally or by conduct ratify or sanction such employment (Pixley v. Railroad Co., supra); nor do we doubt that the president may be clothed with such general management of the affairs of the corporation by resolution or by-laws of the directors, or by their acquiescence or consent, as would raise a presumption of authority to act in a particular case where such proofs were made. But in the absence of all evidence of authority to employ an attorney, as was the case here, and in the absence of all evidence of subsequent consent or ratification, we must hold that the contract sued upon was unauthorized; and, in an action based thereon, he cannot recover. The case does not present an instance of a contract ultra vires (such as Main v. Casserly, 67 Cal. 126, 7 Pac. 426, for example, and like cases); for the corporation here did not assume to make the contract with defendant, as in that case. It is not the case of a corporation repudiating its contract while retaining its fruits; it is the case of an officer acting wholly beyond his powers, where there is an entire failure to show that the directors had any knowledge of the contract, or consented to it or ratified it. It is recommended that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

HENSHAW and TEMPLE, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance. The judgment of the court below on the facts of this case is right. There are, however, some general expressions in the opinion of the commissioner about the employment of an attorney by the president of a bank which are, in my opinion, too broad to be correctly applied to the case of a solvent bank continuously engaged in the regular prosecution of its usual business.

BRYSON v. McCONE et al. (L. A. 279.)

CONTRACTS—FILING—WHO ARE CONTRACTORS—DEMAND—GUARANTIES—DAMAGES—LOSS OF PROFITS.

1. A contract to convert ice works into a new system of ice making, and to furnish certain material therefor, is not within Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing that contracts for work between an owner and a contractor in excess of $1,000 are void unless in writing and filed in the recorder's office, since the contract must be considered as one for materials, and not for work except as an incident.

2. An action to recover damages for breach of a contract which was to be performed by a certain time is not prematurely brought where brought a few months after such time, though defendants were still working thereunder with plaintiff's consent, but without his having waived his claim for damages.

3. The consent of a party to a contract that the other party might continue the work after the time stipulated for its completion is not a waiver of damages or of the breach.

4. A complaint on a contract for a breach, consisting of a failure to furnish certain materials which defendants had agreed to furnish, need not aver a demand and refusal to pay the damages.

5. Where defendants contracted to furnish an ice plant built according to certain specifications, and guaranteed its efficiency, they are liable for its failure to do the work, though the specifications were furnished by plaintiff, and an efficient ice plant could not be constructed by following them.

6. Where a cause of action for breach of contract was complete when the suit was commenced, and plaintiff could not maintain another suit for the damages, it was proper to allow damages accruing after the commencement of the action.

7. Loss of profits are proper elements of damages in an action for a breach of contract to furnish and remodel an ice plant.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by Isaac H. Bryson against A. J. McCone and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from the order refusing a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Knight & Heggerty and Ben Goodrich, for appellants. W. P. Gardiner, J. S. Chapman, and R. L. Garrett, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract to convert the ice works of the Consumers' Ice Company at Los Angeles into the Kitton system of ice making, to be located at Riverside, and to furnish certain materials. The work was to be done and the materials furnished according to specifications, describing with apparent minuteness what was to be done. Generally, they were to take down and remove to their shop the old machinery, and were to set the new machinery up at Riverside, so as to make a complete ice plant. Among the things to be furnished by defendants were six new combined iron tanks of the Kitton system, made of Oregon ship timber, three-inch stock, surfaced on one side and two edges, and securely bolted every 16 seconds. Each tank to contain from 16 to 20 molds made of No. 12 steel plate, double riveted and properly calked; all seams to be coated with P. B. paint before being riveted, and the bottom of such parts as come in contact with the wood to be coated with P. B. paint; each tank to contain 2,800 feet of pipe for the expansion of ammonia; also to have proper circulating pumps and connecting pipes, counter shafts, and pulleys; each tank, when completed, to be of sufficient dimensions to contain 10 tons of ice. It was stipulated, however, that "all buildings, foundations, in and about the factory, the flumes, water wheel, and sittings of water wheel, tail race, ropes, or belts for transmission of power, all freights and cartridges, are at the expense of I. H. Bryson, and are outside of this contract." The specifications contained the following guaranty on the part of the defendants: "The new works, when completed, to have a daily average capacity of fifteen tons of good, hard, merchantable ice, free from smell, taste, and objectionable core in can. We guaranty for one year all workmanship and material furnished by us, provided no disarrangement is caused from want of attention of person in charge, and if run according to our instructions. The Fulton Engine Works guaranty that after machine is fully charged, that the yearly additional supply of ammonia shall not exceed four full drams of ammonia, through any defects of workmanship on their part, or through any defects in any of the material furnished by them, while the same is under the charge of thoroughly competent engineers, who will follow the instructions of said Fulton Engine Works." The works were to be completed and ready to start to work by March 1, 1892. The consideration to be received by defendants was $12,500. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $4,102.77, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and from the refusal of a new trial.

The first point urged by the appellants is that the contract upon which suit was brought is void. It is contended that it is a builder's contract, which, under section 1183, Code Civ. Proc., must be filed in the recorder's office of the county in which the work was to be done; otherwise, it is void. It appeared that the contract upon which this action is founded was not so filed. Section 1183 provides that the contract for the work between the owner and his contractor, when the amount to be paid under it exceeds $1,000, shall be in writing, and filed in the recorder's office of the county; "otherwise they [it?] shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto." In Hinckley v. Biscuit Co., 91 Cal. 136, 27 Pac. 594, this section was considered; and it was there held that the word "contractor," as used in that section, does not apply to one who contracts to furnish material only. That case is relied upon as authority here by the respondent, and it seems to me it is quite similar to this in all its essential facts. The case went off upon a demurrer to the complaint, in which it appears that the claimant contracted to construct at its own works, and deliver and put in place on foundations to be prepared by the owner a complete steam plant, machinery, and pump, the several parts of which were enumerated in the complaint. The list is a long one, but it contains the following: Two steam drums, each 30 inches in diameter by 3 feet long, connected with the boiler with twin nozzles, riveted to boiler and drum, with face jointed between; two wind drums, 18 inches in diameter, by 6½ feet long, connected to boilers by twin nozzles; smokestack, 30 inches in diameter, and 50 feet high; Corliss engine, etc. This entire steam plant was to be put up on foundations prepared by the owner, and also connections for steam, water, and exhaust,—made ready for use. That was certainly as much of a structure as that contracted for in this case. The only apparent difference pointed out by defendants is that in this case the tanks were in fact built on the premises, and the woodwork in the brine tank was sublet. There was nothing in the contract, however, as to where they should be made, and all might have been made at the shops, and brought to the premises ready to be set up. And, when put up, they only constituted a machine to be used in the building where they were to be placed. In the case above cited, it was held that the work done in placing the machinery in position, ready to be used, was but the completion of the contract to deliver. A similar ruling was made in Roebling's Sons Co. v. Humboldt Electric Light & Power Co., 112 Cal. 289, 44 Pac. 568. There the contract was to set up in defendant's building a complete electrical plant, consisting of dynamos, converters, switch boards, lamps, etc., with necessary wiring and connections. In that case it might be argued plausibly that the plant was made on the premises. Much of the machinery and materials, such as the wire, for instance, was as characterless as the Oregon ship timber, the bolts, and steel plates used by the defendants in the construction of the tanks. Yet it was held there, too, that putting up the machinery was but a part of the agreement to deliver material. Questions of this character are often very difficult (though, as pointed out in Bennett v. Davis, 113 Cal. 337, 45 Pac. 684, they are not altogether new), being quite similar to a much-vexed question which sometimes arose under the statute of frauds,—the question as to whether a certain agreement was to manufacture or sell goods. I think this case is clearly within the rule laid down in Hinckley v. Biscuit Co., and also in Roebling's Sons Co. v. Humboldt Electric Light & Power Co.

The appellants contend that the suit was prematurely brought. It was commenced on the 16th day of July, and, by the terms of the agreement, the contract was to have been fully performed by the 1st day of March preceding. Yet, without objection on the part of the plaintiff, the defendants continued to do some work about the plant, trying to make it work, up to and including the very day on which the action was commenced. There was no agreement to extend this time, or to waive damages for the failure to complete the work in time. On the contrary, there was during the whole period a controversy and an attempt to compromise the matter; and the defendants refused to complete the machine except upon the condition that plaintiff would accept certain additional work and material as full satisfaction, waiving his claim for damages. This plaintiff refused to do, but insisted that the defendants should complete the work, and pay him damages besides. This was a refusal on the part of the defendants to perform the contract. They had no right to insist as a condition that plaintiff should waive his claim for damages.

But consent on the part of plaintiff that defendants might continue the work after the stipulated time was not a waiver of damages or of the breach. Upon the breach, plaintiff, not being himself in default, had the right to rescind or permit the defendants to complete the work, and sue for damages occasioned by the default. This need not be pursued further, however, because, as already said, the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that defendants had expressly refused to complete the work. If McCone, speaking for the firm, refused to go on except on conditions which he had no right to ask, it was a refusal to go on with the contract, and it did not matter that Bell, the other partner, had not refused.

It is said that no cause of action is shown, because it is not averred that demand had been made on defendants that they pay the damages, and that they refused. No demand was necessary. The breach of contract which injured plaintiff, and which constituted his cause of action, was the failure to furnish the materials which defendants had agreed to furnish. It was not a contract to pay money, a breach of which could only consist in a refusal to pay. Such was the contract in Curtiss v. Bachman, 84 Cal. 216, 24 Pac. 379. At least, the court there so held. See Dunn v. Steubing, 120 N. Y. 232, 24 N. E. 315.

At the trial the defendants' counsel asked one of the defendants, while on the stand as a witness, to relate the circumstances under which the contract was made. Upon objection being made, counsel explained that the particular circumstances he desired to prove were that the written contract was furnished by the plaintiff, and not by the defendants. The objection was sustained, and the ruling is assigned as error. The plaintiff had testified that the contract and specifications were furnished by Kitton, and that Kitton was employed by the defendants. Respondent's brief is largely devoted to showing his advantage resulting from such fact. From the standpoint of plaintiff's counsel upon the trial and here, nothing can be plainer than that the proposed evidence was both relevant and material. It was simply and only contradictory of evidence produced by plaintiff. The ruling will not necessitate a reversal, however, both because, notwithstanding the ruling, the witness proceeded to state the particular circumstances which counsel desired to prove,—for example, he testified that Kitton was acting for both parties, in pursuance of an understanding between plaintiff and the defendants,—and also because the evidence was immaterial.

During the trial, the defendants, in various ways, raised the point that they simply undertook to furnish a machine built according to certain specifications, and that they were not responsible for inherent defects in the Kitton system; and they contended that that system was defective, and that an efficient ice plant could not be constructed under the specifications which they were by their contract required to follow. We had occasion to consider a similar question in Bancroft v. Tool Co. (Cal.) 52 Pac. 496. The difference between the cases is mainly that there was no guaranty of efficiency in that case, and in this case there was such a guaranty. Considering the special undertaking of the defendants, I cannot see how it matters who furnished the specifications. The defendants undertook not only to make a plant according to the specifications, but also that it would do certain work. This was a warranty of the scheme, as well as an undertaking to do good work themselves in furnishing a plant in accordance with the scheme. It is fair to add that the evidence conclusively shows that the work was not done in accordance with the contract, but was about as defective as it could well be.

Damages which accrued after the suit was commenced were properly allowed. The plaintiff could not maintain another suit for damages which resulted from the breach which had already occurred. His cause of action was complete when the suit was begun, and the damages proved were the natural and necessary consequence of the wrong. Alfter v. Hammitt, 54 Mo. App. 303; Behrman v. Linde (Sup.) 5 N. Y. Supp. 898; Filler v. Railroad Co., 49 N. Y. 42. Nor was there error in permitting the plaintiff to show the profits which he would have made. Hitchcock v. Supreme Tent, 100 Mich. 40, 58 N. W. 640; Wakeman v. Manufacturing Co., 101 N. Y. 205, 4 N. E. 264; Hawthorne v. Siegel, 88 Cal. 167, 25 Pac. 1114; Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 611, 22 Pac. 327. Judgment and order affirmed.

APPEALS—REVIEW—DAMAGES.

1. Where appellant insists that, on the findings of the lower court, he is entitled to a more favorable judgment, but waives all right to have the case remanded for a new trial, the court will rely entirely on the findings whether or not the evidence supports them.

2. The appellate tribunal will not go beyond the strict rules of law to increase plaintiff's allowance of damages for loss of profits.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by I. H. Bryson against A. J. McCone and others for damages from a breach of contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, he appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. Gardiner, J. S. Chapman, and R. L. Garrett, for appellant. Knight & Heggerty and Ben Goodrich, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This is plaintiff's appeal from the judgment. Defendants also appealed from the judgment, and from a refusal of a new trial. L. A. No. 279 (53 Pac. 637). In that case the facts are stated more at large, and many of the points also involved in this appeal are discussed.

Plaintiff insists that, upon the findings, he is entitled to a more favorable judgment. He has, however, greatly discredited his contention by bringing up in a bill of exceptions all the evidence respecting the relations between plaintiff and defendants subsequent to

March 1, 1892, and regarding any extension of time for completing the contract, and any waiver of damages, and also in regard to the cost of producing ice, and the expenditure of $1,800 for water power, and $243.19 for ammonia. If the contention is only that appellant is entitled to a different judgment upon the findings, there can be no use for a bill of exceptions to bring up the evidence. And yet appellant's brief refers indifferently to the facts found and what the evidence shows. I presume counsel realize that the findings must be supplemented upon the points with reference to which they have brought up the evidence. Still, appellant states in his points that he does not desire a new trial; and, if he cannot obtain relief by a simple modification of the judgment, he prefers to waive, and does waive, his claim to additional damages. The court found that plaintiff could have made profits by the manufacture and sale of ice to the amount of $1,166.66% per month if said machinery had been perfected with the capacity of 15 tons per day, of such ice as was described in the contract, from the 1st day of March, 1892, up to the 1st day of October, 1892; and for the last three months of that period he was damaged to that extent for each month by the failure to complete the machinery according to the contract. It is also found, in effect, that plaintiff gave defendants until the 2d of July, 1892, to perform the contract. It may be true that the evidence shows without conflict that the time for the completion of the contract was not extended, but that plaintiff all the time insisted that defendants had violated their contract, and were liable to him for damages. We cannot supply the defects in the findings, but if facts exist which are not found, and which are material, the error could only be corrected by a new trial.

Formerly, as I understand the history of the proposition of law involved, this claim of damages would have been rejected as speculative. It is only found that plaintiff could have made such profits, not that he would have made them, or that it was reasonably certain that such profits would have been made. It is a harsh rule which allows plaintiff to recover such damages, although I think it is now settled that damages which are reasonably certain to accrue may be recovered. Had this machinery been perfect, yet for some fault of the plaintiff, or through accident, he may not have been able to realize profits. Had what was not been, no one could tell what would have occurred. Under such circumstances, we are not inclined to go beyond the strict rules of law to increase the plaintiff's allowance of damages. He who can recover upon a theory relieved from all hazards has a great advantage. As to the cost of the water and ammonia which was lost to plaintiff by the failure to complete the machinery by the 1st of March, 1892, the same argument will apply. Possibly, however, some proportion of this should be allowed to the plaintiff as damages, irrespective of any question as to the extension of the time for the completion of the contract, if the proper proportion could be determined from the findings. Again, however, it seems to have been found that the only damage which plaintiff has suffered, for which he is entitled to a judgment, is the sum of the various items which were allowed. These conclusions are reached upon the supposition that appellant waives his right to a new trial. In that view, of course, the evidence brought up has not been regarded. The judgment is affirmed.

WISE et al. v. COLLINS. (L. A. 298.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1898.)

APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—SALE—TITLE—PAROL EVIDENCE—DEPOSITIONS—REFLEVIN.

1. Error in admitting irrelevant and immaterial evidence is cured if during the further progress of the case the evidence becomes material.

2. Evidence showed that defendant's assignor, being in the sheep business, applied to plaintiffs to procure him more sheep, and they arranged to turn over to him a band at $1.55 per head, on the agreement that plaintiffs were to retain the title until defendant either paid for them, or gave a mortgage on them and other sheep owned by him to secure such payment. A mortgage was thereafter prepared, which defendant refused to execute for the reason that the interest provided was too high. Held sufficient to show that the plaintiffs retained the ownership of the sheep.

3. An unexecuted chattel mortgage is not a written instrument, within the rule preventing the introduction of parol evidence to vary or contradict its terms. Its statements are admissions of the party from whom it proceeds, which may be explained by parol, the same as verbal admissions.

4. Code Civ. Proc. § 2032, requires a deposition, after being certified, to be inclosed in an envelope or wrapper, sealed, and directed to the clerk of the court in which the action is pending, etc. Held, that an indorsement of the name of the witness and case on the envelope was extra-official, and no part of the deposition, and that an error in the initials of the witness in such indorsement did not detract from the validity and authenticity of the deposition, and might be explained by parol.

5. Where a vendee of property agrees that the title is to remain in the vendor until paid for, and then gives mortgages thereon to a third party, such mortgages are competent, in an action by the vendor to recover the property, to show a violation of the agreement.

6. When, after suit brought to recover property sold under an agreement that the title shall remain in the vendor until paid for, a third person purchased the property from the vendee, with notice of the vendor's claim that the purchase price has not been paid, he takes the place of the vendee, with all the burdens arising from the contract, and a judgment for the property or its value was properly entered against him.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Inyo county.

Action by J. H. Wise and another, co-partners, against John L. Collins. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. H. Mack and P. W. Bennett, for appellant. Wallis A. Lamar, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. Action of replevin to recover 2,400 sheep, or for $2,500, the value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Written findings were waived. Plaintiffs had judgment for possession of 1,820 sheep, and, if a delivery could not be had, for $1,740, etc. John L. Collins, one of the defendants, appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first point urged in favor of reversal is based upon a ruling of the court admitting in evidence an agreement between plaintiffs and Bertrand Rhine, assignor of defendant, Collins, in reference to a band of sheep called the "Rodriguez sheep." The substance of this agreement is that Christy & Wise transfer to Rhine a band of sheep, consisting of 1,900 ewes and 700 lambs, more or less, at $1.50 per head; Christy & Wise to retain the ownership thereof until they were paid for. Rhine was to run the sheep at his own expense, and dispose of them, and all moneys above the cost price of $1.50 per head realized therefrom to be divided, 60 per cent. to Rhine, and 40 per cent. to plaintiffs. This agreement was dated April 27, 1894, and is a part of a deposition of Harry E. Wise, one of the plaintiffs, taken in the case. Immediately following the agreement, the witness stated in his deposition as follows: "The sheep mentioned in this agreement are not involved in the suit of Christy & Wise against Bertrand Rhine." At the trial, counsel for defendant moved to strike out all the testimony in regard to the Rodriguez sheep, upon the ground that the same is irrelevant and immaterial. The court denied the motion, and the ruling is assigned as error. This ruling was clearly erroneous. If the Rodriguez sheep were not involved in the action, all testimony in reference to them was clearly irrelevant and immaterial to the issues of the case. The error was cured, however, by the later testimony in the case, from which it appeared that in May, 1895, John F. Maio, the agent of plaintiffs, called upon Rhine, and proceeded to separate from other sheep the Rodriguez band; that he got about 1,100 grown sheep, and 700 sucking lambs. Subsequently he found there were some of the band he had not secured, whereupon he returned, and got an order from Mrs. Rhine for the remainder, and parted out, say, 100, when Rhine came, and refused to let him have them. Maio further stated that there were from 100 to 200 of the band which he did not get, and that some of them were taken by the sheriff in this action.

This testimony rendered proof of title to the Rodriguez band of sheep both proper and necessary.

2. The important contention in the case relates to another band of sheep known as the "Caetano band," and consisting of some 2,000. These sheep were owned by M. J. Caetano, of Merced, in the county of Merced. He was largely indebted to plaintiffs, wool buyers of San Francisco. Bertrand Rhine was in the sheep business, and owned some 1,500, which he was pasturing in the county of Inyo. Rhine was desirous of procuring more sheep, and applied to plaintiffs, with whom he was doing business, to aid him in procuring them. The latter arranged with Caetano to turn over to Rhine 2,000 of his band at $1.55 per head, which was done. The testimony on the part of plaintiffs tends to show that their agreement with Rhine was that plaintiffs should retain the ownership of the sheep until Rhine either paid for them, or gave them a chattel mortgage on the band, and also upon the 1,500 owned by said Rhine. A mortgage was prepared by plaintiffs, and forwarded to Rhine, which he refused to execute, giving as a reason that the interest provided for therein was too high. We think the evidence was quite sufficient to sustain the theory of plaintiffs, to the effect that they retained the ownership of the sheep, and the court so held. Appellant, John Collins, took an assignment of the sheep from Rhine after suit brought, and was substituted as a defendant in place of Rhine.

Several objections were taken to testimony in explanation of expressions used in the chattel mortgage. These were based upon the theory that oral testimony was not admissible to vary the meaning of a written instrument. The answer to this is that the document, not having been executed, was in no proper sense a written instrument, within the purview of the rule invoked. Its statements coming from the plaintiffs were admissions on their part which were subject to explanation equally with like verbal admissions.

The deposition of Alice Simpson Houston, taken on behalf of the plaintiffs at San Francisco, was offered in evidence, and objected to by counsel for defendant upon the ground that the record shows that the deposition of F. K. Houston was taken. A motion was also made to strike out the deposition after it was admitted in evidence, which was denied, and the ruling excepted to. In support of his contention on this point, appellant cites Dye v. Bailey, 2 Cal. 383, and Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 375, 26 Pac. 206. The facts as they appeared at the trial are as follows: The clerk of the court was called upon, and produced the deposition, which was contained in a sealed package, and which he stated he received by United States mail. Upon the package was the following indorsement: "In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Inyo. John H. and Harry E. Wise, Plaintiffs, vs. John L. Collins et als., Defendants. Deposition of F. K. Houston, a witness produced, sworn, and examined on behalf of plaintiff, taken, sealed up, and deposited in the U. S. mail at San Francisco on the 6th day of November, 1895, by myself, Lee D. Craig, a notary public in and for the city and county of San Francisco, state of California. Registered December 6, 1895, San Francisco, street K, No. 18,244, and addressed to Hon. D. J. Hession, county clerk, Independence, Inyo county, California. Filed December 10, 1895. D. J. Hession, Clerk." The clerk then opened the package, which contained the deposition. It is headed as follows: "Deposition of Alice Simpson Houston." It proceeds as follows: "My name is Alice Simpson Houston, widow of Frank K. My business is stenographer and typewriter. I am employed with Christy & Wise, wool merchants, and have been so employed for six years last August." The witness then proceeds to give important testimony for plaintiffs in reference to the agreement made between plaintiffs and Rhine as to the Caetano sheep. It is conceded that her deposition was signed, "Alice Simpson Houston." Neither the notice under which the deposition was taken, nor the certificate of the notary thereto, is set out in the record. The court also permitted plaintiffs to prove, against the objection of defendant, that Mrs. Alice Simpson Houston and Mrs. F. K. Houston were one and the same person; that in the office where she was employed she usually went by the name of Mrs. F. K. or Mrs. Frank K. Houston, but that she always signed her name as Alice Simpson Houston. The contention of appellant would be sound, and the consequence fatal to the judgment, were it supported by the record, but it is not. The notice of taking the deposition and the certificate of the notary thereto not being set out, we must, in favor of the judgment, presume they were in due form, and described the witness by her true name of Alice Simpson Houston. The indorsement on the envelope inclosing the deposition formed no part of that document. Section 2032 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires the deposition, after being certified, to be inclosed in an envelope or wrapper, sealed, and directed to the clerk of the court in which the action is pending, etc. All else is extraofficial, and can neither add to nor detract from the validity or authenticity of the deposition. It follows that the deposition was, so far as appears, properly admitted in evidence.

The mortgages executed by Rhine to third parties upon the sheep were admissible in evidence, as tending to show a violation of his agreement with the plaintiffs. When, after suit brought, appellant, with full notice, became the purchaser of the sheep from Rhine, and procured himself to be substituted as a defendant in the cause, he took the place of said Rhine, cum onere, and the judgment for the recovery of the sheep, or of their value if delivery could not be had, was properly entered against him. Beyond this and the costs, the judgment did not go.

There are a few other points made on the appeal, but they do not call for comment. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

HILL v. DEN. (L. A. 392.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—ORAL AGREEMENTS TO CONVEY LAND—PART PERFORMANCE—DISAFFIRMANCE—SURRENDERING POSSESSION.

1. Where a party to an oral contract for a conveyance of land had performed her part in full by the rendering of certain services, and the other party had partly performed by putting the former in possession, there is a sufficient part performance to remove the contract from the operation of the statute of frauds.

2. Where services have been rendered by a party in the performance of a verbal contract to convey land, and the other party puts the former into possession, but is unable to make a deed, the former cannot maintain an action in disaffirmance of such contract to recover the value of the services so rendered, unless he surrenders or offers to surrender such possession before the commencement of the action.

3. Plaintiff is not aided by his surrender and offer to restore possession after the commencement of the action, as set forth in his amended complaint.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county.

Action by Jose Vincente Hill against Augustus H. Den. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll. Affirmed.

H. C. Booth, for appellant. Jas. B. Devine and W. S. Day, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the alleged reasonable value of certain services performed by plaintiff's wife, Maria Augustias Hill, for defendant. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll. The facts of the case, as disclosed by the findings of the court or admitted by the pleadings, are as follows: On or about the 18th day of April, 1894, defendant requested Mrs. Hill, plaintiff's wife, to come to his (defendant's) house, and take care of him, and do the necessary work about and in the house, and agreed that he would support and maintain her while she so remained, and, when he should get married, he would deed to her and her husband a home during their lives, designating certain realty in the city of Santa Barbara as the property to be so conveyed. Under said promise, Mrs. Hill and her husband went to defendant's house, and remained there until defendant got married, on December 30, 1895, and, while so remaining, did the work and services there to be performed under said promise and agreement; and her services were worth $50 per month while she remained in his service, to wit, from April 18, 1894, to December 30, 1895. After defendant's marriage he placed Mrs. Hill and husband in possession of the premises agreed upon between him and her, where they remained peaceably and without interference from defendant, or any one acting under him or as his successor, until after plaintiff commenced this action, when, defendant having given them no deed of the premises, they voluntarily surrendered the possession thereof. After plaintiff and his wife entered into possession of said property, and before the commencement of this action, defendant conveyed to his wife, in consideration of love and affection, all the real property which he possessed in Santa Barbara county, the deed being dated, acknowledged, and recorded on January 24, 1896; and there has been no reconveyance to defendant of the whole or any part of the property so conveyed. Defendant has not failed to fulfill his promise and carry out his contract except as before stated, and the execution of the deed by defendant to his wife as shown by the pleadings did not prevent him from carrying out his contract. After the execution by defendant of the deed to his wife, plaintiff's wife demanded of defendant a deed; and he replied that his wife knew all about his arrangement with her (Mrs. Hill), and they would fix it up, and that Thomas McNulta, his attorney, had the deed. Neither plaintiff nor his wife has received from defendant or his wife any deed of the said premises, but defendant's wife has neglected and refused to convey said property to plaintiff and his wife for life or at all. Neither plaintiff nor his wife made any improvements or expended any money on said property during their occupancy thereof. The action was commenced August 4, 1896. On September 8, 1896, plaintiff filed amendments to his complaint, in which he alleged "that plaintiff hereby offers to restore possession of said land to defendant, and hereby, for himself and his said wife, relinquishes, waives, and abandons all right, title, claim, and equity of either or both in and to said land on account of said verbal contract, or a part performance thereof." And on the same day he filed a supplemental complaint, in which he alleged "that since the commencement of said action, to wit, on the 6th day of August, 1896, plaintiff and his said wife, Maria Augustias Hill, have quit and surrendered the possession of the premises described and referred to in the complaint."

There is and can be no dispute upon the proposition that an oral contract for the sale of real property or of an interest therein is invalid under the statute of frauds. Code

Civ. Proc. § 1973. But such a contract may, nevertheless, be executed by the parties to it, and its specific performance may be compelled by a court of equity, in case there has been a part performance thereof. Id. § 1972. Here it appears that Mrs. Hill had performed, by the services rendered, her part of the contract in full, and that there was a part performance of the contract by defendant when he placed Mr. and Mrs. Hill in possession and gave them full control of the property. It is clear, therefore, that plaintiff might have demanded a specific performance of the contract, and had his demand enforced by the courts, as against both defendant and his wife; since, when defendant executed the deed to his wife, the Hills were in possession of the property, and she must therefore be deemed to have taken the deed with notice of their rights.

But whether an action for specific performance was plaintiff's only remedy need not be considered. In Fuller v. Reed, 38 Cal. 99, the following language is found in the opinion, on page 110: "If money has been paid or services rendered in the performance of the conditions of a void contract by one party thereto, and the other party fails to voluntarily perform on his part, the injured party has no remedy at law upon the contract. He may, however, under such circumstances, disaffirm such contract, and maintain his action at law to recover back money so paid, or the value of services so rendered." Conceding that the law is thus correctly declared, still the question remains: Can the plaintiff maintain this action, he and his wife having been in the full and undisturbed possession of the property, and having made no offer to surrender the possession or restore the same at the time the action was commenced? In Browne on the Statute of Frauds (section 121) the law is stated as follows: "When the purchaser under a verbal contract for land has been put in possession, and has made payments on account of the price, it is plain that he cannot recover the money without surrendering or offering to surrender the possession." And in Wood on Frauds (page 435) it is said: "In all cases where a person has gone into the possession of land under a verbal contract which the other party refuses to perform, before he can maintain an action for the purchase money paid by him, or improvements put by him upon the land, he must surrender the possession." In Abbott v. Draper, 4 Denio, 51, the court, by Bronson, C. J., said: "Although the statute declares a parol contract for the sale of lands void, it does not make it illegal. It is not a corrupt or wicked agreement; nor does it violate any principle of public policy. Parties are at liberty to act under such contracts if they think proper. Many such have been carried into complete effect by payment of the price and conveyance of the land. Part performance does not take the case out of the statute, so that the contract can be enforced

In a court of law. But, when the vendee has received the possession and paid a part of the price, the contract is not so utterly void that he can recover back the money just as though there had never been an agreement. If he can recover at all so long as the vendor is not in the wrong, he must, at the least, first restore the possession, and demand the repayment of the money. It is impossible to maintain that he can retain the possession and yet recall the money."

The decisions of this court are in line with the authorities above cited. In Haynes v. White, 55 Cal. 38, the vendee was put in possession of the land, and paid part of the purchase money. The vendor was unable to convey the title, and the vendee, while in possession, commenced the action to recover the amount of the purchase money paid, and damages. It was held that the action could not be maintained, and the court said: "They [the defendants] failed to comply with their part of the contract here in question, for they did not and could not convey to the plaintiff the title to the property; and the plaintiff having complied in part, and offered to complete the performance of the contract on his part, it is clear that, had he surrendered or offered to surrender to defendants the possession of the property, he could have maintained an action against them. Instead of doing this, he retained the possession of all the property, and commenced this action." And, after citing section 3306 of the Civil Code as to the measure of damages, the opinion states: "But, before an action can be maintained to recover this detriment, the plaintiff must have been evicted, or have voluntarily surrendered or offered to surrender possession. He cannot, as already observed, hold on to the property, and at the same time recover back what he paid." See, also, Herman v. Haffenegger, 54 Cal. 161; Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 42, 11 Pac. 489; Rhorer v. Bila, 83 Cal. 51, 23 Pac. 274; Hammond v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 522, 24 Pac. 837. It is well settled in this state that an action cannot be maintained unless the cause of action existed at the time the action was commenced. The decisions upon this point are numerous, and need not be cited. And, if a party has no cause of action at the time of its commencement, he cannot maintain it by filing a supplemental complaint founded upon matters which have subsequently occurred. Wittenbrock v. Bellmer, 57 Cal. 12. As plaintiff and his wife were in possession of the property at the time he commenced his action, he had then no cause of action for the relief demanded, and he was not aided by his subsequent offer to restore possession. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

TRABING v. CALIFORNIA NAV. & IMP. CO. (Sac. 295.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1898.)

MASTER'S LIABILITY FOR ACTS OF SERVANT—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT—SINGLE STATEMENT OF DAMAGES—MALICE OF SERVANT—ACTUAL AND EXEMPLARY DAMAGES—WITNESSES.

1. A complaint for damages from being handcuffed and tied to a post under orders of the captain of defendant's steamer sufficiently shows which of defendant's servants were the wrongdoers, where it alleges that the acts were committed by defendant's servants and agents, "who were at said time in charge of said steamer."

2. A complaint by one who was a passenger on defendant's steamer, for being wrongfully handcuffed by defendant's servants, tied to a post, and afterwards ejected from the steamer, states a single ground of recovery, so as to make proper a single statement of the entire damage sustained.

3. A company operating a line of steamboats as a common carrier is liable for the actual damages caused by the wrongful acts of a captain of one of its boats in the course of his duties, in handcuffing, tying to a post, and afterwards ejecting a passenger for an alleged failure to pay his fare, though the captain acted from malicious motives or resorted to unlawful means.

4. The proprietor of a steamboat is not liable for exemplary damages on account of wanton or malicious acts of a captain of its boat towards a passenger in executing the authority given him, unless the act was either authorized or ratified.

5. Instructing that the jury should render a verdict for such damages as appeared from all the evidence to be just is too general in an action against a principal for the malicious acts of its agent done in the course of his duty.

6. On an issue as to whether plaintiff had paid his fare on defendant's steamer, the mother of plaintiff testified on direct examination that she had written him to come home, and that a few days after the date she expected him she had received a letter from him stating that he had been put off the steamer en route. On cross-examination she was asked if he had not told her he had no ticket, which she denied, and also if she had not told P. that he had not paid his fare, which she denied. Held that, the examination being on collateral matters not brought out by any evidence in chief, defendant was bound by the answers; and it was immaterial that the witness was the guardian ad litem of plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by Charles Trabling, a minor, by Minnie Jones, his guardian ad litem, against the California Navigation & Improvement Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Woods & Levinsky, for appellant. Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The plaintiff is a minor, and was of the age of 14 years at the time of the injuries complained of. The defendant is a corporation engaged in operating a line of steamboats between San Francisco and the city of Stockton for the transportation of passengers and freight to and from those places and intermediate ports. The additional facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action, as alleged in the complaint, may be summarized as follows: On the evening of March 23, 1895, at about 8 o'clock, the plaintiff boarded defendant's steamer, Mary Garratt, at Benicia, to be carried to the city of Stockton, and paid therefor 50 cents, that being the regular fare. That, when the steamer was but a short distance from Benicia, the defendant's servants and agents in charge of said steamer "wrongfully placed on the plaintiff iron handcuffs, and took him down into and upon the lower deck of said steamer, and there chained him to a post in such way and manner as to cause him great bodily pain. That plaintiff was so kept by said defendant's said servants and agents ironed and chained to said post as said steamer proceeded on its said trip, and until said steamer on its said trip reached the town of Antioch, at which last-named place said defendant's said servants and agents removed said irons from said plaintiff, and then and there, against his will, wrongfully ejected him from said steamer," to his damage in the sum of $5,000. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and the defendant answered, and, after denying specifically the allegations of the complaint, with the qualification "save and except as hereinafter set forth," alleged, in substance, that, after the steamer left Benicia, the plaintiff refused to pay his fare, and "used violent, profane, abusive, vile, and obscene language to and towards the captain of said steamer, who was then in charge of said steamer, in the presence of the passengers"; that, by reason of said language and conduct, he was compelled to, and did, place handcuffs upon him and chain him to a post on the lower deck; that it caused plaintiff no pain; and that he was released and put ashore at Antioch. The jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $2,500. This appeal is by the defendant, from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The demurrer to the complaint was general and special; the latter, upon the ground of ambiguity, in that it did not show whether the plaintiff suffered damage in said sum by reason of being handcuffed, or by reason of being chained to a post, or by reason of being ejected from the steamer, and because it does not show which of defendant's servants did these things. In appellant's brief only the special demurrer is considered, and we shall therefore assume the sufficiency of the complaint as against a general demurrer; and we also think the complaint sufficient as tested by the special demurrer. The wrongs and injuries complained of are alleged to have been committed by the defendant's servants and agents "who were at said time in charge of said steamer." This allegation sufficiently distinguishes between those who were authorized to represent the defendant in the management and control of the boat and its business, and those who, though employes and servants, were merely laborers and under the immediate control of those "in charge of said steamer." Whether, if these alleged wrongs and injuries had been perpetrated by the deck hands of their own motion, and without the direction of any one in control of the steamer and its business, the defendant would not be liable, upon the ground that it was its duty to prevent it, need not be considered.

1. That the alleged wrong and injury was a continuing one, and was in law one and not divisible, and states a single ground of recovery; and that a single statement of the entire damage sustained, in one sum, is proper, see Sloane v. Railway Co., 111 Cal. 685, 44 Pac. 320.

2. Defendant's motion for a nonsuit at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence in chief was properly denied. Said motion was based upon the ground that "the evidence on the part of the plaintiff shows that the acts of the captain of the steamer Mary Garratt in the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff were a willful and wanton wrong and trespass on the part of the captain, and there is no evidence to show that the same were authorized by the defendant, or subsequently ratified by it." The answer of defendant, as well as the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff, shows that all the acts of the captain constituting the alleged wrongs and injuries were done and performed upon defendant's boat in its operation as a common carrier by the captain in charge thereof, in the line of his employment. That he was authorized by the defendant to see that persons being transported upon its said steamer paid their fare, and to collect the same, and to remove from the steamer those who, not having paid their fare, refused to pay it when demanded, cannot be questioned. That was not only "in the line of his employment," but one of the very purposes for which he was employed; and that defendant is liable in damages for all that the captain wrongfully did to the plaintiff in the execution, or attempted execution, of that authority, even though the captain acted from wanton or malicious motives, or resorted to unlawful means in executing it, is amply sustained by the modern authorities, and among them several of those cited by appellant. See Cooley, Torts (2d Ed.) p. 625 et seq. (star page 534 et seq.), and numerous cases there cited; Thomp. Neg. p. 886, § 4, treating of willful and malicious acts of servants; Rounds v. Railway Co., 64 N. Y. 129; Lothrop v. Adams, 133 Mass. 471, 480; Railway Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 109, 111, 13 Sup. Ct. 261; Stephenson v. Southern Pac. Co., 93 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. 234; Warner v. Same, 113 Cal. 111, 45 Pac. 187; and Gorman v. Same, 97 Cal. 1, 31 Pac. 1112. That the injuries were willfully or wantonly inflicted does not relieve the defendant from liability. In Railway Co. v. Prentice, supra, the supreme court of the United States said: "A corporation is doubtless liable, like an individual, to make compensation for any tort committed by an agent in the course of his employment, although the act is done wantonly and recklessly, or against the express orders of the principal," citing several cases.

3. It is further contended that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. This contention is based: (1) Because the injuries were willfully inflicted by the captain; (2) that plaintiff provoked the injuries by his own misconduct; and (3) that the damages suffered were merely nominal; and, for the first and second of these reasons, it is also contended (4) that the verdict is against law. So far as these points are not disposed of by what has already been said, they may be considered under appellant's next point, which is (5) that the damages are excessive, and were given under the influence of passion and prejudice.

The plaintiff testified, in substance, that he came to the boat accompanied by his brother Louis and his friends Ray Barrington and H. Starkey; that the purser came to the wharf end of the gang plank, and sold tickets; that his brother gave him 50 cents, that being the full fare to Stockton; that he bought a ticket, and went on the boat, and gave his ticket to a man at the boat end of the gang plank, went onto the passenger deck, and stood at the rail for about 10 minutes, until the boat started; that, after the boat started, the captain accosted him, demanding his fare; that plaintiff replied, "I paid my fare;" that the captain said, "You lie. You did not. Come with me;" that the captain put handcuffs on him, and took him down to the Chinese den, under the engine room, and chained his arms around a post, and kept him thus chained about three hours, until the boat reached Antioch, when he was released, and told to "get out of here," and was put ashore; that while he was handcuffed, with his arms around the post, the handcuffs hurt his arms; that he could sit down, but, while sitting he was kept bent so that he was more comfortable standing up; that he had no money when he was put off the boat, and knew no one in Antioch; that it was then about midnight; that he spent the remainder of the night under the sidewalk, and next day walked back to Port Costa, a distance of 30 miles, crossed the straits in a fishing boat, and reached Benicia about dark. In his testimony that he bought a ticket and went onto the boat on the gang plank, plaintiff was fully corroborated by his brother and by Barrington and Starkey. The captain testified that plaintiff came on the boat from the piling, amidships, and not by the gang plank, and in this he was corroborated. The only abusive language used by the plaintiff before he was taken down into the hold, according to the captain's testimony, was that, when he asked him for his ticket, he replied, "Take it if you can, and be damned to you;" that the other abusive language was used after he had taken him downstairs, and saw that he was going to handcuff him, when he called him a "Dutch son of a bitch." Without stopping to notice the evidence tending to corroborate or contradict the testimony given on behalf of the respective parties, it is clear that there was ample evidence to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff for compensatory damages. The credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence were exclusively for the determination of the jury.

It is contended by appellant that the jury must have included exemplary damages in their verdict; that the amount awarded the plaintiff cannot be otherwise explained. We cannot determine from the amount awarded whether it includes exemplary damages or not. If the jury were properly instructed upon that subject, an excess in the amount given should be very clear to justify this court in disturbing their conclusion. The question therefore turns upon the instructions given and refused. If the action had been against the captain in charge of the steamer, an instruction to the jury that they might, if they deemed it proper, give exemplary damages if they should find the facts to be as claimed by the plaintiff, would have been proper. But the defendant, the corporation, not having directed the captain to perpetrate the wrongs complained of, while liable for compensatory damages, is not liable for exemplary damages unless it should be made to appear that it ratified the captain's acts; and it is not claimed on behalf of the plaintiff that there was any such direction or ratification. That unless the acts constituting the injury were directed by the corporation, or subsequently ratified by it, exemplary damages cannot be given, see Warner v. Southern Pac. Co., 113 Cal. 105, 45 Pac. 187, and Railway Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 106, 13 Sup. Ct. 261. Upon the subject of damages the court instructed the jury, at plaintiff's request, that, if they found certain facts therein enumerated, "then I charge you your verdict will be in favor of plaintiff for such damages as under all the circumstances of the case disclosed by the evidence appear to be just, not exceeding the sum of $5,000," the sum demanded in the complaint. The defendant requested the following instruction, which was refused: "I charge you that in cases of this kind the plaintiff can recover only the actual damages suffered by him, unless the master authorized the commission of the act complained of, or participated therein, or ratified it after its commission." As an abstract proposition of law the instruction given is correct, but it is too general to properly guide a jury to a correct conclusion under the facts of this case. The instruction would apply to almost any conceivable case, whether the action were against the principal or against the agent who actually committed the tort, and whether the facts did or did not justify exemplary damages. It left the question of exemplary damages entirely to the discretion of the jury. The instruction which was refused should have been given. It would have informed the jury that they could not give exemplary damages. The jury were not restricted to compensatory damages, either by the instruction asked or by some other instruction of similar import. The exceptions to the other instructions given at plaintiff's request are not well taken. These exceptions are mainly based upon the proposition that the defendant is not liable for the willful acts of the captain, or that they did not embrace facts which would justify the captain in imprisoning the plaintiff. But no facts were either alleged or proved which could justify such imprisonment, and the jury were properly so instructed. We also think the court properly refused all the instructions requested by defendant which were refused, except the sixteenth; and as that instruction included the subject of exemplary damages, upon which the jury had not been instructed, it should have been modified by specifying the grounds upon which compensatory damages should be based, and given as thus modified.

Certain exceptions were taken by the defendant to rulings upon questions of evidence, which should be briefly noticed. Mrs. Jones, the mother of the plaintiff, was the first witness called, and in chief testified to plaintiff's age; that she had written to him to come home, and expected him the morning of the 24th; that she learned some days after that, by letter from the plaintiff, that he had been put off the boat, but was not asked and did not testify to any of the particulars. Upon cross-examination counsel for defendant asked her as to conversations with her son, whether he told her he had bought a ticket, to which she replied that "he said he had." She was then asked whether she had not told Mr. Parker in a certain conversation that plaintiff told her that he had not paid his fare, to which she replied she had not. She was also asked as to whether her daughter, in a conversation with Parker in her presence, had not said that plaintiff had no ticket, but that she told him to say he paid his fare, and to stick to it. This was not a cross-examination of the witness as to any matter testified to in chief, and seemed to be intended to rebut testimony which it was anticipated the plaintiff would give, and, being collateral, the defendant was bound by her answers. For the purposes of contradicting her as to the conversations with Parker, he was called as a witness by the defendant, and asked as to those conversations. Two of these questions were excluded, upon the ground that they called for conversations which Mrs. Jones was not asked to relate, and not of a particular fact alleged to have been stated in the conversation. These questions were properly excluded. What she may have said to Mr. Parker was a purely collateral matter, and did not bind or affect the plaintiff; and no rule of evidence is better settled than that collateral matters cannot be elicited for the purposes of impeachment, and that a party putting such collateral questions is bound by the answers of the witness. The whole of Parker's testimony, so far as it tended to impeach the testimony of Mrs. Jones or her daughter, was improper, and should have been excluded; nor did the fact that Mrs. Jones was the guardian ad litem of the plaintiff make the examination proper or admissible. We advise that the judgment and the order denying a new trial be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

MOORE v. KENDALL. (Sac. 296.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 3, 1898.)

NEW TRIAL—DISMISSAL—LACHES.

Where the settlement of a statement in support of a new trial is postponed from time to time for nearly a year, when it is discovered that the statement and amendments thereto have been lost, and on stipulation defendant is allowed time to file a rescript, the correctness of which is thereafter disputed, it is not an abuse of the discretion of the court to dismiss the proceedings for a new trial because not prosecuted with reasonable diligence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Placer county.

Action by Mary E. Moore against William S. Kendall. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order dismissing defendant's proceedings for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Johnson, for appellant. J. M. Fulweiler and L. T. Hatfield, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Judgment was entered against defendant in this action on October 27, 1894. His attorney gave notice of intention to move for new trial, and in January, 1895, served his proposed statement in support thereof on the attorney for plaintiff. On March 4, 1895, the latter served certain proposed amendments to such statement on the attorney for defendant. Thereupon defendant's attorney gave due notice that he would present the proposed statement and amendments to the judge who tried the cause for settlement on March 14, 1895. The matter of settling the statement was postponed from time to time—at least some of the delay being at the instance of defendant—until some time in October, 1895, when it was found that the proposed statement had been lost. Defendant's attorney then obtained a continuance until December 18, 1895 (afterwards extended by stipulation until January 12, 1896), to enable him to present a redraft of the proposed statement, to be made from the stenographic notes of the trial. He served a paper of that nature, but its correctness as a rescript of the first draft was disputed by plaintiff's attorney. On February 10, 1896, the attorney for plaintiff gave notice of motion to dismiss the defendant's proceedings for new trial on the ground, among others, that they had not been prosecuted with reasonable diligence. The court granted the motion to dismiss, and defendant appealed.

If we admit, as appellant contends, that the evidence at the hearing showed that the original proposed statement was lost while in the hands of plaintiff's attorney, and that the subsequent embarrassments resulted mainly from such loss, it was yet the appellant on whom rested the duty, as the moving party, to present the proposed statement and amendments, within 10 days after the receipt of the latter, to the judge for settlement, or to deliver them to the clerk of the court for the judge. Code Civ. Proc. § 659, subd. 3. The defendant did neither the one nor the other; and although it may be inferred from the subsequent conduct of plaintiff's attorney that such omission was not objected to by him, and that by consent to proceedings for supplying the lost statement he waived objections he might previously have made, still the defendant is not blameless for the loss of the paper. Had he taken either course allowed by the statute, probably it would not have been lost. According to his own showing, he took no note of the safekeeping of the document for the space of six months or more after it became his duty to deliver it either to the judge or the clerk. Also, there is no explanation of his delay to obtain, or to attempt to obtain, a settlement of the substituted statement during the period from January 12 to February 10, 1896. The circumstances were such as should have incited to dispatch. We see no abuse of discretion in the order appealed from, and it should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

ROGERS et al. v. KIMBALL et al. (L. A. 199.)<sup>1</sup>

CONTRACTS OF INDEMNITY—WANT OF CONSIDERATION—PLEADINGS—VARIANCE—RELEASES—EFFECT BY STATUTE.

1. A recovery cannot be had on a contract to indemnify where there has been no performance, or offer to perform, of the promise which was the sole consideration of the agreement to indemnify.

2. Where there is a failure to establish a case as alleged in the complaint, or to ask leave to amend, the judgment will not be reversed on the ground that, on some different state of the pleadings, plaintiffs might have been entitled to recover.

3. Civ. Code, § 1541, providing that an obligation is extinguished by a written release thereof given to the debtor by the creditor, with or without a new consideration, applies only to instruments which, by their terms, purport to be formal releases, and does not include contracts of indemnity which on their face purport to give a right on which an affirmative action would lie.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by Thomas L. Rogers and wife against Warren C. Kimball and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

D. L. Withington, Works & Works (Withington & Carter, of counsel), for appellants. M. A. Luce, McDonald & McDonald, A. H. Collins, and W. J. Hunsaker, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. Appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a new trial. The action is by and on behalf of Ella S. Rogers, the real party in interest, joining with her Thomas L. Rogers, her husband, to recover upon a certain contract of indemnity, set forth in the complaint. The complaint, after alleging the death of James S. Gordon, and the appointment of the defendant Jessie Gordon Whittlesey as administratrix of his estate, alleges, in substance: That on February 25, 1882, the plaintiffs and the defendants Warren C. Kimball and Moses A. Luce and said James S. Gordon, executed their promissory note for $10,000, payable to the order of the Consolidated Bank of San Diego six months after date, with interest, and that said bank afterwards indorsed said note to Bryant Howard. That plaintiff Ella S. Rogers signed said note at the request and for the accommodation of said Kimball, Luce, and Gordon. That on February 27, 1882, plaintiff Thomas L. Rogers conveyed and caused to be conveyed to said Luce, Kimball, and Gordon a one-fifth interest in and to a certain concession made by the Mexican government of the right to construct a railroad, to be known as the Sonora and Baja California Railroad; and that, in consideration of said conveyance, said Luce, Kimball, and Gordon executed and delivered an agreement in writing, of which the following is a copy: "We, the undersigned, for and in consideration of a conveyance to us, of even date herewith, of a one-fifth interest in and to the concession by the government of Mexico of the right to construct a railroad to be known as the Sonora and Baja California Railroad, do hereby assume all responsibility for the payment in full of a note of date February 25, A. D. 1882, made to the Consolidated Bank of San Diego, and signed by the undersigned, together with Thomas L. Rogers and Ella S. Rogers; hereby releasing from any payment thereon, as joint or several payors, the said Thomas L. Rogers and Ella S. Rogers, and hereby agreeing with the said Thomas L. Rogers and Ella S. Rogers to indemnify them in full for any loss or damage they may in any manner sustain on account of said note. Witness our hands, this 27th day of February, A. D. 1882. Warren C. Kimball. James S. Gordon. Moses A. Luce,"—and thereby agreed to and did release the plaintiffs from said note. That the said defendants and the said Gordon have paid no part of said note, except the sum of $3,333.33 paid by said Kimball. That said Howard, to whom said note has been transferred by the bank, on the 15th day of May, 1886, brought suit thereon against the plaintiffs herein, Thomas L. Rogers and Ella S. Rogers, and obtained judgment against them on the 14th day of March, 1889, for the sum of $7,019 damages and $63.12 costs. That on February 20, 1893, an execution thereon was issued; and on February 24, 1893, the plaintiff Ella S. Rogers paid out of her separate property, in full satisfaction of said judgment and execution, the sum of $7,100. That the plaintiffs are husband and wife. That Ella S. Rogers has demanded payment from the defendants of said sum, but no part of it has been paid, and judgment therefor in her favor is demanded. The defendants Moses A. Luce and Jessie Gordon Whittlesey filed a joint answer, in which they deny that Mrs. Rogers signed said note for their accommodation or at their request, and allege that defendants signed said note at the request and for the benefit of plaintiffs; deny that Thomas L. Rogers conveyed, or caused to be conveyed, said concession, or that in consideration of such conveyance they executed the agreement of indemnity set out in the complaint; deny, for want of information, the allegations touching the judgment and execution and its satisfaction. For a second defense, they allege that, at the time they executed said indemnity agreement, Thomas L. Rogers agreed to convey to Kimball, Luce, and Gordon a one-fifth interest in said concession, and that said agreement to convey said interest was the consideration for the execution of the indemnity agreement by Kimball, Luce, and Gordon, and that Rogers never did convey, or cause to be conveyed, said interest; and, upon information and belief, allege that Rogers never had or owned or could convey any interest in said concession, whereby the consideration for their execution of the indemnity agreement wholly failed; and aver that they received no consideration whatever for the execution of said agreement. They also pleaded that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Defendant Kimball answered separately, making substantially the same defense, so far as material to be considered, as that made by his co-defendants. The court found that the plaintiff Ella S. Rogers did not sign the note for the accommodation and at the request of the defendants, or either of them, but that she and the defendants signed at the request of the plaintiff Thomas L. Rogers; that said T. L. Rogers thereafter promised and agreed to convey, and cause to be conveyed, a one-fifth interest in the Mexican concession, and upon this consideration, and no other, the defendants executed the agreement sued upon, and that the plaintiff Thomas L. Rogers did not convey, or cause to be conveyed, said interest; that the plaintiffs did not, nor did either of them, pay or give any consideration whatever for the execution of said instrument; and it further found that prior to the 19th day of January, 1889, the note was fully paid and discharged. Upon these findings, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants.

The appeal is based upon the one ground that the findings are not sustained by the evidence. Several of the findings are attacked by the specifications, but the material question in the case is whether the evidence warrants the finding of a failure or want of consideration for the contract sued on, since, if it does, the judgment must stand. It is against this finding that the main effort of appellants is directed; but the assault proceeds upon lines largely, if not wholly, at variance with the case made by the complaint, and which the defendants were called upon to meet. It is contended that the evidence shows without conflict that the plaintiff Ella S. Rogers was induced to sign the note in question by the promise of Luce, Kimball, and Gordon to thereafter sign the indemnity agreement, and thereby hold her harmless from liability on the note; that this promise was a valuable consideration moving between her and the defendants, and that it is therefore immaterial, as to her rights in the premises, whether the consideration for the contract, as between her husband and defendants, failed or not; that, when defendants executed the contract of indemnity, they became liable upon the original promise, and are now estopped to deny that her signature to the note was given for a valid and binding consideration. Not only is this proposition not in line with the theory of the plaintiffs' case as made by the complaint, but it rests for its foundation upon the assumption of appellants that the evidence of Ella S. Rogers, as to the circumstances under which she signed the note and the causes inducing her thereto, stands uncontradicted, which very clearly appears from the evidence in the record is not the fact. Mrs. Rogers testified upon this point as follows: "The circumstances under which I signed the note of February 25, 1882, were as follows: Mr. Rogers told me that the defendants wished to borrow $10,000 of the bank, and the bank would let them have the money if we would sign the note, and that the defendants would give us an agreement of indemnity. Upon this security I was willing and did sign the note at the request of Mr. Rogers, and for the accommodation of the defendants, as I have stated. None of the defendants signed at my request or as sureties for me. I knew nothing of the conveyance of the concession. I know nothing of the signing of the agreement or the conveyance of the concession. I saw the agreement after it was signed, and am positive that I saw the agreement of indemnification before I signed the note, but it was not then signed by the defendants. I was told that it would be signed by them if I signed the note. That is all I know about it." This was the sum and substance of Mrs. Rogers' testimony. The evidence on behalf of the defendants, however, was positive to the fact that Luce, Kimball, and Gordon signed the note only for the accommodation of Thomas L. Rogers, and that the question of defendants taking an interest in the Mexican concession was never suggested or broached at all until a day or so subsequent to the execution of the note. If this was so, it tended directly to negative the testimony of Mrs. Rogers. If the sale of the interest in that concession had not been proposed at the time she signed the note, the inference would be inevitable that the indemnity agreement had not at that time been drawn or thought of, since that instrument recites and the complaint alleges that the only consideration for its execution was the conveyance of such interest; and, if the agreement had not been then drafted or thought of, it could not, as stated by Mrs. Rogers, have been exhibited to her before or at the time she signed the note; nor, in the nature of things, could it be at all probable that her signature to the note was induced by the promise that such an instrument would be given. Moreover, her evidence is at variance with the allegations of her complaint, and with the recitals of the instrument itself, which latter refers to the note as executed two days before, and as signed by Ella S. Rogers. It cannot be said, therefore, that the evidence of Mrs. Rogers as to the considerations which induced her to sign the note was uncontradicted, and that the court was bound to find in accordance with it. Under the evidence the court was fully justified in finding that there was no consideration moving the defendants to the giving of the indemnity, other than the agreement of Thomas L. Rogers to convey an interest in said concession. This also answers the further proposition that the agreement operated a novation of parties, by which Mrs. Rogers took Luce, Kimball, and Gordon as principals upon the note in place of her husband, since this proposition is rested upon the same contention that she signed the note with the understanding that the agreement would be executed.

It is further advanced that the only right the defendants had upon the failure of Thomas L. Rogers to make the stipulated conveyance was that of rescission; that this right was one to be exercised promptly; and that by their failure to so exercise it, they are deemed to have waived the making of the conveyance, and are estopped, at least as against the plaintiff Ella, to urge a want of consideration on that ground. But it is a sufficient answer to this proposition to say that no such case is made by the pleadings. No estoppel is pleaded, but it is alleged that the conveyance was in fact made, and the terms of the contract thereby fulfilled. Plaintiffs were bound to establish their case as alleged; or if the evidence showed a state of facts not pleaded, and yet authorizing a recovery, they should have asked leave to amend and conform their pleading to the facts. They failed to do either the one or the other, and, the evidence not warranting a recovery under the facts averred, the findings against them will not be disturbed because, upon some different state of the pleadings, plaintiffs might have been entitled to recover. Mondran v. Goux, 51 Cal. 151; Bryan v. Tormey, 84 Cal. 126, 24 Pac. 319.

It is said the contract does not by its terms contemplate any further conveyance than that recited therein, and that it appears from the evidence that the defendants got all they contracted for, and never expected any further conveyance. The first part of this proposition involves a construction of the contract which it will not bear, and which the parties themselves never gave it. The second is answered against appellants by the findings of the court, based upon evidence which we deem substantially conflicting.

The proposition that the contract sued on constituted a release of the plaintiffs from their obligation on the note, and, being in writing, was good without further consideration, under section 1541 of the Civil Code, is untenable. The provision of that section making a release in writing of an obligation valid and binding without a new consideration therefor has application only to instruments which by their terms purport to be formal releases, and does not include instruments or contracts which might operate as such indirectly, but which upon their face purport to give a right upon which an affirmative action would lie. Construing this section in Canal Co. v. Roach, 78 Cal. 552, 21 Pac. 304, this court said: "The want of consideration is not obviated by section 1541 of the Civil Code. That section provides that 'an obligation is extinguished by a release thereof given to the debtor by the creditor upon a new consideration, or in writing, with or without new consideration.' We think that this provision applies to express releases, given with intent to extinguish the obligation, and not to things which might have that result in a roundabout way. In dispensing with a consideration, the legislature dispensed with the substance of the transaction. And we do not think it ought to be assumed, in the absence of language to that effect, that the intention was to dispense with both form and substance."

We do not deem it necessary to notice the other points discussed. We are satisfied that there was evidence tending substantially to sustain the finding of a failure of consideration for the contract sued on, and this conclusion renders the other questions immaterial. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; TEMPLE, J.; McFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur. The action is founded, not upon a release, but upon a contract to indemnify; and there can be no recovery upon such a contract when it appears that there has been no performance, or offer to perform, of the promise which was the sole consideration of the agreement to indemnify.

HERBERT v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (Sac. 339.)<sup>1</sup>

NEGLIGENCE—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING.

1. Negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence.

2. If one might have seen or heard an approaching train by looking or listening, the fact of his injury raises a presumption that he did not take the required precautions.

3. Plaintiff, after residing four years within 200 feet of a railroad crossing, which was quite near a cut 15 feet deep and 600 feet long, while at a station about 1,000 yards from the crossing, saw there a freight train, as he was starting for home, that he knew was waiting to meet a passenger train. The road which he traveled to reach his home passes near the railroad until within about 450 feet of the crossing, from which point it winds around a hill. When about 800 feet from the station, he met the passenger train; and, when more than 1,000 feet from the crossing, he heard the whistle of the freight engine, indicating that it had started. He could see nothing of the train when he turned to go around the hill, but was unable to see the track within 1,300 feet of the station. He knew that the grade was steep from the station to the crossing, and for that reason steam would be cut off, and the train come down in comparative silence. Held, that plaintiff's injuries at the crossing by coming into collision with the freight train were caused by his contributory negligence, although the whistle was not sounded nor the bell rung.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Placer county.

Action by T. L. Herbert against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. M. Fulweiler, for appellant. Tabor & Tabor, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Action for damages for personal injuries resulting from a collision with a west-bound train of defendant at a private crossing about one-half mile west of Penryn. Plaintiff recovered a verdict for $5,000. The appeal is from the judgment and from a refusal of a new trial.

It is contended on this appeal that upon plaintiff's own testimony, and conceding to him all disputed points in the evidence, and also that defendant was guilty of such negligence that it would be liable if plaintiff were not also in fault, it must be held as matter of law that plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence that he cannot recover. The rule is that negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence. This proposition has been frequently declared by this court. Fernandes v. Case, 52 Cal. 45; McKeever's Case, 59 Cal. 294; Chedster's Case, 59 Cal. 197; House v. Meyer, 100 Cal. 592, 35 Pac. 308. The rule is general, and appellant presents a very long list of cases in which the rule has been stated. The effect of all is the same. If but one conclusion can reasonably be reached from the evidence, it is a question of law for the court; but if one sensible and impartial man might decide that the plaintiff had exercised ordinary care, and another equally sensible and impartial man that he had not exercised such care, it must be left to the jury. McKune v. Lumber Co., 110 Cal. 480, 42 Pac. 980. Our ideas as to what would be proper care vary according to temperament, knowledge, and experience. A party should not be held to the peculiar notions of the judge as to what would be ordinary care. That only can be regarded as a standard or rule which would be recognized or enforced by all learned and conscientious judges, or could be formulated into a rule. In the nature of things, no such common standard can be reached in cases of negligence, where reasonable men can reach opposite conclusions upon the facts. In such cases it was said in Mann v. Stock-Yard Co., 128 Ind. 138, 26 N. E. 819: "It is said to be the highest effort of the law to obtain the judgment of 12 men of the average of the community, comprising men of learning, men of little education, men whose learning consists only of what they have themselves seen and heard, the merchant, mechanic, the farmer, and laborer, as to whether negligence does or does not exist in the given case." But the cases arising from injuries suffered at railroad crossings have been so numerous, and upon certain points there has been such absolute accord, that what will constitute ordinary care in such a case had been precisely defined; and, if any element is wanting, the courts will hold, as matter of law, that the plaintiff has been guilty of negligence. And, when injury results which might have been avoided by the use of proper care, the plaintiff cannot recover, although the defendant has also been guilty of negligence. In this special case the amount of care as well as the nature of it has been settled. The railroad track of a steam railway must itself be regarded as a sign of danger, and one intending to cross must avail himself of every opportunity to look and to listen for approaching trains. What he must do in such a case will depend upon circumstances. If the view of the track is obstructed, he should take greater pains to listen. If, taking these precautions, he would have seen or heard the approaching train, the very fact of injury will raise a presumption that he did not take the required precautions.

In this case the plaintiff knew that the train was near. He had resided for four years within 200 feet of the crossing where he was injured. Immediately before reaching the crossing, the track passes through a cut, some 15 feet deep, for a distance of between 600 and 700 feet. Plaintiff saw the freight train at Penryn before he started home, and knew it was waiting there for the eastern-bound passenger train. From Penryn it is 1,630 feet to the whistling post, and 1,320 feet from the post to the crossing. It is a steep down grade of about 115 feet to the mile, and the train passes down by gravity, controlled by the brakes. The road passes near the railroad until about 450 feet from the crossing, from which, as plaintiff testified, it meanders around a hill. When plaintiff was about halfway to the whistling post, he met an eastern-bound train; and, when from 15 to 20 rods below the whistling post, he heard the "toot" which indicated that the freight train had started. At that time he was certainly more than 1,000 feet from the crossing, measured along the railroad track. He proceeded along until within about 450 feet of the crossing, looking all the time for the train. At that point he could see about 300 feet above the whistling post, and the train was not in sight. From that place he turned to go down and around the hill, and lost sight of the track. He proceeded at the rate of from six to seven miles an hour, until within about three rods, whence he proceeded on a walk to the crossing. He could see from the eminence from whence he had the last sight of the track that at that time the train was not within 1,620 feet of the crossing, and would have to make that distance while he was going 450 feet; that is, he would have known these facts had he known the precise distances, and these he did not know. He could only estimate. Nor did he know how rapidly the train would move. The engine driver thought he did move at about the rate of 12 miles an hour, but plaintiff could not know that it was not moving at a rate exceeding 20 miles an hour. Had the distances been known and also the speed of the train, it would have been a nice calculation to determine which could reach the crossing first. As a matter of fact, they reached there at about the same time, though plaintiff might have escaped "by the skin of his teeth" had not his horse, startled by the sudden appearance of the engine, stopped at the track.

Now, if the plaintiff had the train in mind, as he says he did, he knew that it was at hand, and could not be more than a few seconds away, and might be, as the event proved. It was a most reckless race with death, and, if it does not present a case free from doubt, such a case cannot be imagined.

Plaintiff must have been more than 1,000 feet from the crossing when he heard the signal that the train had started. He was familiar with the running of the train. When the signal referred to was given, the train was already out of the siding, on the main track, and the switch had been adjusted. The distance from the siding to the crossing, by actual measurement, was 2,980 feet. He knew the train came down more silently because of the steep grade, where no use of steam was required. It passed through the deep cut, where the sound would be deadened. One of the plaintiff's witnesses described how startlingly it appeared at the crossing, as though it came out of the ground. He had, at the best, but to wait a few seconds to let the train pass. Under such circumstances, to attempt to anticipate the train was almost an act of madness. The only answer to this is that defendant's employes did not ring the bell or sound the whistle, and that the fireman was not at his place, on the left side of the engine. The argument, of course, is that, if the signals had been given, plaintiff might have heard, and, not hearing them, he had the right to assume, when about to make the crossing, that the train had not then reached the whistling post 1,320 feet above, and that the fireman might have seen him in time to have prevented the accident had he been upon the lookout. It may be admitted that all this was culpable negligence on the part of defendant's employes. The defense of contributory negligence implies that defendant may have been guilty of such negligence as would justify a recovery by the plaintiff if he were not also in fault. This is no argument, therefore, against the position of the defendant.

The case is not within the rule laid down in Esrey v. Southern Pac. Co., 103 Cal. 541, 37 Pac. 500. Doubtless, notwithstanding the negligence of a plaintiff has put him in peril, yet if his danger is perceived by the defendant in time, so that by the exercise of ordinary diligence on his part injury can be avoided, the defendant will be held for the injury. But that is based upon the fact that a defendant did actually know of the danger; not upon the proposition that he would have discovered the peril of the plaintiff, but for remissness on his part. Under this rule, a defendant is not liable because he ought to have known. The judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

SPENCE v. SMITH, Sheriff. (Sac. 290.)<sup>1</sup>

EXEMPTIONS—FARMING UTENSILS—USE FOR HIRE —EFFECT.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 690, cl. 3, exempting farming utensils and implements of husbandry from execution, exempts all the farming implements of the judgment debtor, regardless of their value, or the amount of land which may be cultivated therewith.

2. The fact that a judgment debtor, after threshing his own crop, used his machinery to thresh the crops of others, for hire, did not render such machinery, otherwise exempt, subject to levy and sale on execution.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sutter county.

Action by one Spence against one Smith, sheriff of Sutter county. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. V. Reardon, for appellant. Richard Belcher, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant, as sheriff of the county of Sutter, levied upon certain personal property under a writ of attachment issued out of the superior court in an action therein against the plaintiff, and afterwards sold the property under a writ of execution issued upon a judgment in said action. After the property had been seized by the defendant, the plaintiff demanded the same from him, upon the ground that it was exempt from execution, and, upon the refusal of the defendant to surrender it, brought the present action. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendant. From this judgment the present appeal has been taken, and is presented here upon the judgment roll alone, without a bill of exceptions, and is urged upon the ground that the findings of fact do not support the judgment.

At the time the defendant seized the property described in the judgment, he also took certain other property, consisting of farming utensils, which, upon the plaintiff's claim that they were exempt from seizure, he released and returned to him. The court finds that the property so released was sufficient in quantity and kind to properly cultivate and farm more than 200 acres of land. The court also finds that at the time the property was taken the plaintiff was engaged in farming about 2,700 acres of land, and that all of the property levied upon and seized by the defendant was necessary to enable him to properly carry on his said farming operations upon said 2,700 acres; and it also finds that, with the exception of the harnesses, collars, three headers, five header beds, the plows, stretchers, harrows, and blacksmith tools, all of the property involved herein were parts of a threshing outfit owned by the plaintiff, and is of the value of $460, and that the other property is of the value of $190. Whether any property shall be exempt from execution, as well as the character and amount of property to be exempted, is purely a question of legislative policy; and, when the legislature has determined that the farming utensils and implements of husbandry of a judgment debtor shall be exempt, a court is not authorized to refuse the exemption because, in its opinion, they are not necessary for the judgment debtor. The state has fixed no limit to the amount of land which a judgment debtor may cultivate by farming; and, if the farming utensils which he has are necessary for the proper cultivation of his land, they are exempt from execution, irrespective of whether he would need them for cultivating a smaller tract. Code Civ. Proc. § 690, cl. 3, provides that "the farming utensils or implements of husbandry of the judgment debtor" are exempt from execution. In Re Klemp's Estate (Cal.) 50 Pac. 1062, it was held that this exemption included a combined harvester which was worth $300. In that case it was said: "Horse rakes, gang plows, headers, threshing machines, and combined harvesters are as clearly implements of husbandry as are hand rakes, single plows, sickles, cradles, flails, or an old-fashioned machine for winnowing. There is no ground for excluding an implement from the operation of the statute because it is an improvement, and supplants a former implement used with less effectiveness for the same purpose;" and as the legislature had not placed any limitation upon the character of the implements of husbandry, or their value, courts have no right to exclude them from the operation of the statute.

The threshing outfit did not cease to be exempt from execution by reason of the fact that it was usually the custom for the plaintiff to use it, for hire, to thresh the crops of others, after doing his own threshing. At the time the property was seized, it was in use by the plaintiff, and the court finds that all of it was necessary for his use in farming his land. In Re Baldwin, 71 Cal. 74, 12 Pac. 44, it was held that the legislature meant by the foregoing exemption such utensils or implements as are needed and used by the farmer in conducting his own farming operations; and in Stanton v. French, 91 Cal. 277, 27 Pac. 657, it was held that the debtor is not required to use the exempt property exclusively in his customary vocation. It would be a hard rule upon the debtor to hold that, although the property was necessary for properly carrying on his farming, he would forfeit the exemption should he seek to earn something with it after he had ceased to need it for his own farming. A better suggestion would be that if, in the opinion of the creditor, he is cultivating more land than he needs, he could satisfy his debt by levying his execution upon the land itself. The judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter judgment

WATER COURSES — OBSTRUCTION — POLLUTION — TAILINGS FROM MINES — PLEADING — VARIANCE — DECREE — APPEAL.

1. The complaint described a mining claim as "the island." The findings of fact described it by metes and bounds. The evidence taken at the trial was not before the supreme court. Held that, as both descriptions might cover the same tract, no variance was shown.

2. Under a cross complaint seeking to restrain plaintiffs from the improper use of a creek, in covering the dumping ground of defendants with debris in the nature of tailings, the right of plaintiffs to carry water over their claim and into the creek is not presented, and cannot be litigated.

3. Under a complaint seeking to enjoin defendants from placing a dam in a creek, and a cross complaint seeking to restrain plaintiffs from the improper use of the creek, in covering the dumping ground of defendants with debris in the nature of tailings, the court cannot prescribe in its decree the line of conduct to be followed by the parties as to the manner of dealing with the tailings of their respective mines,—as to the use of the creek, and the pro rata expense of keeping it in condition for the purpose of carrying off the tailings of the mines.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county.

Bill by one Eastlick and others against one Wright and others. There was a decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Modified.

J. F. Farragher and J. H. Magoffey, for appellants. Gillis & Tappscott, J. A. Reynolds, Warren & Taylor, and G. D. Butler, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action brought to enjoin the defendants from placing a dam in the water way known as "Oro Fino Creek," and for damages occasioned by such obstruction. Defendants made denials of the allegations of the complaint, and also filed a cross complaint, asking for an order restraining plaintiffs from the improper use of Oro Fino creek, in covering the dumping ground of defendants with debris in the nature of tailings. Judgment went for plaintiffs, and this case is before us on the pleadings, findings of fact, and judgment.

A certain mining claim of plaintiffs is described in the complaint as "the island." The finding of fact made by the trial court describes a certain piece and parcel of mining ground owned by plaintiffs, by metes and bounds. Appellants now insist that there is a variance between the pleading and the finding as to the particular tract of mineral ground covered by these descriptions. Upon inspection of the two descriptions, no variance is apparent. Both descriptions may cover the same tract. There is nothing inconsistent in the two to prevent it. The evidence taken at the trial is not before us, and upon the face of the pleading and of the finding no variance is shown. Error, to invalidate the judgment, cannot be presumed.

Objection is made by appellants to a finding of fact to the effect "that plaintiffs ran, without the consent of defendants, about three hundred inches of water from the Samuel R. Gardner mining claim, after Gardner's use of the water, through plaintiffs' flumes, and into the water way of Oro Fino creek." This finding of fact is possibly outside of the material issues in the case. By their cross complaint, appellants make complaint of the tailings and debris plaintiffs were dumping upon their ground. That is the issue upon which they sought relief. Water is not tailings and debris, and the right of plaintiffs to pass this 300 inches of water over their claim and into Oro Fino creek is not presented by the pleadings as a cause of action. Defendants, by their brief, insist that such act of plaintiffs amounts to a substantial increase of the servitude resting upon their lands; but, as suggested, the character and nature of the servitude resting upon their lands in favor of plaintiffs is not the subject-matter of the litigation, and is outside the pleadings. Especially must this be so as to any mere question pertaining to the amount of water passing from plaintiffs' land into the Oro Fino creek. By this judgment the trial court gave the plaintiffs the relief sought, and denied defendants the relief asked by their cross complaint. The court did not stop here, but proceeded to prescribe the line of conduct to be followed in the future by all parties to the litigation as to the manner of dealing with the tailings of their respective mines, and as to the use of Oro Fino creek, and the pro rata expense of keeping that creek in condition for the purpose of carrying off the tailings of these mines. Those matters are not involved in the litigation. No such relief is sought by the pleadings. All those directions and decrees set out in the judgment, embraced in folios 251 to 254 inclusive, as appears by the transcript, are stricken therefrom, and the judgment is modified to that extent. As so modified, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

COLUSA COUNTY v. SEUBE. (Sac. 274.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—LICENSE—VALIDITY—CONSTRUCTION.

The taxing clause of a county ordinance provided that every person who should sell intoxicating liquors in quantities less than one quart should obtain a license, and pay therefor

$100 per year. Held, that since this clause did not impose a license for carrying on the business of selling liquor, as authorized by St. 1893, p. 358, but imposed it for the simple act of selling, and applied to each sale before it was made, it could not be changed by implication from the wording of other sections of the ordinance, which suggested an intention to tax the business itself.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county.

Action by Colusa county against B. Seube. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. G. Dyas and B. F. Howard, for appellant. Ernest Weyand, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to recover a license tax for carrying on "the business of selling liquors at retail, in quantities less than one quart, at a saloon in Colusa county." Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant appeals. It was stipulated as fact "that the defendant did, from the 5th day of November, 1895, to the — day of December, 1895, carry on a business of selling liquors at retail, and did sell spirituous * * * liquors, in quantities of less than one quart, * * * as in said complaint alleged." Section 4 of the ordinance, under which the action is brought, reads: "Every person who sells spirituous, malt or fermented liquors or wines, in quantities less than one quart, must obtain a license and pay therefor one hundred dollars per year." Section 14 of the ordinance provided as follows: "Against any person required to take out a license, who fails or refuses to take out such a license, or who carries on business without such license, suit may be brought * * * for the recovery of said license tax," etc. This ordinance was enacted by authority of subdivision 27 of section 25 of the county government act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 358), which gives to boards of supervisors power "to license, for purposes of regulation and revenue, all and every kinds of business not prohibited by law," etc.; "to fix the rates of license tax upon the same." A similar ordinance was the subject of construction in Merced Co. v. Helm, 102 Cal. 159, 36 Pac. 399, and so also was the extent of the authority given by the county government act of 1891 (the same as that of 1893) to pass the ordinance clearly defined. It was held in that case that the right to impose a tax upon a "business" will not authorize imposing a tax upon the individual acts connected with such business; and that a license tax required for one business cannot be demanded for any act or business not specified in the ordinance providing for such taxes. The distinction between a single act (such as selling liquors), and the business in which the act is done (such as being engaged in the business of selling liquor) was pointed out, and the adjudged cases cited; and it was clearly shown that the ordinance did not purport to impose a tax for carrying on the business, but was for the sale, and applied to each sale before it was made, fixing a liability for the full amount of the tax for a single sale.

There is no brief on file for the respondent, and we have no intimation as to what its reply is to the claim of appellant based upon the Merced County Case, supra, except as it is found in the opinion of the learned trial judge, which appears in the transcript, given on overruling appellant's demurrer. It is there conceded that the Merced County Case is decisive of this case, unless we can resort to other sections of the ordinance to ascertain the meaning of section 4, supra. But it was said in the Merced County Case referred to: "The other portions of the ordinance providing a procedure for the collection of the tax cannot be invoked to change the terms of the tax, as the tax itself is only that which is fixed in the twelfth [here the fourth] section." Section 8 of the ordinance requires that "no license shall be issued for the sale of liquors * * * until the applicant shall have presented to and filed with the board * * * a bond * * * conditioned that the said applicant shall conduct the business in a quiet and orderly manner"; further, "that no license shall be issued to any person * * * to transact business * * * under section 4 until they have first filed a petition signed by not less than five freeholders, asking that a license be issued to the applicant, and shall state the place at which said business is to be carried on." Other sections of like import are cited. It was the presence of these provisions in other portions of the ordinance which led the trial judge to conclude that "it is quite plain that it is the business, as contradistinguished from the simple act of selling, for which the license is required." If this conclusion might be held correct as to an ordinance in its nature remedial, it is not correct here where the ordinance is "to be construed strictly in favor of the individual as against the state," as was held to be the rule in the Merced County Case. It was said in that case that "no presumption is to be indulged in favor of the right to take the property, or of any intention that is not distinctly so expressed in the statute under which it is sought to be taken." Again: "A tax can never be extended by construction to things not named or described in the statute as the subject of taxation." Quoting from Lord Cairns in Partington v. Attorney General, L. R. 4 H. L. 125, it is further said: "If there be admissible in any statute what is called an equitable 'construction,' certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute." We do not think the taxing section of the ordinance can be aided by resort to other of its sections which do no more than, by implication, to suggest that an intention to tax the business of selling liquor, and not the selling merely, was in the minds of the board. We think the reasoning in the Merced County Case is conclusive of this case, and therefore advise that the judgment be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed.

EADS v. KESSLER. (L. A. 410.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 22, 1898.)

SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY - LIEN FOR PRICE.

Civ. Code, § 5, declares that "the provisions of this Code so far as they are substantially the same as existing statutes or the common law must be construed as continuations thereof." Section 3049 provides that "one who sells personal property has a special lien thereon, dependent upon possession, for its price." Held, that section 3049 was merely confirmative of the common-law rule, and that the lien contemplated therein existed only under a complete sale, which passed title to the property, and did not attach when there was a mere executory contract to sell upon compliance with certain conditions by the party proposing to buy.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by James M. Eads against William J. Kessler, aided by attachment. From an order denying a motion to discharge the attachment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Del Valle & Munday, for appellant. Wm. T. Craig, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order of the court below denying a motion to discharge an attachment. The motion was based solely upon the ground that the respondent had a lien for the payment of the money sued for in the action, and that, therefore, the attachment was improperly issued. The facts are these: On the 28th of December, 1895, the parties entered into an executory written contract, by which the respondent agreed to sell, and the appellant agreed to buy, a two-fifths interest in certain patent rights, described in certain letters patent set forth in the contract. The price was $6,000, a part of which was to be paid in cash, and the balance in two payments of $1,900 each, on the 1st day of January, 1897, and on the 1st day of January, 1898, with interest, etc., and upon the making of said payments the respondent was to give to appellant a good and sufficient assignment and conveyance of said patent rights. The installment due on January 1, 1897, not having been paid, this action was commenced to recover the amount thereof, and a writ of attachment was issued and levied.

Appellant contends that the writ of attachment was issued improperly, and should be discharged, because the respondent had a vendor's lien upon the patent rights to secure the payment of the money sued for. He rests his contention upon the provision of section 3049 of the Civil Code, that "one who sells personal property has a special lien thereon, dependent upon possession, for its price," etc. But that section contains nothing which changes the common-law rule upon the subject. It was a mere statement, in a convenient form, of what the common law is. The Code declares that "the provisions of this Code, so far as they are substantially the same as existing statutes or the common law, must be construed as continuations thereof." Id. § 5. And the common law is that a lien such as is contended for in the case at bar exists only under a complete sale which passes the title to the property. Such a lien does not attach when there is a mere executory contract to sell upon compliance with certain conditions by the party proposing to buy. In Tied. Sales, § 119, it is said, "In order that a vendor of goods may claim a lien on the goods, they must have already become the property of the vendee, for one cannot have a lien on goods belonging to himself;" and, further, "The only cases in which the vendor can have a lien on the goods are those in which the title to the goods passes to the vendee without delivery of possession." In 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 602, 603, it is said, "The lien exists only when the property has passed to the buyer, while the goods themselves are still in the actual or constructive possession of the seller;" and the cases cited in the notes support the text. See, also, 1 Jones, Liens, § 820; Conrad v. Fisher, 37 Mo. App. 382. In the latter case the court say: "It should be observed that the existence of a vendor's lien always presupposes that the title to the goods has passed to the vendee, since it would be an incongruous conception that the vendor might have a lien upon his own goods." If it has been held that one who makes a written executory contract to sell his real property has a lien upon the property for the payment of the purchase money, it is because the other party to such a contract is held to have an equitable estate in the land; but we have been referred to no cases which hold that there is such a lien upon personal property where there is a mere agreement to sell. The authorities are the other way. This view makes it unnecessary to examine the other point made by respondent, namely, that a patent right is too intangible to be the subject of such a lien as appellant here asserts. The order appealed from is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Nicola Ferrea against Ellen A. Chabot, executrix, and others. From a judgment giving plaintiff partial relief, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellant. Hilborn & Hall, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This action is brought to recover damages for the alleged violation of a written contract entered into on the 3d day of February, 1870, between plaintiff and one A. Chabot, by which Chabot covenanted to supply the plaintiff with certain water for domestic and irrigating purposes. Chabot afterwards made a certain assignment and transfer to the Vallejo City Water Company, which is also made a party defendant; and it is admitted that the company is liable upon said contract to the same extent as Chabot. Chabot died during the pendency of the action, and Hiram Tubbs and Ellen A. Chabot, executor and executrix of his will, were substituted in his place as defendants. The court below made its findings and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages in the amount of $4,800 and costs, but without interest prior to the date of the judgment. Plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the amount of the judgment, and claiming that it should have been for a larger amount, appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Counsel for appellant have in their brief presented their side of the case in a very systematic, clear, and able manner; but, after having given full consideration to their arguments, we are not able to see any sufficient reasons for reversing the judgment. If we do not notice in detail all the views set forth by counsel for appellant, it is not because we have not fully considered them. The contentions for a reversal which are most fully presented in the argument of counsel are (1) that the court below "denied plaintiff's constitutional and statutory right to a trial by jury"; and (2) that the court erred "in refusing to allow interest upon our claim from the time of suit brought."

1. The trial of the case, which resulted in the judgment appealed from, took place in February, 1894, in department No. 4 of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, before Hon. J. C. B. Hebbard, judge of said court, sitting in said department. No demand for a jury was made at that time in said department or to said judge; and the appellant entered upon and proceeded throughout the trial without any intimation that he desired a jury. This was therefore a waiver of a jury, if we consider alone the occurrences which then took place. Pfister v. Dasey, 65 Cal. 403, 4 Pac. 393; Tunnel Co. v. McKenzie, 67 Cal. 485, 8 Pac. 22. It is contended, however, by appellant, that he is in the position of having had a

FERREA v. CHABOT et al. (S. F. 1,139.)<sup>1</sup>

JURY TRIAL—WAIVER—DENIAL OF RIGHT—INTEREST ON DAMAGES—IRRIGATION CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

1. It is a waiver of the right of trial by jury to try a case before the court without demanding a jury.

2. A stipulation waiving a trial by jury should, as a general rule, be set aside on application of a party, where it can be done without injury to the other side, and without causing inconvenience in the conduct of the business of the court.

3. The act of a judge of one department in denying a motion to set aside a stipulation waiving a trial by jury is not binding on the judge of another department before whom the case is subsequently tried, so as to entitle a party to claim that he has been deprived of a trial by jury when no application therefor was made to the second judge.

4. Civ. Code, § 3287, provides that one is entitled to recover interest on damages certain, or which can be made certain by calculation, from the day when the right to recover vested in him. Held, that interest prior to the judgment cannot be recovered for damages sustained by a failure to furnish water for irrigating and other purposes, such damages being unliquidated and uncertain.

5. An action for damages caused by failure to supply water for irrigating and other purposes is not changed in its character or in the nature of the damages by allowing as damages the rental value of the premises for a certain period.

6. A contract which recites that the second party is about to construct a reservoir on a certain creek, and that the first party "owns a certain piece of land," situated on that creek, and in which the second party agrees to supply the first party "with water for irrigation of his premises," is a contract to furnish water for irrigation only upon the property mentioned, the first party owning but one tract on the creek mentioned at the time the contract was executed.

jury trial denied him on account of certain things which happened more than a year previous to the trial before Judge Hebbard. It appears that on February 11, 1889, Henry C. Pike and P. O. Morbio were the attorneys of appellant, and on that day signed a stipulation waiving a jury trial. Prior to September 30, 1891, the present attorneys for appellant were substituted as his attorneys; and on that day they filed an amended and supplemental complaint. This complaint contains some averments which were not in the original complaint, the principal amendments being the averments which set up the death of Chabot, the presentation of the claim sued on to his executors, etc., and the additional fact that the alleged acts of the respondents in violation of said contract were done wantonly, oppressively, etc., and warranted punitive damages. Afterwards, on January 4, 1894, appellant made a motion to set aside the stipulation waiving a jury, and to place the cause on the jury calendar. This motion was made in department 5 of said court, and before a judge other than Judge Hebbard, and in department 5, and before the other judge, the motion to set aside the stipulation was denied. This motion was made more than a year before the commencement of the trial before Judge Hebbard, and it was denied more than 10 months before that time. The motion was based entirely upon the ground that the filing of the amended and supplemental complaint, and of the answer thereto, had raised issues not pending at the time the stipulation was made. We do not deem it necessary to determine definitely whether or not the judge of department 5 erred in refusing to set aside the stipulation. We think that, as a general rule, a party should be relieved from a stipulation waiving a jury where the same can be done without injury to the other side, and without disarranging the orderly conduct of the business of the court. Such a stipulation should not be looked upon as a contract made upon a valuable consideration, which ought not to be set aside except upon proof of fraud, mistake, etc. Still, the court has some discretion in the matter, and we are hardly justified in holding that the order of the judge of department 5 was a gross abuse of his discretion. But that order certainly did not prevent Judge Hebbard from allowing a jury, if one had been demanded prior to the commencement of the trial before him. The motion was made before the judge of department 5 upon one specific ground, namely, that there had been a material change in the issues of the case; and the judge of that department may reasonably have thought that the reason assigned for setting aside the stipulation was not tenable. Counsel for appellant now claim that the stipulation was, for other reasons assigned by them, void; and if, upon that ground, appellant had demanded a jury before Judge Hebbard, the latter would certainly not have been bound by the ruling made in another department a year previous. If the matter was one resting in the discretion of the judge, the discretion of Judge Hebbard was not concluded by a former exercise of discretion by another judge; and if, as it is also contended by appellant, the matter was not one of discretion, and he had an absolute right to a jury notwithstanding the stipulation, then, certainly, he should have made his application for a jury trial to the judge who was about to try the case. The allowance of a jury by Judge Hebbard would certainly not have been error. Indeed, the former motion to be relieved from the stipulation may have been really upon the ground of an objection to the judge presiding in that department, and there may not have been any objection at all to trying the case without a jury before Judge Hebbard. The record does not show any intimation at the time of the trial that the appellant desired a jury. Therefore, under these circumstances, we do not see that the appellant has been denied his right to a jury trial.

2. The court did not err in refusing to allow interest prior to the judgment. The action is to recover damages for the alleged violations by appellant of certain covenants expressed in the written contract hereinbefore mentioned. By that contract, Chabot covenanted that, in consideration of the grant by appellant of a right of way for water pipes through a certain piece of land owned by him, and of a right to construct a reservoir on a water course running through the land, he would lay certain pipes, and furnish to appellant from said reservoir, through such pipes, water for the irrigation of said land, the water to be delivered "as high on said premises as it will naturally flow," and to furnish water at the dwelling house for family use, and also to furnish water "for stock and family use" on certain other premises owned by respondent, and known as the "Riordan Ranch"; and it is for the violation of these covenants that this action was brought. It is averred in the complaint that the alleged violations of these covenants resulted in various kinds of damage not necessary to be here set forth; but it is evident from the complaint, and from the very nature of the subject-matter of the action, that the damages here sought to be recovered are not "damages certain or capable of being made certain by calculation," within the meaning of section 3287 of the Civil Code, and that, therefore, interest thereon cannot be recovered under the provisions of that section. The damages asked for here are in as pronounced a way "unliquidated and uncertain" as in any of the cases heretofore decided by this court where interest was not allowed because the damages were not certain or capable of being made certain by calculation. Brady v. Wilcoxson, 44 Cal. 239; Coburn v. Goodall, 72 Cal. 498, 14

Pac. 190; Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100; Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 311, 42 Pac. 811. And the fact that the court, after hearing a large amount of evidence bearing on various issues, finally concluded to allow as damages the rental value of the premises for a certain period, does not change the character of the action or the nature of the damages.

3. The other points made by appellant are based upon exceptions to rulings of the trial court upon the admissibility of evidence. Most of these exceptions are not well taken if the court correctly construed the contract as embracing only a certain 25-acre tract of land, known as the "Italian Garden." (There is no point made about the Riordan ranch, and it need not be further considered.) The contract commences with a recital that Chabot "is about to construct a reservoir on the Sulphur Spring creek," and that Ferrea, the appellant, "owns a certain piece of land on said Sulphur Spring creek at a point below where said reservoir is about to be constructed." Ferrea is the party of the first part, and Chabot the party of the second part, and the covenant on the part of Chabot to be construed is as follows: "The said party of the second part agrees to supply said party of the first part with water for irrigation of his premises, said water to be delivered on the premises of the said party of the first part through a four-inch pipe, and as high on the said premises as it will naturally flow, and also to supply the said party of the first part with the necessary water for family use in his dwelling house through a service pipe from the main pipe." At the time of the execution of the contract, which was on February 3, 1870, a certain 25-acre tract of land, known as the "Italian Garden," was the only land owned by Ferrea on the Sulphur Spring creek, and his dwelling house was on said tract. Afterwards he acquired another tract of 124 acres, adjoining the Italian Garden on the south. He afterwards leased to one Passalacqua the Italian Garden tract, and also 24 acres of the said 124-acre tract, making 49 acres in all included in the lease. Now, appellant contends that the failure of respondents to furnish water as provided in the contract worked damage to the 24 acres included in the lease, as well as to the Italian Garden tract itself, and that he is entitled to recover damages for the 24-acre tract, as well as for the other. The court held, however, that he was entitled to recover only for the damages which accrued to him as owner of the Italian Garden, and, in our opinion, this ruling was correct. This case was here once before upon appeal (Ferrea v. Chabot, 63 Cal. 564); and it was so held on that appeal. In that case the court, speaking of this contract, said: "In this the covenant was to supply Ferrea with water through a service pipe from the main pipe for family use, and through a four-inch pipe raised as high on the premises known as the 'Italian Garden' as the water would naturally flow, for the irrigation of those premises. The covenant was intended for the use and enjoyment of those premises, in the manner and for the purpose intended by the parties at the time of the execution of the agreement. It extended only to those premises, and did not include or operate upon the twenty-four acres of land of which Ferrea was not the owner." This ruling was clearly correct, and whether considered as the law of the case, or merely as authority, should be followed. The trial court was therefore right in excluding evidence offered for the purpose of showing damage to the 24-acre tract and to certain other tracts acquired by Ferrea after the date of the contract. The covenant of Chabot was not, as contended by appellant, to furnish a definite amount of water to be conducted by Ferrea wherever he pleased, but to furnish the amount of water necessary for the irrigation of the said Italian Garden, when water was required for such irrigation.

Both parties were allowed to freely introduce evidence as to the agricultural character of the Italian Garden, of the value of its use if supplied with water for irrigation, its rental value, etc.; and it was not error, at least not prejudicial error, to exclude certain offered evidence of its fee-simple value as land.

It would require great space to follow the discussion of counsel of the many other exceptions to rulings admitting or excluding evidence. It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the court did not err in its rulings excluding certain judgment rolls; or excluding evidence of appellant's asserted losses under his lease to Passalacqua, and of money expended in defending a suit brought by the latter against appellant on said lease; or excluding evidence of money expended by appellant to secure a small supply of water; or excluding certain evidence offered to prove malice and oppression on the part of the respondents; or in excluding evidence of certain other damages, entirely too remote to be recoverable; or allowing certain witnesses of respondents to testify as to the rental value of the premises; or in any other ruling touching the admissibility of evidence to which our attention has been called. The findings of the court as to the rental value of the land in question, and as to punitive damages, are sustained by the evidence; and the evidence does not show that the finding as to the amount of damages is erroneous. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE—ACCOUNT BOOKS—DECLARATIONS—PLEADING AND PROOF — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action involving the validity of a sale as against creditors, an instruction that a sale is void, under Civ. Code, § 3140, for want of delivery and an immediate and continued change of possession, was properly refused, where it contained the expression, "like the one in controversy here."

2. On an issue whether a sale of live stock on a ranch owned by the buyer was in fraud of creditors, where the seller had superintended the ranch, and at the time of the levy had a cropping contract which included a part of the land, books showing the condition of accounts between him and the buyer were properly allowed in evidence; the evidence otherwise showing that the books were kept under the direction of the seller, and that he delivered them to the buyer as showing the condition of their accounts.

3. Evidence of declarations of a seller that he had made the sale to protect his property against creditors is not admissible against the buyer.

4. An officer sued by a buyer for possession of property seized under attachment against the seller may prove that the sale was fraudulent as to creditors, under a denial of plaintiff's title and possession, and an allegation of title in the seller, in connection with a plea of justification.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by Mary H. Banning against W. F. Marleau. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. Dunnigan and J. R. Dupuy, for appellant. W. S. Wright, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover the possession of certain personal property, consisting mostly of live stock, which was on a ranch owned by the plaintiff. The jury found for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The defendant was a constable, and claimed the property under certain writs of attachment in favor of W. H. Harbell and P. Hardy against one Joseph Hannon; defendant claiming that the property in question was the property of said Hannon. The nature of the case, the principal facts in it, and some of the principles of law which should govern it, may be found in the opinion of this court delivered when the case was here upon a former appeal (Banning v. Marleau, 101 Cal. 238, 35 Pac. 772), and it is not necessary to restate them. The appellant contends for reversal on the ground that the court committed errors in instructing the jury, and in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence.

We do not think that the court committed any errors in instructing the jury. The instructions given on the part of the plaintiff were correct; and these instructions, together with those given at the request of appellant, presented the main features of the case correctly to the jury. The sixth instruction asked by defendant, with intent to apply section 3440 of the Civil Code to this case, was properly refused by the court because it contained the expression, "like the one in controversy here."

The evidence which was admitted was sufficient to warrant the jury in holding that the plaintiff had established title to the property in question. The court did not err in allowing in evidence certain books which showed the condition of accounts between said Hannon and the respondent. There was sufficient evidence to show that the books were kept under the direction of Hannon, and that he delivered them to the respondent as showing the condition of the accounts between them in the business of conducting the ranch. The court did not err in refusing to allow appellant to prove by Harbell declarations of Hannon, made after the sale by the latter to respondent, to the effect that he made a bill of sale to protect his property against creditors, although the ground upon which respondent defends that ruling, to wit, that fraud had not been pleaded in the answer, is not tenable. We see no errors committed by the court, other than the one hereinafter mentioned.

The court, however, erred in excluding certain testimony given by Hannon at a former trial of the case; Hannon in the meantime having died. This excluded testimony was to the point that Hannon had transferred the property to the respondent, and given her a bill of sale thereof, for the purpose of hindering and defrauding his creditors; and it also tended in some degree to show that the respondent knew of this purpose when she took the bill of sale. The transcript does not show on what ground this testimony was rejected, but it appears from the argument of counsel that it was rejected because the answer of the appellant had not set up fraud. But the complaint merely sets up that plaintiff at the time of the commencement of the action was the owner of, and entitled to the possession of, the property, and that appellant had wrongfully come into the possession of the same, and unlawfully retained it. The answer denies the plaintiff's ownership of the property, or her right to its possession, and sets up that the property belonged to Hannon, and was lawfully taken by the defendant under the writs of attachment. The complaint does not show plaintiff's source of title, and that the appellant was not called upon to anticipate what that source of title was; and when, by her evidence, she sought to show title derived from Hannon, the appellant had the right, under the pleadings, to attack her title by showing that the sale from Hannon to her was fraudulent. Respondent's counsel cites in support of his contention on this point merely one case from the state of Oregon, that the decisions in California have been otherwise, and are clearly founded on the better reason. The case of Grum v. Barney, 55 Cal. 254, is exactly in point. The decision of the court in that case, delivered by McKinstry, J., is correctly expressed in the syllabus as follows: "In an action for the recovery of personal property, the complaint alleged ownership and a taking by defendant; and the defendant in his answer denied the ownership, and justified the taking under an execution issued to him as sheriff against one L. Held, that the defendant was not bound to anticipate the case of the plaintiff, or to assume that he claimed as vendee of L., and that the answer averred all that was necessary to make up the material issues." The same point was decided in the same way in the case of Humphreys v. Harkey, 55 Cal. 283, where the court, by Ross, J., said: "In the recent case of Grum v. Barney, 55 Cal. 254, we had occasion to consider the same question, and there held that the defendant was not bound to anticipate the case of the plaintiff, nor to assume under whom he claimed title. We are entirely satisfied of the correctness of that decision, and it results that the court below erred in the rejection of the proffered testimony." In the later case of Mason v. Vestal, 88 Cal. 396, 26 Pac. 213, the former decisions of the court are reviewed, and the law is declared to be as stated in the cases above cited. The opinion of the court in bank, delivered by Temple, C., is correctly condensed in the syllabus as follows: "A sheriff, sued for the value of property seized under a writ of attachment against the plaintiff's brother, need not plead that a sale to the plaintiff from the attachment debtor was fraudulent as to his creditors, but may prove that fact under a denial of the plaintiff's title and possession, and an allegation of title in the attachment debtor, in connection with a plea of justification under the writ." The cases of Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. 404, and Sukeforth v. Lord, 87 Cal. 399, 25 Pac. 497, may seem at first blush to indicate a different rule; but, as pointed out in Mason v. Vestal, the defendants in those cases had attempted to set up fraud, and the questions involved were merely whether or not the answers presented a sufficient statement of fraud; and the question whether or not, in a case like the one at bar, the defendant was called upon to anticipate the title of the plaintiff, and to attack that title by his answer, was not raised. Mason v. Vestal is the latest case on the question to which our attention has been called, and clearly establishes the law on the point involved. The ruling of the court below on this point being erroneous, and upon a material matter, the judgment must for that reason be reversed. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

TUSTIN FRUIT ASS'N v. EARL FRUIT CO.

(Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1898.)
AGENCY—FACTORS—GUARANTY—SALES—WARRANTY—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—CORPORATIONS.

1. Where an agent contracts directly as a principal, he may sue on the contract in his own name, regardless of whether the other party knew of his agency.

2. Plaintiff sued on a contract by which defendant agreed to sell plaintiff's fruit, and guaranty sales; alleging that plaintiff "sold and delivered" at a certain place a stated amount of fruit, which was picked, packed, and loaded "by plaintiff under the inspection and approval of the defendant, and was received, accepted, and receipted for by defendant at the prices mutually agreed upon by plaintiff and defendant for said fruit," and setting forth the amount unpaid from defendant to plaintiff for said fruit. Held, that the allegation, taken in connection with the contract, showed a sale by defendant, as a factor, for plaintiff, for which it was liable under its contract of guaranty.

3. A fruit company agreed with an association not to handle the fruit of those who were not members of the association, without its consent. The association, in an action against the company, alleged that under that provision in the contract the company had agreed to pay plaintiff a certain price for each box belonging to a certain fruit raiser, stating the number thereof; that defendant had begun to buy or ship the same; and that plaintiff was entitled to recover of defendant, "by reason of the agreement relating to the handling" of said fruit, a stated amount. Held, that the allegation was sufficient against a general demurrer, though it was not alleged that such fruit raiser was not a member of the association, or that defendant in fact "handled" his crop.

4. Where the contract sued on describes plaintiff as a corporation, no further proof of its incorporation is necessary.

5. An agreement by the stockholders of an association which recited that, "being desirous of having my oranges handled in the manner set forth in the by-laws" of the association, they individually appointed the association their agent, may be introduced in evidence, without the by-laws referred to, in an action by the association on a contract between it and a fruit company for the sale of fruit.

6. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1854, providing that "when a detached act, declaration, conversation, or writing is given in evidence, any other act, declaration, conversation, or writing, which is necessary to make it understood, may also be given in evidence," defendant may introduce plaintiff's by-laws, where plaintiff introduced an agreement between its stockholders and plaintiff which stated that, "being desirous of having my oranges handled in the manner set forth in the by-laws" of plaintiff, they individually appointed plaintiff their agent.

7. Under Civ. Code, § 2029, providing that "a factor who charges his principal with a guaranty commission upon a sale, thereby assumes absolutely to pay the price when it falls due, as if it were a debt of his own," and section 2794, providing that the obligation of a factor who undertakes, for a commission, to sell merchandise and guaranty the sale is original, and need not be in writing, a factor selling under a guaranty of sales becomes liable absolutely for the price, and a finding that it was the purchaser is immaterial error.

8. An association contracted with a fruit company to deliver No. 1 fruit, f. o. b., and the company was to guaranty the sale. The association also agreed to deliver to the company No. 2 fruit, f. o. b., the sale of which the company did not guaranty. The fruit was picked, graded, culled, and packed under the supervision of the company's agent, who receipted for it as "Sold, f. o. b."; and the company's president testified that, at the time of shipment, account sales were rendered the association by the company on the assumption that the fruit was No. 1 except where otherwise stated. Held, that a certain consignment, not shown to be within the exception, was accepted by the company as No. 1 fruit.

9. A fruit company contracted with an association to take from it No. 1 fruit, "guarantying original sales and collections; it being understood that all responsibility" of the association "ceases when said fruit is accepted" by the company on board cars. Held, that the company, having accepted fruit as No. 1 without any representations of the association touching its quality, was bound to account for that quality of fruit, although, through a latent defect, the fruit proved to be inferior.

10. Where a buyer refuses to accept perishable property under a contract, it is the right of the seller to sell it forthwith, so as to reduce his damages.

11. Civ. Code, § 3353, provides that in estimating damages the value of property to a seller is the price which he could have obtained in the market nearest to the place where the buyer should have accepted it, as soon after the breach of the contract as the buyer could, with reasonable diligence, have effected a resale. Held, that the value to a seller of fruit which a buyer refused to take is its value in the condition it was in when the owner could have sold it after the repudiation of the contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county.

Action by the Tustin Fruit Association against the Earl Fruit Company. From a judgment giving plaintiff partial relief, and from orders denying a new trial, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

Victor Montgomery and J. D. Pope, for plaintiff. M. L. Graff, Guy C. Earl, and J. G. Scarborough, for defendant.

BRITT, C. There are cross appeals in this case. The plaintiff's action is founded on a written contract executed by and between the parties now litigant, of which the more material portions are as follows: "This agreement, made and entered into at Tustin this 18th day of December, 1894, in duplicate, by and between the Tustin Fruit Association, a corporation, of Tustin, Orange county, California, party of the first part, and the Earl Fruit Company, a corporation, of Los Angeles, California, party of the second part, witnesseth: That the party of the first part hereby places all oranges under its control, or that may come under its control during the season of 1894-5, in the hands of the party of the second part, to market for their [its] account, on the terms and conditions hereinafter stated. Party of the second part to sell all No. 1 fruit of regular sizes, together with as many off sizes as are included in the standard car, as established by the Southern California fruit exchanges, f. o. b. Tustin, guarantying original sales and collections; it being understood that all responsibility of the party of the first part ceases when said fruit is accepted by the party of the second part on board cars at Tustin. Party of the second part to make best disposition possible of No. 2 fruit, and any accumulation of off sizes, on which it is understood no guaranty is made. The party of the first part agreeing to allow party of the second part a commission of twelve and one-half per cent. of the gross price for which the fruit is sold, f. o. b. Party of the second part to make cash payment for all guaranteed sales as fast as such shipments are made, or not later than the week after shipment, and cash settlement for all other sales as fast as account sales are rendered. Selling prices are to be mutually agreed upon Wednesday of each week, which prices will rule for the following week; it being understood and agreed that such selling price shall at no time exceed the prices which the Southern California fruit exchanges are selling equal grades of fruit during the same period. It is further understood and agreed that all orders taken, to not exceed twelve cars per week after March 13th, or more if accepted by the party of the first part, shall be protected and filled by the party of the first part. The party of the second part to furnish orders for at least (average) twelve car loads per week, when requested by party of the first part, after March 15th. Party of the second part to dispose of all seedlings and navels, hereby contracted, on or before May 15, 1895, and all other varieties of oranges on or before July 1, 1895, unless otherwise mutually agreed. Picking, grading, culling, and packing of fruit and loading of cars to be done by the party of the first part, and subject to the approval and inspection of the party of the second part. Party of the first part to pick and grade the fruit into grades substantially equivalent to the grades as determined and established by the Southern California fruit exchanges. Choice and standard grades of fruit, more particularly described, are as follows: Choice grade is to be bright, clean, juicy, and free from smut, scale, frost, and culls. 'Standard' grade, it is understood, will be somewhat smutty and scaly, but juicy, and free from frost and culls. Party of the second part further agrees not to handle the oranges of any grower of Tustin or Santa Ana who is not a member of the Tustin Fruit Association, except with the consent of the party of the first part."

In its complaint the plaintiff charged several breaches: First, that defendant failed to pay a balance of $4,059.78 due for 13 car loads of oranges received by it between March 3, and March 15, 1895; second, that defendant refused to accept 12 car loads of oranges at prices agreed on by the parties for the week following March 13, 1895, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $4,600; third, that defendant similarly refused to accept 12 car loads of oranges for the week following March 20, 1895, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $4,600; fourth, that after said March 20th defendant refused to agree with plaintiff on the prices of oranges, or to receive any fruit, or to furnish any order therefor, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $25,000; and, fifth, that defendant handled the crop of oranges belonging to one Wall, within the prohibition of the last clause of said contract, and failed to pay plaintiff for consent given thereto as it (defendant) had promised. A demurrer to the complaint interposed by defendant was overruled.

By its answer the defendant admitted the execution of the contract alleged, but denied most of the other allegations of the complaint. It also pleaded, at considerable length, several counterclaims: Firstly, that defendant, as agent of plaintiff, after the execution of said contract sold to various of its (defendant's) customers in the Eastern market 58 car loads of oranges as No. 1 fruit; that the same proved to be not No. 1 fruit, in that it developed a lack of good shipping and carrying qualities, and so arrived at the several places of destination of the cars at the East in bad condition, and that defendant sustained a loss of $3,110.54, in the excess of advances it made to plaintiff thereon above the sum realized for the fruit. The second counterclaim was founded on the same transactions as those described in the first, and claimed general damages in the sum of $50,000. Some particulars of the pleading will be stated when we come to consider the demurrer thereto, which was sustained by the court. As the ground of the third counterclaim, defendant set up a contract between the parties of date March 9, 1894, for marketing the oranges of plaintiff for the season then current. Such contract was quite similar in its main features to that of December 18, 1894, on which plaintiff sues. The classification of fruit in the earlier contract, however, was as choice and standard only; and defendant averred that thereunder it received and handled for plaintiff between March 10, 1894, and July 13, 1894, 147 car loads of oranges, believing the same to be choice, as defined in that contract; and, for reasons similar to those alleged in said first counterclaim,—the fruit proving to not be choice, and arriving in bad order in the Eastern market,—defendant alleged that it sustained a loss, in its advances of purchase price to plaintiff above returns from the fruit, amounting to $12,500.53. The fourth counterclaim, to which the court sustained a demurrer, bore a like relation to the foregoing third counterclaim that the second bore to the first, and alleged damage in the sum of $50,000 for detriment incidental to defendant's performance of the said contract of March 9, 1894. The fifth counterclaim was for a balance of $1,002.26 for goods, etc., sold by defendant to plaintiff about March 18, 1895.

After trial, the court made findings from which it concluded that defendant is liable to plaintiff in the sum of $4,059.78 for 13 car loads of oranges received by defendant under the contract of December 18, 1894, as alleged in the complaint (defendant's commissions, and a credit allowed by plaintiff for the value of the merchandise mentioned in the fifth counterclaim, having been first deducted); that defendant is further liable to plaintiff in the sum of $77 on account of oranges handled by defendant for said Wall; that for the several failures of defendant to receive oranges from plaintiff after March 15, 1895, pursuant to the contract of December 18, 1894, defendant is liable in nominal damages only, fixed at $3; and that defendant should take nothing by reason of its counterclaims. Judgment was entered accordingly. Each party moved for a new trial, and their respective motions were denied. We shall consider first the appeal of the defendant.

1. It is contended that plaintiff is not the real party interested in the relief it demands, and for that reason ought not to be permitted to maintain the action. This objection is taken on certain allegations of the complaint which, it is claimed, show that plaintiff was not the owner of the oranges that were the subject of the contract of December 18, 1894; that the stockholders of plaintiff, in their respective individual capacities, owned the various crops of oranges making up the aggregate with which plaintiff assumed to deal; and that plaintiff was merely their agent to market the same. Admitting that all these things appear from the complaint, it is yet not perceived why plaintiff may not sue. The defendant contracted directly with plaintiff as a principal, and in such a case the law allows the agent treated as a principal to sue in his own name on the contract, whether the fact of agency was or was not known to the other contracting party. 1 Chit. Pl. 8; Pom. Code Rem. §§ 141, 177; Mechem, Ag. § 755; Phillips v. Henshaw, 5 Cal. 509; Du Bois v. Perkins, 21 Or. 189, 27 Pac. 1044. It was averred in the complaint that plaintiff "sold and delivered on board cars at Tustin thirteen car loads of No. 1 fruit, * * * all of which fruit was picked, graded, culled, packed, and loaded on said cars by plaintiff under the inspection and approval of the defendant, and was received, accepted, and receipted for by defendant at the prices mutually agreed upon by plaintiff and defendant for said fruit"; that at such prices, less defendant's commissions, the amount unpaid from defendant to plaintiff for said 13 car loads is the sum of $4,059.78, etc. It is objected that these allegations are defective, in that, while alleging a sale by plaintiff, they do not show a purchase by defendant; that the contract provides that defendant shall sell the fruit, guarantying sales thereof; and that to aver that plaintiff sold the goods was to allege a violation of the contract by plaintiff. The criticism is not well founded. Understood in connection with the provisions of the contract, the averment showed a sale made through the instrumen-tality of defendant, as factor for the plaintiff, under such conditions that defendant's liability for the price, less its commissions, had attached pursuant to its contract of guaranty. So understood, it was not incorrect to say that plaintiff sold the goods.

Respecting Wall's crop of oranges, plaintiff alleged, in substance, that in virtue of the last clause of the contract the defendant agreed to pay plaintiff, in consideration of its consent, 5 cents for each box of Wall's crop—stated at 10,000 boxes—that defendant bought or shipped; that defendant "has commenced to buy or ship the same for said Wall, and that plaintiff is entitled to have and recover of and from the defendant, by reason of the agreement relating to the handling of said Wall's crop of oranges, the sum of five hundred dollars"; also, that defendant committed a breach of its contract, in not settling with plaintiff for the oranges shipped from the orchard of Wall at the rate of 5 cents per box. To these averments of the complaint defendant objects, mainly, that they fail to show that Wall was not a member of the Tustin Fruit Association, and also fail to show that defendant has in fact "handled" his crop. The allegations under view lack the precision which should characterize good pleading, but they show that defendant shipped—and thus handled—some of Wall's oranges, and that for plaintiff's consent to this proceeding defendant promised, "in virtue of the last clause of said contract," to pay a stated sum. It is to be inferred, therefore, that Wall was not a member of the plaintiff's association, for it was crops of outsiders only that defendant was forbidden to handle without plaintiff's consent. Hence the statement of a cause of action as to Wall's oranges must be held sufficient against a general demurrer, which is the only form taken by defendant's objections in the record. Amestoy v. Transit Co., 95 Cal. 311, 30 Pac. 550; Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 29, 41 Pac. 24.

2. The court found that plaintiff is a corporation, and defendant claims that there was no evidence to sustain the finding. The contract between the parties described the plaintiff as a corporation, and no further proof on that point was necessary. Irrigation Co. v. Warner, 72 Cal. 379, 14 Pac. 37.

It is urged that there was no evidence to support a certain finding of the court to the effect that prior to the contract of December 18, 1894, the stockholders of plaintiff, for the purpose of marketing their several crops of oranges, sold and conveyed to plaintiff, in trust for themselves, their, and each of their, entire crops, etc. We see no materiality in the finding, in view of other facts found or admitted. It sufficiently appears that plaintiff had control of the oranges concerning which it contracted for the purpose of marketing the same. If the stockholders were making demands on defendant similar to those on which plaintiff sues, there might be ground for inquiring into their relations with plaintiff; but this is not shown, and defendant has no concern in the nature of the plaintiff's title to the fruit,—whether it was that of full legal ownership, or the qualified interest of an agent. Upon this point, see the authorities above cited on the question of plaintiff's right to maintain the action; also, Lumley v. Corbett, 18 Cal. 494; Groover v. Warfield, 50 Ga. 644.

Here may be noticed the objection to the admission in evidence of the written agreement signed by plaintiff's stockholders, and entitled, "Contract for Marketing Oranges." Such instrument contained the following preface: "Being desirous of having my oranges handled in the manner set forth in the by-laws of the Tustin Fruit Association, [I] do for such purpose hereby constitute and appoint the Tustin Fruit Association, a corporation, my sole agent," etc. This introduction was followed by other matter showing the purpose of the individuals signing the document that plaintiff should market their oranges, and pay to them, pro rata, the net proceeds of sales thereof. The special objection urged is that the document was not accompanied by the by-laws to which it referred. Assuming (what is by no means clear to us) that the instrument was any essential part of plaintiff's proofs, we yet think the objection was not well taken. We agree that no part of a document should be wrenched from its context, and received as a disjointed member of what is properly an indivisible unit of evidence. But here the paper offered by plaintiff was no such fragment. It seemed to be complete in itself, so far as regards authority to sell the subscribers' fruit, and contained no intimation that the by-laws varied, or might vary, its import; for, in terms, it purported to conform to the by-laws. The effect of the reference to the by-laws was to make them admissible, had defendant chosen to offer the same, but not to render them the inseparable accessory of the paper containing the reference. Code Civ. Proc. § 1854; Toohey v. Harding, 1 Fed. 174, 177; note to Rouse v. Whited, 82 Am. Dec. 345, and cases cited.

The court found that between March 3 and March 15, 1895, "plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant, on board cars, thirteen car loads of No. 1 fruit; the same being oranges," etc. The finding of a sale from plaintiff to defendant (if such is the proper import of this language) was both outside the issues made by the pleadings, and contrary to the evidence, but it does not follow that the judgment should fall. It appeared clearly enough from the findings that plaintiff sold and defendant received the goods pursuant to the guaranty of sales in the contract of December 18, 1894. Defendant was therefore liable absolutely for the price when it became due, and the finding that it was in fact the purchaser is of no consequence. Civ. Code, §§ 2029, 2794, subd. 4; Mechem, Ag. § 1014.

It is strongly insisted that the finding to the effect that said 13 car loads of oranges consisted of No. 1 fruit is without support in the evidence. There was evidence that all the fruit received by defendant under the contract, including said 13 car loads, was picked, graded, culled, and packed under the direct supervision of defendant's agent, as allowed by the terms of the contract. It was in testimony that such agent went into the orchards, and selected the fruit to be picked. He decided what fruit should be accepted by defendant, and what rejected, and when the cars were packed he receipted for them. As to each of the said 13 cars his receipt showed that the fruit was "Sold, f. o. b." Now, we agree with defendant that to admit a sale of fruit, f. o. b., did not necessarily admit it to be No. 1 fruit; for although the No. 1 fruit was by the terms of the contract to be sold f. o. b., and thereupon fell within the scope of defendant's guaranty, yet No. 2 fruit, sales of which were not within the guaranty, might also be sold f. o. b.; but a sale f. o. b. was evidently a sale for shipment, and the defendant's president testified that "the general course of business was that, at the time of shipment of all these various cars of fruit, account sales were rendered by defendant to plaintiff upon the assumption that the oranges were No. 1 fruit, and of good keeping quality, except where especially otherwise stated," etc. None of said 13 car loads were shown to have been within the exception mentioned by the president. Considering his statement in connection with the evidence of the supervision exercised by defendant in the matter of grading and culling the fruit, it is plain that defendant accepted the said cars of oranges as No. 1 fruit. For reasons presently to appear, this admission was conclusive, and fully justified the finding.

3. As stated above, the evidence tended to show that the picking, grading, culling, and packing of the oranges were done under defendant's supervision. There was evidence that the fruit which was packed as No. 1 had the appearance of being No. 1, and was accepted by defendant accordingly. It appears that the terms "choice" and "standard," employed in the contract, applied to both No. 1 and No. 2 oranges; that is, there was choice and standard No. 1 fruit, and choice and standard No. 2. No question was made whether the grades of the oranges as packed corresponded substantially "to the grades as determined and established by the Southern California fruit exchanges," in the language of the contract. But defendant made various offers of evidence having the general purpose to show that a large part of the oranges received by defendant from plaintiff arrived in the Eastern markets in bad order, and that this was because of a latent defect in the fruit, viz. "that they lacked the inherent quality necessary to make them No. 1 fruit, having no carrying or good keeping quality." It was stated that not even by cutting an orange and examining its interior could it be determined whether it possessed "good keeping qualities," and defendant sought to prove that this could only be ascertained by its actual journey to the Eastern markets. The court refused to consider such evidence, and also evidence of various other matters alleged in defendant's first and third counterclaims, except upon condition that defendant would show that it was prevented from inspecting the fruit prior to shipment, which condition, defendant admitted, it could not fulfill. It will be observed that defendant's offer of evidence was not to define No. 1 oranges as those only which arrived at the East in good condition, but it was, in effect, that oranges, in order to grade as No. 1, must possess such "keeping and carrying qualities" at the point of shipment as will prevent deterioration from inherent causes in course of transportation to the East. Defendant urges in support of the offer that by the contract plaintiff warranted that No. 1 fruit, to which defendant's guaranty of sale applied, had no latent defect which would prevent its arrival at the Eastern markets in sound and merchantable condition; that such a warranty was implied, whether the defendant be treated as a purchaser of the goods, or as a factor of the plaintiff for marketing the same. In the latter phase of the question, it is claimed that plaintiff is bound to indemnify defendant for losses incurred by it as plaintiff's agent in disposing of the fruit. In considering the matter, we may assume, in accordance with defendant's contention, that plaintiff knew the goods were sold for shipment to Eastern markets, though there is nothing indicative of such a purpose in the contract. It is true, as defendant says, that any person selling or agreeing to sell goods of a specified designation or description thereby warrants that they shall be of the quality indicated by such designation or description, and it may well be that one promising to supply to his agent or factor goods for sale to others should be held bound by the same principle. But, by the contract here, plaintiff represented no oranges to be either No. 1 or No. 2,—either choice or standard. Whether, and to what extent, if at all, they fell within those designations, were matters for defendant's discrimination, to be reasonably exercised at the proper time, viz. when the oranges, pursuant to defendant's order, were to be picked, packed, accepted, and shipped. Then they were open to defendant's determination whether they were properly graded and culled, and its duty to accept or reject arose. Defendant made its determination when it accepted the several car loads of goods, and plaintiff's responsibility thereupon ended, by the express provision of the contract. Defendant urges that this provision meant only responsibility for the safe-keeping and carriage of the fruit, and collection of the purchase money from Eastern customers. We think that construction too narrow. These exemptions from responsibility are included in other and more specific provisions of the contract. Thus, by its guaranty of original sales and collections, and its agreement to make cash payment for all guaranteed sales, the defendant was clearly bound for the prices at which the oranges were sold f. o. b., whether they ever reached their destination or not, and whether defendant ever collected from its Eastern customers or not. The stipulation for immediate payment apparently looked to a closed and completed transaction between the parties as to every car load of fruit sold under the guaranty. Both the contract, and the conduct of the parties under it, show with reasonable certainty that defendant depended on its own skill and judgment to procure what it wanted; and there is no ground for saying that a warranty from plaintiff, surviving acceptance by defendant, accompanied the goods. The point is illustrated by the case of a sale of a ship's bowsprit, which the buyers had the opportunity to inspect, and which appeared at the time of delivery to be perfectly sound. After some use, it was found to be rotten. There was no fraud. Held, that the seller was not liable for the subsequent failure, and was entitled to recover the apparent value at the time of delivery. Bluet v. Osborne, 1 Starkie, 384. To similar effect, Moore v. McKinlay, 5 Cal. 471; Parkinson v. Lee, 2 East, 314; and see Bartlett v. Hoppock, 34 N. Y. 118; Benj. Sales (6th Ed., by Bennett) p. 646, and cases cited; Tied. Sales, § 187, p. 273, and cases cited. Defendant having accepted the oranges as No. 1 fruit, relying on its own judgment, it is very clear, we think, that no warranty of quality was implied, even though there were latent defects in the goods, undiscoverable by the closest examination. We conclude that the court rightly refused to consider defendant's offers of evidence to support its first and third counterclaims. We have carefully considered the various cases relied on by defendant in argument (Ruiz v. Norton, 4 Cal. 355; Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 573; Fruit Co. v. Curtis, 116 Cal. 632, 48 Pac. 793; Long v. Armsby, 43 Mo. App. 253; Gould v. Stein, 149 Mass. 570, 22 N. E. 47; Maitland v. Martin, 86 Pa. St. 120; English v. Commission Co., 6 C. C. A. 416, 57 Fed. 451; and others), and are of opinion that they teach no doctrine at variance with the result we have reached.

4. The question raised on the exclusion of evidence to support the first and third counterclaims does not differ much from that respecting the demurrer to the second coun-

terclaim. Counsel have discussed them together. The construction of the contract, as we find it, is determinative of both. In said counterclaim it was averred that the 58 car loads of fruit delivered by plaintiff under the contract of December, 1894, were "picked, graded, culled, and packed, and shipped without the approval or inspection of the defendant." This averment was contrary to the evidence at the trial, but for the purposes of the demurrer we accept it as true. It was, however, further alleged that defendant sold to sundry of its customers, f. o. b., the said 58 cars of oranges for shipment to the Eastern market "as No. 1 fruit"; and from this and other allegations of the same pleading it is clearly inferable that defendant accepted the oranges from plaintiff as of that grade, and nothing is alleged to rebut the inference. Since, therefore, it was not shown, in addition to the alleged fact of the grading, culling, etc., of the oranges without defendant's inspection, that plaintiff was in some manner responsible for the failure of defendant to supervise those processes, the counterclaim makes a case of voluntary acceptance of the fruit by defendant without the inspection which, by the terms of the contract, it was its right and duty to make. If course, then, in the absence of some fraud of plaintiff (which is not charged), the consequences of acceptance must follow as declared by the contract, viz. that the responsibility of plaintiff thereupon ceased. Moore v. McKinley, 5 Cal. 471. We need not repeat the considerations which have been already advanced on the effect of acceptance. It is not contended that the fourth counterclaim is, as a pleading, on a footing materially different from that of the second. What is said above suffices for the disposition of the demurrer to both of them. In our opinion, it was rightly sustained.

5. As to the appeal of plaintiff: Since the court found that defendant violated the contract, in refusing to agree with plaintiff on prices of oranges after March 15, 1895, and in refusing to accept any fruit after that date, the plaintiff's only ground for appeal is on the measure of damages. The court held that the recovery for those breaches should be for nominal amounts only. Both sides assume that the rule of damages is furnished by the following provisions of section 3311 of the Civil Code: "The detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him, is deemed to be: * * * (2) If the property has not been resold in the manner prescribed by section thirty hundred and forty-nine, the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the value to the seller, together with the excess, if any, of the expenses properly incurred in carrying the property to market, over those which would have been incurred for the carriage thereof if the buyer had accepted it." There was evidence tending to show that many thousands of boxes of oranges were refused by defendant after said March 15, 1895, because plaintiff would not agree to assume the risk of deterioration thereof in transportation, according to defendant's construction of the contract, but also that plaintiff might have sold the same to others at prices equal to those defendant should have agreed on pursuant to the contract; that plaintiff did not avail itself of the opportunity to sell elsewhere, and that a large part of the total crop went to waste. On April 23, 1895, defendant sent a letter to plaintiff, in which, after proposing certain prices for oranges, defendant proceeded: "We insist upon the construction of the contract as heretofore contended for by us, and the above prices are made upon the basis of such construction. We hereby demand of you a compliance with the terms of the contract, as agreed upon between us, and will hold you responsible for any failure on your part to carry out the same." It is the contention of plaintiff that under said section 3311 the fruit lost as stated was of no value, and that it was entitled, therefore, to recover of defendant the full market prices for the same. It insists that this was more especially true of oranges lost after the date of said letter. Defendant maintains, on the contrary, that it was the duty of plaintiff to sell the oranges, when it had opportunity, to others, and not allow them to go to waste. Defendant's letter of April 23d was no more than an accentuation of its refusal to abide by the contract. True, it insisted on plaintiff's compliance with the contract, but it insisted, also, that the contract with which compliance was demanded should be something different from that which the parties had made,—thus proposing a new term, and consequently a new engagement. Upon defendant's refusal to proceed further under the contract, the plaintiff was at liberty to sell the oranges to any person. Rayfield v. Van Meter (S. F. No. 762, filed March 25, 1898) 52 Pac. 666. The goods were perishable, and we think it was plaintiff's right—perhaps its duty—to sell them forthwith, and in this manner reduce its damage. Hill v. McKay, 94 Cal. 5, 15, 29 Pac. 406. In any view, the value of the oranges to plaintiff, after defendant's repudiation of the contract, was not that of fruit gone to decay, but of the fruit in the condition it was when plaintiff could have sold it. Civ. Code, § 3353. In our opinion the judgment and order denying the motions for new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying the motions for new trial are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1898.)

ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—SALES BY ASSIGNEE—FRAUD—EVIDENCE—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS—LIMITATIONS—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. In an action by creditors to enforce an alleged trust against the property of their insolvent debtor, which had been sold in bulk, at public sale, by the assignee of such insolvent to his attorney, a judgment in favor of defendants will not be set aside, on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings of fact, where such evidence, though preponderating in favor of the theory of plaintiffs, was conflicting, and where such purchaser, as a witness in his own behalf, testified directly and positively that he had never agreed to purchase the property in question for the benefit of plaintiffs, but that, on the contrary, he had purchased it openly and avowedly for his own personal benefit alone.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 2230, subd. 1, prohibiting trustees and their agents from taking part in any transaction concerning the trust, adversely to the interest of the beneficiary, except "when the beneficiary, having capacity to contract, with a full knowledge of the motives of the trustee, and of all other facts concerning the transaction which might affect his own decision, and without the use of any influence on the part of the trustee, permits him to do so," a sale by the assignee of an insolvent debtor to his own attorney was void as to creditors, and raised a constructive trust in their favor, in the absence of evidence that they had the capacity to contract, and had a full knowledge of such purchaser's motives, and of all other facts concerning the transaction which might affect their decision, and that they permitted him to make such purchase without the exercise of any influence on them by him, though such conditions existed as to some of such creditors.

3. Where the attorney of the assignee of an insolvent debtor purchased the property of the insolvent in fraud of the rights of creditors, the cause of action for the enforcement of the constructive trust in their favor accrued immediately on the creation of such trust, a repudiation by the trustee being unnecessary to mature it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mono county.

Bill in equity by R. C. Broder and others against A. R. Conklin and others to declare and enforce an alleged trust. From a judgment in favor of defendants and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Richard S. Miner, for appellants. P. Reddy (W. H. Metson, of counsel), for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Greenly, assignee of Broder, an insolvent debtor, sold at public sale, in bulk, the property of the insolvent, consisting of a large amount of realty and personalty, to A. R. Conklin, the attorney for the assignee. The creditors, by a bill in equity, now seek a judicial decree to the effect that the property purchased by Conklin at the sale be held in trust by him for their benefit. The relief sought is based upon the claim of the existence of a trust relation between Conklin and the creditors, and they rely both upon an express trust and a constructive trust. At the trial a vast amount of evidence was taken to support and overthrow these respective positions. And, as a result, the creditors were defeated all along the line, the trial court finding the facts against them. This appeal is now prosecuted from the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial.

Counsel for appellants declare their main contention to be that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of fact made by the trial court; and to the consideration of this question, as bearing upon the existence of an express trust, this court will first address itself. Conklin was an attorney at law and attorney for the assignee. It is claimed by appellants that prior to the time set for the sale he entered into an express understanding and agreement with them to the effect that he would purchase the property at the sale, for their benefit, take possession of and manage the same to their interest, and eventually satisfy their claims from the proceeds thereof. It is conceded that the trust agreement relied upon arose in parol, but it is contended that a part performance thereof relieved it from the effect of the statute of frauds. There is evidence to support these contentions, and findings of fact to that effect would not have been disturbed by this court. It may be said that the evidence preponderates that way. Still, conceding all this, it does not follow that the finding of fact to the contrary should be set aside. Notwithstanding the evidence, as it appears to us, may preponderate against the truth of the finding, still a preponderance of evidence is not inconsistent with the existence of a substantial conflict in the evidence, but is entirely consistent with it. It is said in Grant v. McPherson, 104 Cal. 167, 37 Pac. 864: "Upon a question of the character here presented this court cannot say that the evidence of two witnesses or of three witnesses must as to certain facts overthrow the evidence of one witness testifying to a contrary state of facts." Indeed, the trial court is not bound to decide in accordance with the testimony of the greater number of witnesses. The question here presented is, does this evidence present a substantial conflict as to the fact? And the question as to the presence of a substantial conflict is in no way dependent upon a great number of witnesses upon the one side and a limited number upon the other, for it often occurs that one shall prevail against the many. The defendant Conklin was a witness in his own behalf, and the all-important witness to disprove the charges made by the creditors. He testified directly and positively that no sort or semblance of an agreement or understanding was ever entered into by him with the creditors to purchase the property for their benefit; but that, upon the contrary, he purchased the property openly and avowedly for his own personal benefit alone. As indicated by the findings of fact, the trial court believed his statements of these matters and disbelieved all of the evidence contradictory thereto, and to get at the truth, in the light of this contradictory evidence, was essentially the duty of the trial court. As to the rule in such cases, it is said in Grant v. McPherson, supra: "Evidently his testimony was believed by the jury and by the court, and, under the circumstances here presented, we are not at liberty to cast it aside. A wall of adjudications to this effect has been raised up by this court which we have no desire to pass over or batter down, for the wisdom of the rule declared in those adjudications cannot be gainsaid."

A constructive trust arises by operation of law from the relation of the parties coupled with the transaction had. Is such a trust disclosed by this record? Conklin was attorney for Broder, the insolvent, and also attorney for Greenly, the assignee. But it becomes unnecessary to consider the relative relations existing between the insolvent and the assignee, or the legal propriety of one person acting as attorney for both insolvent and assignee. This is so because Broder received his final discharge in insolvency May 13, 1879, and at once Conklin's employment as his attorney ceased. The sale of the estate did not take place until the month of June. Hence at that time Conklin was not an attorney for the insolvent, for there was no insolvent. But the serious objection to the validity of the sale still remains, for upon the day of sale Conklin was attorney for the assignee, and the assignee was a trustee for the creditors. Under such circumstances it was a very delicate matter for Conklin to deal with this property for his own individual ends. Acting in his own interest, he would buy the property at the lowest possible figure, while, acting for the creditors' interest, he would sell the property at the highest possible figure. And a trustee should not place himself in a position where his duty is to be performed under such serious temptation. An assignee or his solicitor is denied the right of buying the estate of the bankrupt, save in most exceptional cases. And the reasons upon which this most wholesome doctrine is laid may be found convincingly stated in the very early cases of Ex parte Bennett, 10 Ves. 381a, and Ex parte James, 8 Ves. 337. At the same time, under certain conditions, the trustee may deal with the trust property to his own benefit, and those conditions are declared by section 2230 of the Civil Code of this state, which provides: "Neither the trustee nor any of his agents may take part in any transaction concerning the trust, in which he or any one for whom he acts as agent has an interest, present or contingent, adverse to that of his beneficiary, except as follows: (1) When the beneficiary, having capacity to contract, with a full knowledge of the motives of the trustee, and of all other facts concerning the transaction which might affect his own decision, and without the use of any influence on the part of the trustee, permits him to do so." This principle declared by the Code is but a perfect echo of the common law. It is said in Sugd. Vend. *$95, that, to support such a sale, "it must clearly appear that the purchaser at the time of the purchase had shaken off his confidential character by the consent of the cestui que trust, freely given, after full information and bargaining for the right to purchase."

Tested by this principle of law, was Conklin, under the facts disclosed by the record, authorized to buy this property at the sale? And, in considering this question, it must be borne in mind that there are no presumptions in favor of the action of a trustee where he deals with the property of his beneficiary. The presumptions are against him, and the burden of proof is upon him. The trial court found the value of the property at the time of the sale to be $5,000, and that Conklin, being the highest bidder, purchased it for $2,500. It was also found that the sale was a public sale, made after due notice. But we attach no importance to the fact that the attorney bought the property at one-half its value. The principle which condemns the sale does not depend upon the presence of that fact. It covers much broader and deeper ground. Neither does the fact that the sale was made at public auction after full notice relieve the attorney of a single responsibility laid upon him in equity by reason of his confidential relations to the parties. The success of his venture depends upon no such principle. The fact that the sale was public can hardly be considered even a trifling circumstance in his favor. It is said in 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 322: "So that, in fact, in all cases where a purchase has been made by a trustee on his own account of the estate of his cestui que trust, although sold at public auction, it is the option of the cestui que trust to set aside the sale, whether bona fide made or not. * * * And this doctrine applies, not only to trustees strictly so called, but to other persons standing in like situations, such as assignees and solicitors of a bankrupt or insolvent estate, who are never permitted to become purchasers at the sale of the bankrupt or insolvent estate."

Every creditor of the insolvent had a direct interest in the estate. He was a beneficiary of the trust fund; the assignee was the trustee; and the attorney was the agent of the assignee. The attorney occupies the same confidential relation to the creditors as the assignee, and in equity should be weighed and measured in the same scales. Burke v. Bours, 92 Cal. 108, 28 Pac. 57. Neither could purchase for himself unless coming within the exception declared by subdivision 1 of section 2230 of the Civil Code. Standing alone, a mere naked purchase by the attorney of the assignee from the assignee was prima facie void, and the burden rested upon him of showing its validity by competent evidence.

The character of evidence necessary to accomplish that result is declared in subdivision 1 of the aforesaid section of the Code. It is to this effect: The evidence should show that the creditors had the capacity to contract, that they had a full knowledge of the motives of Conklin in making the purchase, a full knowledge of all the other facts concerning the transaction which might affect their decision, and that without the use of any influence exerted upon them by him they permitted him to make the purchase. The findings of the trial court do not disclose such a state of facts, and, if those findings did disclose such a state of facts, the evidence to support them is wanting in the record. It is argued by respondent that these facts existed as to some of the creditors, and that existing as to some they existed as to all. In other words, it is contended that notice to and consent and knowledge of one creditor is notice to and consent and knowledge of all creditors. No authority is cited to support this position, and we know of none. The proposition stamps itself as unsound. Every creditor was a separate and distinct beneficiary of the trust estate. The assignee was a trustee for each and every creditor. No creditor had the authority to bind any other creditor. A majority of the creditors, upon a proposition such as here involved could not bind the minority. As to any acts looking towards the validation of this sale, every creditor stood alone, and his rights could not be bartered away by any number of the remaining creditors. We conclude that the sale was void as to the creditors, and, that being void, a constructive trust in their favor was fastened upon the property by operation of law.

If this action is not barred by the statute of limitations, upon the facts disclosed by the record the creditors are entitled to the relief sought. The trial court found that the statute had run against it, and to that question our attention will be directed. By the bill the creditors relied upon both an express and a constructive trust. They alleged a repudiation of the express trust by Conklin in 1884, and brought this action shortly thereafter. If they had established by the evidence the existence of an express trust and a repudiation of it at the time alleged, clearly their cause of action upon that line of attack would not have been barred. But, unfortunately for them, the trial court found against their contention as to the existence of any such trust, and, as already stated, we will not disturb that finding of fact.

In considering the statute of limitations in connection with the constructive trust, we find this action to have been brought some seven years after Conklin bought the property at the assignee's sale. It is therefore immaterial whether the three-year or four-year statute of limitations is applicable to the case; for, if the action is barred at all, it is barred under either contingency. No repudiation of a constructive trust by the trustee is required in order to set the statute of limitations in motion. A cause of action is created in favor of the beneficiary at the very moment the law creates the trust. In Howell v. Howell, 15 Wis. 55, the court, in speaking as to a constructive trust, declared: "The trust in such cases originates in a fraud, which is in itself as complete and absolute a denial of the rights of the injured party as it is possible to have, and every day which passes without reparation of the injury is a continuation or repetition of it. William Howell might have commenced his action the moment the land was purchased, and consequently it was barred before his death." Without further discussion it may be said that at the present day the law is settled upon this question. The statute of limitations begins to run the moment the trustee violates his duty and makes the purchase. Perry, Trusts, § 865; Haynie v. Hall's Ex'r, 5 Humph. 290; Wilmerding v. Russ, 33 Conn. 67; Kennedy v. Baker, 59 Tex. 150; Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 Pac. 88; Nougues v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 102, 50 Pac. 386. The present action, not having been brought for seven years after the cause of action accrued, was barred by the statute of limitations. Having arrived at this conclusion, we deem it unnecessary to consider the many assignments of error relied upon by the appellants in the matter of the admission and exclusion of evidence at the trial and other rulings upon preliminary questions. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

SHEPHERD v. KEAGLE, County Auditor.
(Sac. 436.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1898.)
COUNTY SUPERVISORS—EXPENSES—LIABILITY OF COUNTIES.

A member of the board of supervisors, who attended a supervisors' convention in another county as one of a committee of the whole, authorized and appointed by the board so to do, cannot recover compensation from the county for his expenses, since not within the duties of the board as authorized by law.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by D. C. Shepherd against A. C. Keagle as county auditor of San Joaquin county. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Louttit, for appellant. Smith & Grove and W. B. Nutter, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The board of supervisors of the county of San Joaquin passed the following resolution March 2, 1897: "Resolved, that the members of the board of supervisors of San Joaquin county be, and are hereby, authorized and appointed as a committee of the whole to attend the supervisors' convention to be held in Los Angeles on April 19, 20, and 21, 1897, and to visit other county seats en route; to inspect county hospitals, jails, methods of handling, costs of administering county business, roads, etc., and to act for San Joaquin county on all matters within the law looking to better methods and more economical handling of county and government affairs at all the county seats they may visit, and report to this board." Thereafter the plaintiff, who was a member of said board of supervisors, attended the convention at Los Angeles, and visited other county seats en route, as proposed by said resolution, and in the performance of said acts necessarily expended the sum of $44.25 for traveling expenses. After his return he presented to the board of supervisors and filed with the clerk his claim for said expenses, in proper form, which was thereupon allowed and approved by the said board, and ordered paid, and said order of allowance was properly certified to the defendant, who was the auditor of said county, and demand was thereupon made upon him by the plaintiff that he draw his warrant for said amount upon the county treasurer. The defendant refused to comply with said demand, and the plaintiff made his application to the superior court for a writ of mandate directing the defendant to draw said warrant. A demurrer to the petition was sustained by the court, and judgment entered dismissing the application. From this judgment the present appeal has been taken.

The principles involved under the facts in this case do not differ in any substantial respect from those presented in the case of Irwin v. Yuba Co. (Cal.) 52 Pac. 35, and upon the authority of that case the judgment is affirmed.

In re WATKINS' ESTATE. (S. F. 1,145.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1898.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—POWER OF ATTORNEY—ANTAGONISTIC DUTIES.

The authority of an agent under a power of attorney to collect and receipt for a claim against an estate is suspended by his appointment as administrator; and his receipt thereafter to himself as administrator, in the name of his principal, is not binding.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county.

Objections by Elizabeth Lawrence to the final account of James B. Watkins, administrator of the estate of Mary G. Watkins. From an order sustaining the objections, the administrator appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. G. Weaver, for appellant. W. L. Duff, for respondent.

BRITT, C. On November 23, 1894, one Mrs. Elizabeth Lawrence, a creditor of the estate of Mary G. Watkins, deceased, made to James B. Watkins a power of attorney, in terms authorizing him to demand, and, if necessary, sue for and recover, all sums of money due or to become due from the said estate to her, the said Elizabeth Lawrence, and to receipt in her name therefor. In January, 1895, said James B. Watkins applied for and received letters of administration on said estate, and thereafter a portion of Mrs. Lawrence's claim was regularly allowed and established as a debt of the deceased. In April, 1897, said administrator filed a final account of his administration; crediting himself therein, among other items, with a sum of money alleged to have been paid in satisfaction of said allowed claim against the estate. Said creditor contested the account on the ground that the administrator had made no such payment. On the hearing he produced as his voucher a receipt to himself, as administrator, for the money due to Mrs. Lawrence, which receipt was subscribed with her name by himself, as attorney in fact, in virtue of the aforesaid power. He did not pay the money to her, but retained it in his own hands, and claimed the right to apply it on a demand he set up against her on account of certain dealings she had had with him in his individual capacity. The court sustained the objections to the account, and ordered the administrator to pay said creditor the amount of her allowed claim.

The conduct of the administrator was wholly indefensible. In his official character, he was a trustee. Bergin v. Haight, 99 Cal. 52, 33 Pac. 760. He had no capacity to "demand, sue for, or recover" sums of money claimed by others against the estate which was the subject of his trust. Civ. Code, §§ 2232, 2234; Byrne v. Byrne, 94 Cal. 576, 29 Pac. 1115, and 30 Pac. 196. The authority to sign a receipt, conferred by the power of attorney, was but an incident of the authority to collect the money. It necessarily follows that when he became administrator of the estate the operation of the power from Mrs. Lawrence was suspended, if, indeed, his agency for her was not entirely renounced. Civ. Code, §§ 2232, 2322, 2355, subd. 4. Of course, he had no right to set off any claim held by himself individually against a debt due from him as administrator to a creditor of his intestate. The order should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

LESZYNSKY v. MEYER. (S. F. 1071.)<sup>1</sup>
(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1898.)
BROKERS—COMPENSATION FOR SALE OF REALTY—INSUFFICIENT EVIDENCE.

On January 17, 1891, plaintiff, at London, transmitted to decedent an offer from a corporation there to purchase certain land owned by him, which he accepted on conditions, one of which was that £10,000 be advanced as security for performance. On April 25th plaintiff wrote, asking that the conditions be waived. No direct response was made, and decedent, on June 2d, wrote that, unless he received notice by July 1st that the matter was closed, he would withdraw about one-half the land from the pending proposals. No such notice was sent, but plaintiff wrote that the letter was not clear, and that he expected to hear from decedent that the proposition was satisfactory. On December 5th plaintiff wrote that the corporation would be glad to do business, and requested decedent to send some one to London to complete the negotiations as outlined in their former propositions, which letter was delivered by R. On January 15, 1892, decedent replied that he was sorry his last letter was not sufficiently clear, and that he was willing to sell on the terms proposed in their letter of January 17, 1891, or would divide the property into two portions, and, if the matter was definitely settled, his son-in-law could go to London, provided £1,000 was paid for his expenses. On March 16th plaintiff wrote that the corporation was in liquidation, and he would try to sell the land to others. R. testified that when he delivered the letter of December 5, 1891, decedent said he knew satisfactory terms had been made between himself and the corporation about June or July, 1891, and that plaintiff had effected a sale with these parties, and that he should have gone across, and closed up the matter on the other side. Held, in an action to recover for services rendered in procuring the purchaser for the land, that there never was such a meeting of the minds of the negotiating parties as would authorize recovery.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Julius Leszynsky against H. L. E. Meyer, administrator of the estate of Joseph P. Hale, deceased, to recover for brokerage commission. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George Leszynsky, for appellant. A. D. Keyes, for respondent.

BRITT, C. According to the view taken by plaintiff (which for present purposes we may concede to be correct), the cause of action on which he rested his case at the trial is to be regarded as founded on the asserted liability of Joseph P. Hale for services rendered by plaintiff in procuring a purchaser for a great tract of land owned or controlled by Hale, and situated in Lower California; the reasonable value of such services being stated at the sum of $160,000. On the evidence for plaintiff the court below rendered judgment of nonsuit against him. The greater part of the evidence consisted of a series of letters passed between plaintiff at London, England, and Hale at San Francisco, Cal. It will be sufficient to state the effect of only a few of these. Hale died before this action was begun. On January 17, 1891, plaintiff procured and transmitted to Hale an offer in writing from a concern styled usually in the correspondence the London & Amsterdam Trust Company. Such offer was a proposal to form a corporation to "take over, work, and develop the property," and to pay Hale therefor $400,000 as follows: Cash, $100,000; 6 per cent. first mortgage debentures, $100,000; shares in such proposed corporation, $200,000. Hale replied that he would accept the offer on conditions, one of which was that said trust company should advance $10,000 cash, as security for performance. April 25, 1891, plaintiff wrote to Hale, asking that he waive this condition. Hale made no direct response, but on June 2, 1891, he wrote to plaintiff saying that unless he received notice by July 1st that the matter was closed he would withdraw about one-half of the tract from the pending proposals. No such notice was sent, but plaintiff claims that Hale's letter of June 2d was intended as an acceptance of the original offer of said trust company. The following is the more material evidence in which plaintiff sees color for this contention: July 10, 1891, plaintiff wrote to Hale that the letter of June 2d was not clear, and saying that he expected to hear from him fully that the proposition of said trust company was satisfactory. Hale made no reply to this. On December 5, 1891, the plaintiff wrote to Hale that the London & Amsterdam Trust Company "would be glad to do the business with your Lower California lands. * * * To carry out their program it would be necessary to send over here power of attorney either to your son-in-law, the Honorable Mr. Boyle, or anybody else you please, to sell your land on the terms and price outlined in their former propositions"; which letter was delivered to Hale in San Francisco by one A. J. Rich. January 15, 1892, Hale replied: "I regret that my last letter should not have seemed sufficiently clear to you, and will endeavor to be more explicit in this one. I am willing to sell the whole of my property in Lower California * * * to the London and Amsterdam Trust Company on the terms they proposed in their letter dated 17th January of last year, * * * or I am prepared to divide my lands into two portions, and dispose of them separately [stating terms at length]. * * * My son-in-law, the Honorable R. Boyle, is with me here, and, if the matter were definitely settled, he would, if necessary, go over to London to see the directors. In the event of his being sent, I should, of course, expect a sum, say $1,000, to be paid to my bankers in London for his expenses, which sum would be deducted from the first cash payment." Replying, plaintiff wrote on March 16, 1892, that said trust company was then in liquidation, and he was trying to sell the land to other parties. Said A. J. Rich testified that when he delivered to Hale plaintiff's letter of December 5, 1891, Hale said he knew "that satisfactory terms had been made between himself and the London & Amsterdam Trust Company about June or July, 1891; that Mr. Leszynsky had effected a sale to these parties; and that he [Hale], according to his agreement, should have gone and closed up the matter on the other side."

Looking to the said letters, it is plain that there never was a meeting of minds of the negotiating parties. Masten v. Griffing, 33 Cal. 111. Hale's letter of June 2, 1891, contained no language intimating that he waived an immediate payment of $10,000; and when, in December following, plaintiff sought to continue the treaty, the provision was added that Mr. Boyle or other person in London must be empowered to sell the land on terms formerly stated. The reply of Hale was, not that he had at any time before accepted the trust company's offer, but that he was then, on January 15, 1892, willing to sell on the terms that company had proposed on January 17, 1891, and would meet the new requirement by sending Boyle to London, expecting, "of course," an advance of $1,000 for his expenses. Why should Hale have proposed new terms for the sale of his land by parcels if he had, or believed that he had, previously accepted an offer for the whole? Thus the negotiation ended. The prospective purchaser went into liquidation, and Hale's demand for an advance of $1,000 for the expenses of an attorney in fact—declared by plaintiff to be necessary for closing the business—was never answered. The testimony of Rich, under the circumstances appearing, is of no consequence. At the most it tended to show only that Hale had intended to accept the offer made to him. This was not sufficient. Notice of acceptance must have been communicated to the plaintiff at least, if not to the trust company also. Granting that Hale's remarks to Rich were declaratory of either present or past acceptance of the trust company's offer, still there is no proof that Rich communicated the same to anybody, or that he had authority so to do, or that such acceptance was ever in any manner put in course of transmission to plaintiff. A contract cannot be made by manifesting to strangers that assent which the law requires to be communicated mutually between the parties themselves. Civ. Code, § 1565; White v. Corlies, 46 N. Y. 467; Trounstin v. Sellers, 35 Kan. 447, 11 Pac. 441. The judgment should be affirmed.

DICKEY v. GIBSON et al. (Sac. 419.)<sup>1</sup>

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—HOMESTEAD—PARTIES—PROBATE COURT—JURISDICTION—EJECTMENT.

1. The heirs of a deceased spouse are not necessary parties defendant to an action to foreclose a mortgage on the homestead, brought after the death of such spouse, since, under Civ.

Code, § 1265, the title to the homestead vests in the surviving spouse.

2. The title derived by a mortgagee who purchases at his foreclosure sale dates back to the date of the mortgage, so as to cut off interests acquired subsequent to its execution.

3. The probate court has no jurisdiction to try adverse claims to property on a petition by the widow to set it apart as homestead property inventoried as belonging to decedent's estate; and hence the overruling of an adverse claimant's opposition to the granting of such an order does not preclude him from establishing his title in an action for that purpose.

4. A mortgagee who purchases the mortgaged premises at foreclosure sale is not precluded from bringing ejectment by the court's refusal to grant him a writ of assistance.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county.

Ejectment by Lafayette Dickey against Crecencia Gibson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. Eastin, for appellants. Maddux & Stonesifer, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Ejectment for certain lands in the county of Stanislaus. Samuel Gibson was the owner of the lands in question in his lifetime, and executed a mortgage thereon to the plaintiff December 2, 1889, to secure the payment of his promissory note for $5,700, with interest. Gibson died May 28, 1894, and his widow, Crecencia Gibson, was appointed executrix of his last will and testament. October 17, 1894, the plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court for the foreclosure of his mortgage against the said executrix, and certain other defendants claiming interests in the mortgaged property. The executrix appeared and answered the complaint, and upon the trial of the cause judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the foreclosure and sale of the lands in satisfaction of his claim. This judgment was afterwards affirmed by this court. 113 Cal. 26, 45 Pac. 15. At the sale under the judgment the plaintiff became the purchaser, and a deed for the land was executed to him by the sheriff December 8, 1895. After the execution of this deed, and after the judgment had been affirmed in this court, the surviving widow, Crecencia Gibson, made an application to the superior court to set aside the lands in question as a homestead for the use and benefit of the family of the deceased. The plaintiff appeared at the hearing of this application, and contested the same; but his objections were overruled, and on the 19th day of August, 1896, the court made an order setting apart the same as a homestead, which order was on the same day recorded in the office of the county recorder. Prior to the commencement of this action, the plaintiff applied to the superior court for a writ of assistance to place him in possession of the premises, which was refused; and on the 10th of July, 1896, he commenced the present action for the possession of the land.

The defendants and appellants are the surviving widow and children of Gibson, the deceased mortgagor. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

It was held in the case of Dickey v. Gibson, 113 Cal. 26, 45 Pac. 15, that at the date of the mortgage to the plaintiff the land was the separate property of Gibson, and that the mortgage by him was valid, and created a lien in favor of his mortgagee. For the foreclosure of this lien, after the death of Gibson, it was not necessary to make his heirs parties defendant to the suit. Bayly v. Muehe, 65 Cal. 345, 3 Pac. 467, and 4 Pac. 486; Collins v. Scott, 100 Cal. 446, 34 Pac. 1085. The executrix represented the estate of Gibson, and the judgment against her bound the heirs and devisees of Gibson; and the sale under the judgment related to the date of the mortgage, and cut off the interest of all parties to the suit derived under Gibson subsequent thereto. By the sheriff's deed under this sale the plaintiff acquired all the right in the land held by Gibson at the time of his death, so that nothing passed to the defendants herein, as heirs of Gibson, either by descent or devise.

The order of the court setting apart the premises as a homestead for the family, made subsequent to the execution of this deed, did not impair the interest in the land which the plaintiff acquired by virtue of the deed. By this order the title to the land was not transferred or affected, its only effect being to withdraw the property from administration. No adjudication of title was appropriate, or could be made in such proceeding. In re Burton's Estate, 64 Cal. 428, 1 Pac. 702; In re Kimberly's Estate, 97 Cal. 281, 32 Pac. 234. And the fact that the plaintiff's opposition to granting the order was overruled did not preclude him from establishing his title in an action for that purpose.

It was not necessary that the plaintiff should make a personal demand upon the defendants for the possession, prior to commencing the present action. This provision in the judgment in the foreclosure suit was a condition annexed to his right to apply for a writ of assistance, but has no application to an action for the possession of the property. In such action his right of recovery is established by showing his title to the land, and that it is withheld from him by the defendant. Although the plaintiff derived his title through the judgment in the foreclosure suit, he was not limited to a writ of assistance for the purpose of gaining possession of the land, but was at liberty to bring an action for its recovery, and the right to bring such action was not affected by the refusal of the court to grant a writ of assistance. Trope v. Kern, 83 Cal. 553, 23 Pac. 691. The refusal of the court to grant the writ was not an adjudication of his title or right to possession as against the defendant. The court may have denied his application for the reason that they were not parties to the foreclosure suit, since in such cases courts very often refuse the writ, and remit the petitioner to an action. The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte WILLIAMS. (Cr. 442.)<sup>1</sup>

FALSE PRETENSES—DEFAUDING INNKEEPER—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT ON HABEAS CORPUS PROCEEDINGS.

Pen. Code, § 537, provides that any person obtaining food or accommodation at an inn without paying therefor, with intent to defraud the proprietor, or who obtains credit by the use of any false pretenses, or who, after obtaining credit, absconds without paying for his accommodation, is guilty of a misdemeanor. A complaint alleged that defendant by false representations did fraudulently obtain credit at a particular boarding house to the extent of $48, and did willfully and unlawfully defraud the proprietor thereof. Held, in habeas corpus proceedings, that, although brought under the second clause, it sufficiently stated a cause of action under the first clause to meet an objection that it charged no offense under the statute.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Mariposa county.

Petition by Benjamin Williams for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

Stanton L. Carter, for petitioner. The Attorney General, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Petitioner was convicted in the justice's court of Mariposa county of a misdemeanor arising under section 537 of the Penal Code. He was fined, with the alternative of imprisonment, and, failing to pay the fine, went to jail. He now seeks his release on habeas corpus, assigning (1) that the complaint charged no offense under the statute; and (2) that the statute is unconstitutional.

1. As to the last point, the validity of the section was impliedly sustained in Ex parte Ruffin (Cal.) 51 Pac. 862, and we do not regard the further objections now urged by petitioner as seriously challenging the constitutionality of the provision.

2. The proposition that the complaint is insufficient is based, we think, upon an erroneous construction of the pleading. The section of the Code under which the conviction was had, which is intended to prevent frauds and impositions upon innkeepers, and the like, provides: "Sec. 537. Any person who obtains any food or accommodation at an inn or boarding-house without paying therefor, with intent to defraud the proprietor or manager thereof, or who obtains credit at an inn or boarding-house by the use of any false pretense, or who, after obtaining credit or accommodation at any inn or boarding-house, absconds and surreptitiously removes his baggage therefrom without paying for his food or accommodations, is guilty of a misdemeanor." St. 1889, p. 44. As suggested by petitioner, the act contemplates three classes of offenders who shall be amenable to its provisions: First, those who obtain food or accommodation at such an institution without paying therefor, with intent to defraud; second, those who obtain credit thereat by the employment of any false pretense; and, third, those who, after obtaining such credit or accommodation, abscond and surreptitiously remove their baggage without paying their score. The material part of the complaint filed against the petitioner was "that said Dr. B. Williams on or about the 6th day of February, 1898, at Mariposa, in the said county of Mariposa, state of California, by false and fraudulent promises and representations, did willfully, unlawfully, and fraudulently obtain credit for food and lodging at the boarding house of Peter Gordon, in said town, county, and state, to the extent of forty-eight dollars in value; and said Dr. B. Williams did then and there willfully and unlawfully defraud said Peter Gordon out of such board and lodging, to said value of forty-eight dollars." Petitioner construes this as an effort to state an offense solely under the second clause of the section,—the obtaining of credit by the use of false pretenses,—and his contention is that it is wholly insufficient for that purpose, because of its failure to state what the false pretenses were; that the mere averment that false pretenses were used, without setting them out, is but the averment of a legal conclusion, which is not sufficient to make out the offense; and such may be conceded to be the law, under that view of the complaint. People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488. But the fact that the complaint may have been intended to state a case under that clause of the section will not affect our present inquiry, if, upon inspection, it is found to contain sufficient facts to bring it within either clause thereof. While the inquiry on habeas corpus may extend to the question whether the complaint or information charges an offense known to the law, since this objection goes to the question of jurisdiction (Ex parte Maler, 103 Cal. 476, 37 Pac. 402), the proceeding may not be made to subserve the office of a demurrer; and if the facts alleged squint at a substantive statement of the offense, no matter how defectively or inartificially they may be stated, or however confused and beclouded they may be rendered through intermingling them with immaterial or unnecessary averments, the writ will not lie. Ex parte Whitaker, 43 Ala. 323; Ex parte Prime, 1 Barb. 340. While in this case the pleader would seem to have had rather a confused idea of the requirements of the statute, and of the case he desired to allege, and, as justly said by petitioner, has so confused his averments as to make it difficult to determine under which feature of the statute he intended to proceed, we are nevertheless satisfied that the complaint contains sufficient, in substance, when picked out, to constitute an offense under the first clause of the section. It is made to appear therefrom, we think, to a common certainty, that petitioner obtained food and lodging at the boarding house of Peter Gordon, without paying for it, and with the intent to defraud Gordon thereof. This was all that it was essential to allege under the first clause of the section. The fact that it contains allegations as to the employment of false pretenses—matter calculated to bring it within another feature of the statute—cannot, as suggested, affect the sufficiency of the facts to state an offense. Because a demurrer might have lain for duplicity or uncertainty, or some other special ground, will not, as we have seen, avail the petitioner in this proceeding. It is only necessary that the complaint should state an offense within the jurisdiction of the court trying it, to meet the objection here. And this, we are satisfied, has been done. Writ denied, and petitioner remanded.

REDLANDS, L. & C. DOMESTIC WATER
CO. v. CITY OF REDLANDS et al. (L. A. 336.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1898.)
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — WATER COMPANIES—RATES.

On an issue as to the reasonableness of water rates established by ordinance, the items of necessary expenditure by the water company should not include interest on the company's indebtedness, nor the sum the plant will depreciate annually aside from the sum requisite for its maintenance and repairs.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Action by the Redlands, Lugonia & Crafton Domestic Water Company against the city of Redlands and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

C. C. Bennett, for appellants. Bicknell & Trask, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The board of trustees of the city of Redlands having, in February, 1896, adopted an ordinance fixing the rates to be charged or collected for furnishing water to its inhabitants for domestic purposes during the year commencing July 1, 1896, the plaintiff brought the present action for a judgment annulling the ordinance, upon the ground that the rates therein prescribed would not yield a revenue sufficient to enable it to pay the interest on its indebtedness, its operating expenses, and taxes, and keeping its plant in repair, and replacing the same. At the trial of the cause the court found that the total amount of income which the plaintiff would receive during the year would be $20,749.08, and that its necessary expenditures would be $22,367.60; and also found that the plaintiff is entitled to have the rates so fixed that the aggregate income therefrom, together with its other income, will enable it to meet the above amount of expenditures, "and such additional amount as, in the opinion of said board of trustees, said plaintiff is entitled to as profit upon its investment for furnishing water to said city of Redlands and its inhabitants"; and thereupon rendered judgment annulling the ordinance, and awarding to the plaintiff a mandatory injunction requiring said board of trustees to forthwith fix the rates for said year "so as to assure an annual income to the plaintiff sufficient to pay the interest on its indebtedness, its operating expenses, taxes, and annual depreciation of plant, and to pay plaintiff a reasonable and just compensation for the services rendered in furnishing water to the said city of Redlands and its inhabitants." From this judgment the defendants have appealed, presenting the appeal upon the judgment roll without any bill of exceptions.

In the items of expenditure which the court found that the plaintiff is entitled to be reimbursed from the income derived from the rates fixed by the ordinance is the sum of $7,580 for interest, and $2,898.60 for depreciation of plant, the latter item being the amount which the court finds will be the annual depreciation of the plant, aside from the amount requisite for its maintenance and repairs during the year. In San Diego Water Co. v. City of San Diego, 118 Cal. 556, 50 Pac. 633, it was held that the interest upon the indebtedness of the water company is not a proper item of expenditure to be provided for in fixing the annual rates to be charged or collected for furnishing water to the inhabitants of a city, and that the water company is not entitled to have the rates so fixed as to enable it to set apart a certain amount each year as a sinking fund for the depreciation of its plant. The provision in the judgment herein directing that the rates be fixed so as to assure an income sufficient to pay these items is inconsistent with the principles declared in the San Diego Case. Deducting the amount of these two items from the amount of expenditures which the court finds will be necessarily incurred by the plaintiff, the income which the plaintiff will receive from the rates fixed in the ordinance will exceed its expenditures by $8,860.08. Whether this amount is, under all the circumstances of the case, a reasonable compensation to it is a question of fact depending upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, and must be determined in the first instance by the superior court. The jurisdiction of this court in the matter is limited to a review of the action of the superior court. The judgment is reversed, and new trial ordered.

In re MURDOCK'S ESTATE. (Sac. 452.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 7, 1898.)
PROBATE—ACCOUNTS OF EXECUTORS—ALLOWANCES.

An order in probate court settling the first annual account of executors, which strikes out certain items for sums paid to experts and detectives in investigating an alleged fraudulent claim against the estate, on the ground that the court is unable to examine such items because the executors object to disclosing the particulars for fear of defeating their object, is not erroneous, where leave is given to restate such items in some future account.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Glenn county.

In the matter of the estate of William Murdock, deceased. From an order made on the hearing of exceptions to the executors' first annual account, they appeal. Affirmed.

F. C. Lusk (Richard Bane, of counsel), for appellants. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The executors of the last will and testament of William Murdock, deceased, filed their first annual account in the superior court of Glenn county, and one Mary Helen Murdock, claiming to be a creditor of said estate, filed exceptions thereto, and the executors appeal from the order made upon the hearing of said exceptions. After publication of notice to creditors, Mary Helen Murdock presented to said executors a claim against said estate upon an alleged promissory note purporting to have been made by said testator on September 5, 1877, for the sum of $100,000, payable to her order 20 years after date, "with interest at one per cent. per month from date until paid." This claim was presented August 22, 1894, and was not then due. The executors held said claim for 10 days without allowing or rejecting it, whereupon said claimant elected to consider the claim rejected and brought suit thereon, but dismissed it shortly afterwards.

The question principally discussed by counsel for appellants concerns the right of said claimant to contest said account, it being contended that the presentation of her claim did not comply with the requirements of section 1494, Code Civ. Proc., in reference to the presentation of claims not due; that it was therefore nugatory, and gave her no standing to contest the account. Some other questions incidental to the right of said contestant to be heard were also raised; but unless the order made by the court settling the account was itself erroneous, it cannot be reversed because of errors occurring at the hearing, so that the only material question upon this appeal is whether that order is erroneous.

Several items were ordered to be retired from the account, with leave to the executors to restate them in some future account. These, so far as complained of, relate to compensation paid by the executors to an expert in handwriting and certain detectives employed by them in investigating the claim of the contestant based upon said alleged promissory note, which, if valid, would amount at maturity to $340,000; and the ground upon which these items were retired was that the executors having objected to disclosing the particulars of their services, for the reason that it might defeat the object sought to be attained, namely, the defeat of the alleged fraudulent claim of contestant, the court could not sufficiently investigate the character and value of the services rendered to enable it to determine whether those items should be allowed. We think this action of the court was proper, and that the executors were not prejudiced thereby. No opinion is expressed upon the other questions discussed, for the reason that it is not necessary to a decision of this appeal, and questions which may arise in other proceedings should not be now anticipated; and if the questions discussed and not decided upon this appeal should again arise, the parties will not be prejudiced or concluded by the action of the court below in this proceeding, except as to the order settling said account, which is hereby affirmed.

ISAACS v. JONES et al. (Sac. 250.)<sup>1</sup>

RECEIVERS—GUARDIANS—APPOINTMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION—PARTIES—INTERVENTION.

1. Where the court had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver, error in making the appointment or in not controlling the receiver's conduct is not ground for intervention.

2. An order of a court of competent jurisdiction in appointing a guardian for one alleged to be incompetent to manage his affairs is not subject to collateral attack.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 387, providing that any person having an interest in matter in litigation, or in the success of either party, or against both, may intervene by joining plaintiff in claiming under the complaint, or by uniting with defendant in resisting the claim of plaintiff, or by demanding anything adversely to both, an individual creditor of one partner, who has attached the firm assets, cannot intervene in an action to dissolve the partnership and distribute the assets under direction of the court to the parties entitled thereto after payment of partnership debts.

4. In an action to dissolve a partnership and to distribute the assets through a receiver, the bona fides of mortgages made by defendant partner on separate property, or the question whether plaintiff and defendant were conspiring to defeat intervenor in another county, cannot be litigated by intervention.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Amador county.

Petition by the Bank of Yolo for leave to intervene in the suit of Michael Isaacs against Morris Jones and others. From an order denying the petition, the bank appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Thomas and E. A. Bush, for appellant. Robert T. and W. H. Devlin, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff and the defendant Bernhard Isaacs formed a partnership in the town of Lone, in 1873, for business purposes, and continued to conduct business under their partnership relation until some time in 1895, when the defendant Bernhard became legally incompetent of contracting, and by an order and judgment of the superior court of Amador county was adjudged to be an incompetent person, and unfit to manage his property; and the defendant Morris Jones was appointed the guardian of his estate, and letters of guardianship were duly issued to him. Plaintiff thereupon determined upon a dissolution of the partnership, and has brought the present action to wind up its affairs, including an accounting and determination of the respective rights of the parties hereto, and such distribution of the proceeds of the partnership property as may be proper and just. The complaint alleges also that it is necessary that a receiver of the partnership property be appointed "to take charge thereof, and to collect the demands due to said partnership, and to pay off the claims against the same, and deliver to the parties entitled their respective shares, after the same are determined by an accounting and judgment of this court." Upon the filing of the complaint and petition therefor a receiver was appointed. After the present action had been commenced, and after the appointment of the receiver, the Bank of Yolo commenced an action in the superior court of Yolo county against the defendant Bernhard Isaacs upon a promissory note made to it by him in June, 1895, and caused a writ of attachment to be issued in said action, which was levied by the sheriff of Amador county upon certain real estate in said county, and under which garnishments were served upon the receiver and upon the plaintiff and the guardian of Bernhard. Thereafter the Bank of Yolo presented its petition to the superior court of Amador county for leave to intervene in the present action "as a creditor of the defendant Bernhard Isaacs, one member of said firm, and to appear therein for and in behalf of itself and said Isaacs as against the other parties to the action, and for all other persons similarly situated." In its petition it set forth that it had commenced the action against Bernhard, and the proceedings under the writ of attachment issued therein, and averred that it has thereby acquired a lien upon all of said property of the partnership, and upon the interest of said Bernhard in the real estate levied upon. It also stated that Bernhard is reasonably worth not less than $50,000, and that the officers of the petitioner "have been informed" that he intended to defraud it out of said debt, and that "said bank verily believes" that he has entered into a conspiracy with the plaintiff to defeat the bank in the collection of the note. The petition also alleges that the application for the appointment of the guardian of Bernhard was insufficient to support the order, and that the facts alleged in the petition for said appointment were not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to make the order, and that since his appointment the guardian has not properly discharged his duties; and also that the order appointing a receiver was not authorized either by the facts alleged in the petition therefor or the manner in which the appointment was sought, and that the person appointed is unsuitable for that office. Upon these averments the petitioner asked, in addition to being permitted to intervene, that the parties to the action show cause why the order appointing a receiver should not be revoked, and all property belonging to Bernhard, or in which he has an interest, be delivered to the sheriff, and why the sheriff should not proceed to sell and dispose of it under his writ of attachment. A citation was issued to the parties to the action, and their demurrer to the petition was sustained by the court, and an order made denying the petition. From this order the Bank of Yolo has appealed.

The right of the appellant to intervene in the action is not enlarged or diminished by the action of the court in appointing the receiver, or by his conduct after his appointment. The court had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver in the action, and whatever error it may have committed in making the appointment, or in not controlling his conduct, may be corrected at the instance of the parties to the action, but it does not confer upon a stranger the right to intervene in the action. Neither is the action of the court in appointing a guardian for Bernhard Isaacs open to a collateral attack. The order therefor was made by a court of competent jurisdiction, and, in the absence of a direct attack, will be presumed to have been correctly made. Section 387, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "Any person may before the trial intervene in an action or proceeding, who has an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both. An intervention takes place when a third person is permitted to become a party to an action or proceeding between other persons, either by joining the plaintiff in claiming what is sought by the complaint, or by uniting with the defendant in resisting the claims of the plaintiff, or by demanding anything adversely to both the plaintiff and the defendant." There have been many decisions upon the right of intervention which is given by this section, but in none of them has there been any attempt to define the right in any clearer terms than those of the section itself. Whether any particular case is within the terms of the premises is best determined by a consideration of the facts of that case; and the consideration of the effect of any particular construction to be given to a statute is of advantage in determining the construction to be given to it, and is frequently decisive of the question. To avail himself of the right given by this section, the applicant must have either an interest in the matter in litigation or in the success of one of the parties to the action, or an interest against both of them. The interest here referred to must be direct, and not consequential, and it must be an interest which is proper to be determined in the action in which the intervention is sought. In one sense it may be said that a creditor of the plaintiff in an action for damages may have an interest in his recovering judgment against the defendant, since thereby he may be able to recover his own debt; but such interest will not give him the right to intervene in the action. The second sentence of the section above quoted itself defines the circumstances under which an intervention may be had, and is to that extent a limitation upon the terms used in the first sentence. The third person must have an interest in claiming what is sought by the complaint, or in resisting the claim of the plaintiff, or must demand something which is involved in the litigation adversely to both of the parties.

The object of the present action is a distribution, under the direction of the court, of the assets of the partnership, including the determination of the amount thereof to which each partner will be entitled after the payment of all the partnership claims. Although the individual partners are entitled to the surplus according to their interests as the same shall be ascertained by the court, a litigation in the action of disputed claims against the individual partners is not appropriate. If every claim against each of the partners could be made the subject of a distinct issue and determination in such an action, it is easily seen that the litigation might be indefinitely prolonged. When the partnership affairs have been adjusted, the court should enter its judgment in accordance with such adjustment. Its authority to appoint a receiver rests upon its right to retain in its possession the property of the partnership until the rights of the several claimants thereto have been satisfied, and when this has been accomplished the receiver is to be discharged. The court is not authorized to retain in its possession thereafter the property adjudged to belong to the individual partners, for distribution among their respective creditors, any more than it would have been authorized to appoint a receiver for that purpose in the first instance. So far as the rights of these creditors are legal rights, they are to be enforced in the ordinary mode for enforcing legal obligations. In the present case the appellant alleges that it has secured its claim against Bernhard Isaacs by the lien of an attachment, and it appears from the record that the court refused the motion of the plaintiff to dissolve the attachment. This lien of the appellant is upon the entire share of his debt or in the surplus assets of the partnership, and such lien will be available to him when he shall have obtained a judgment in the action in Yolo county. He has not yet established any claim against this surplus, and, as it is possible that he may not obtain a judgment in that action until long after the partnership affairs shall have been adjusted in the present action, it would be unjust to permit an intervention here, the only effect of which would be to tie up the property until the determination of the suit in Yolo county. If he shall obtain judgment in that action prior to the entry of judgment herein, a sale under that judgment of the interest of Bernhard Isaacs in the real estate upon which his attachment has been levied, as well as in the partnership property, will make the purchaser its owner, and entitled to receive from the court whatever may be found to belong to Bernhard. If, as is alleged, Bernhard Isaacs has made fraudulent mortgages upon the attached property, that is a question to be determined when the appellant or some other purchaser shall become clothed with title to the property; and, if the plaintiff herein is conspiring with Bernhard to defeat the appellant in the action in Yolo county, the resistance against such conspiracy must be made in the action in that county. Neither of these matters is properly a subject to be litigated in this action, and neither of them gives any ground for an intervention by the appellant. The order is affirmed.

MINER v. JUSTICE'S COURT OF TOWN OF
BERKELEY et al. (S. F. 1149.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 24, 1898.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—
SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

1. A freeholders' charter of a city adopted under Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that such charter, when approved, shall become the organic law thereof, and supersede any existing charter, operates to abolish justices' courts in such city created by a former charter enacted by the legislature; and, since inferior courts cannot be created under the constitution by a freeholders' charter adopted by mere resolution of the legislature, such courts continuing after the adoption of such a charter by a city are without jurisdiction.

2. Act March 27, 1895, created a court for the town of Berkeley, to be known as "the justice's court of the town of Berkeley," consisting of two justices of the peace, and provided that the judicial power of the town should vest in such court and such other courts as may be provided by law. Held, that this act was special and local legislation, within the prohibition of the constitution, and therefore void.

Beatty, C. J., and Van Fleet and McFarland, JJ., dissenting.

In bank.

Mandamus by one Miner against the justice's court of the town of Berkeley and W.

H. H. Gentry, justice of the peace, to compel the issuance of an execution on a judgment recovered by petitioner in said court. Denied.

R. Y. Hayne and Brewton A. Hayne, for petitioner.

HARRISON, J. Application for a writ of mandate. The petitioner seeks by this writ a direction to the respondents, commanding the said Gentry to issue an execution upon a judgment alleged to have been recovered by the petitioner against A. M. Niver in the justice's court for the town of Berkeley, July 20, 1897, on an action commenced therein July 9, 1897. The question presented for determination is whether the justice's court for the town of Berkeley was in existence at the time the plaintiff commenced the action against Niver, or subsequent thereto, and this involves a consideration of the effect of the adoption of a freeholders' charter upon the previous charter of the town. The town of Berkeley was incorporated by an act of the legislature passed April 1, 1878 (St. 1878, p. 888). Section 3 of this act declares: "The government of said town shall be vested in a board of trustees to consist of five members, an assessor, a marshal, who shall be ex officio tax collector, a clerk, a treasurer, two justices of the peace and two constables." Provision is made in other sections for the election and duties of justices of the peace and defining their jurisdiction.

February 26, 1895, the electors of the town of Berkeley adopted a charter, which had been prepared by a board of freeholders chosen therefor under the provisions of section 8 of article 11 of the constitution, and a resolution approving this charter was passed by the legislature March 5, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 409). Section 76 of this charter declares: "The judicial power of the town shall be vested in two justices' courts, and such other courts as may be provided by law." The election and jurisdiction of justices of the peace is provided for in other sections. March 27, 1895, the legislature passed an act entitled "an act to create a court in and for the town of Berkeley, state of California." St. 1895, p. 205. Section 1 of this act is as follows: "There is hereby created and established in and for the town of Berkeley, state of California, a court to be known as the justice's court of the town of Berkeley, which court shall consist of two justices of the peace, and the judicial power of the town shall be vested in said justice's court and such other courts as may be provided by law."

Under the decision of this court in the case of People v. Toal, 85 Cal. 333, 24 Pac. 603, the provision in the freeholders' charter for the creation of a justice's court in the town of Berkeley, and the election of justices therefor, was ineffective. By virtue of the provision in section 8 of article 11 of the constitution, that upon the approval by the legislature of a freeholders' charter "it shall become the charter of such city, and shall become the organic law thereof, and supersede any existing charter, and all amendments thereof, and all laws inconsistent with such charter," the charter of the town of Berkeley which was granted by the act of April 1, 1878, was superseded. Hence the provision in that charter for justices of the peace and a justice's court ceased to exist or have any force after the freeholders' charter was adopted. The contention of the petitioner that, inasmuch as the freeholders' charter could not create a court, it could not have the effect to destroy one which was in existence, was fully considered in Ex Parte Sparks (Cal.) 52 Pac. 715, involving the effect of a provision in the charter of Sacramento, and it was held not to be tenable. It was there said: "The old charter is not repealed because it is so enacted in the new charter, or because its provisions are inconsistent with those of the new charter. The new charter does not abrogate the old ex proprio vigore, but because the constitution declares that such consequence should follow. It is not the passage of an ordinary law, but the establishment of a government. The new is to take the place of the old, however dissimilar, and, although some of the parts of the old charter have no corresponding provisions in the new, there is no presumption that anything is continued, for the new scheme is deemed complete in itself, and to provide all that is desired." The provision for the election of justices in the act of April 1, 1878, was a part of the charter of the town of Berkeley, and was by the terms of that act declared to be a part of the government of the town. It was not necessary that such provision should be made in the charter, but having been placed there it became a part of the charter, and fell with the other parts upon the legislative approval of the freeholders' charter. The act of March 27, 1895, is special and local legislation, and is within the prohibition of the constitution. The act singles out the town of Berkeley from the rest of the state for which provision upon the subject involved in the act has been made by general laws, and purports to create a special tribunal whose jurisdiction is defined in the act itself. The writ is denied.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; TEMPLE, J.

We dissent: BEATTY, C. J.; VAN FLEET, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. In my opinion, that part of the act of April 1, 1878, incorporating the town of Berkeley, which creates the office of justice of the peace, was not repealed by the freeholders' charter of February 26, 1895. It could not have been so repealed, because, as heretofore held, a freeholders' charter cannot deal at all with the judiciary; and therefore that part of the act of February 26th which creates the office of justice of the peace could not be repealed except by a law, and "no law shall be passed except by bill," which must be signed by the governor, or, in the event of his veto, passed by two-thirds of the members of each house of the legislature. Const. art. 4, §§ 15, 16. The provision of section 8 of article 11, that a freeholders' charter shall supersede any existing charter, applies, in my opinion, only to those things which may be legally included in a freeholders' charter, and not to the judiciary. Nor, in my opinion, is the act of March 27, 1895, creating and establishing a justice's court in the town of Berkeley, unconstitutional. Justices of the peace, under article 6, § 1, are constitutional officers, and by section 11 of the same article the legislature is given the power to determine the number of justices to be elected in any town, city, or town; and the legislature is prohibited from passing local or special laws with respect to justices of the peace, only in the matter of "regulating the jurisdiction and duties" thereof. Article 4, § 25. The said act of March 27, 1895, is therefore not unconstitutional, as being special or local, except so far, perhaps, as it undertakes to regulate the jurisdiction of the court. In other respects it is constitutional, and its jurisdiction would be derived from the general law on that subject. In my opinion, the writ ought to issue.

EDWARDS v. GRAND et ux. (L. A. 396.)

MORTGAGE — RECORDING — WHAT CONSTITUTES — FORECLOSURE — ATTORNEY'S FEE.

1. Civ. Code, § 1241, declares that a homestead is subject to execution for a debt secured by a mortgage thereon, "executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record." Section 1170 provides that "an instrument is deemed to be recorded when, being duly acknowledged or proved and certified, it is deposited in the recorder's office with the proper officer for record." Held, that where a mortgage duly executed was delivered to the recorder at his office after five o'clock on the day it was executed, though not recorded until the next morning, it was "filed for record" prior to the declaration of a homestead, handed to the recorder the next morning on his way to the office, with a request that he record it the first thing after the office was opened.

2. An instrument is "filed" for record when it is deposited in the proper office with a person in charge thereof, with directions to record it, although not within the time that the recorder's office is required by statute to be kept open.

3. The indorsement on an instrument of the fact and time of deposit in the recorder's office for filing is not essential to the filing thereof, and does not affect it.

4. Delivery of an instrument required to be filed to the proper officer at a place other than the office where it is to be filed is not sufficient, although the officer indorse it as properly filed.

5. The hours during which a county recorder's office is required by statute to be kept open are for the convenience of the public, but do not limit the time within which individuals may file instruments therein.

6. It is within the jurisdiction of the court in a foreclosure proceeding to determine whether the whole or a portion of the stipulated attorney's fee was a reasonable fee, even if no evidence was presented in reference thereto.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county.

Action by one Edwards against Gerard Grand and wife to foreclose a mortgage on land a part of which was claimed exempt as a homestead. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for sale of the entire property, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellants. W. S. Day, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant Gerard Grand executed a mortgage to the plaintiff November 22, 1892, and on the same day his wife, Maria Jesus Grand, made a declaration of homestead upon a portion of the mortgaged premises. The present action against both husband and wife for the foreclosure of the mortgage is resisted by the wife upon the ground that, to the extent that the mortgaged premises are covered by the declaration of homestead, the mortgage is invalid, for the reason that she did not unite in its execution. The facts relating thereto are as follows: On the day that the mortgage was executed, the agent of the plaintiff took it to the office of the county recorder for record a few minutes after 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and, as the statute only required the office to be kept open until 5 o'clock, he delivered it to the recorder with the request that he would record it the first thing on opening the office on the next morning; and it was thereupon received by the recorder, and left in his office. On the next morning, a little before 9 o'clock, while the recorder was on his way to the office, the declaration of homestead was handed to him, with the request that he would record it the first thing after the office was open, and when he reached his office, finding that the two instruments affected the same premises, he indorsed each of them as follows: "Filed for record November 23, 1892, at nine o'clock a. m." Upon these facts, the court found that the record of the mortgage was in fact prior in point of time to that of the declaration of homestead, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for a sale of the entire mortgaged premises.

Subdivision 4, § 1241, Civ. Code, declares that the homestead is subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of a judgment obtained on a debt secured by a mortgage on the premises "executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record." "An instrument is deemed to be recorded when, being duly acknowledged or proved and certified, it is deposited in the recorder's office with the proper officer for record." Civ. Code, § 1170; Watkins v. Wil- hoit, 104 Cal. 395, 38 Pac. 53. An instrument is "filed" for record when it is deposited in the proper office, with a person in charge thereof, with directions to record it. Tregambo v. Mining Co., 57 Cal. 501. Indorsing the fact and time of its deposit is not an essential part of the filing. Bishop v. Cook, 13 Barb. 326; Smith v. Biscailuz, 83 Cal. 344, 21 Pac. 15, and 23 Pac. 314. Delivering an instrument to the proper officer at a place other than the office where it is required to be filed is not sufficient, even though the officer indorse it as properly filed. Schulte v. Bank, 34 Minn. 48, 24 N. W. 320. See, also, Estate of Sbarboro, 63 Cal. 5. The court therefore properly held that the mortgage was executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record.

The contention of the appellants that, inasmuch as the mortgage was delivered to the recorder after the hour for closing the office, it cannot be deemed to have been filed for record until the hour for opening the office on the next morning, is untenable. We are cited to no authority in support of the proposition that an instrument can be properly filed only within the hours fixed by statute for keeping the office open. These hours are established for the purpose of defining a duty of the officer, and for the convenience of the public, and are not to be construed as limiting the time within which individuals may avail themselves of rights elsewhere conferred by statute.

There was no error in the allowance to the plaintiff of attorney's fees for the foreclosure of the mortgage. O'Neal v. Hart, 116 Cal. 69, 47 Pac. 926. The court could determine whether the whole or a portion of the amount stipulated in the mortgage was a reasonable fee, even if no evidence was presented in reference thereto. Clancy v. Plover, 107 Cal. 272, 40 Pac. 394. The judgment and order are affirmed.

BRODER et al. v. CONKLIN et al. (Sac. 375.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1893.)

JUDGMENTS—FINALITY—APPEAL—EFFECT—SUPERSEDEAS.

1. A judgment rendered on the merits is not final, where an appeal is taken therefrom.

2. A bond on an appeal from a judgment is not necessary or authorized by the Code to stay proceedings as to money turned into court by agreement of parties pending litigation.

3. Where a receiver is discharged, and the funds in his hands are turned into court on a stipulation that defendant shall give a bond to account for the amount, after judgment for defendant and filing appeal bond by plaintiff the court can order the fund paid to defendant, notwithstanding the appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mono county.

Action by one Broder and others against one Conklin and others. From an order entered after judgment for defendants, placing funds of a receiver turned into court into the hands of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Richard S. Miner, for appellants. P. Reddy (W. H. Metson, of counsel), for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal arises from an order made subsequent to judgment in the case of Broder and others against Conklin and others. In view of the fact that the appeal from the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial in the principal case has this day been held ineffectual, and the judgment and order affirmed (53 Pac. 699), it would seem that the appeal in the present case, in its importance to appellants, has been reduced to very small proportions; yet, nevertheless, it demands some consideration.

The facts are these: A receiver was appointed in the above-entitled cause. Upon a stipulation entered into by all the parties he was discharged, and the net proceeds of his receivership were ordered by the court to be placed in the county treasury subject to the further order of the court. These proceedings took place pending the litigation in the main case. After the judgment was rendered by the trial court in that case in favor of defendants, upon application of their attorneys the court ordered these moneys which had been heretofore placed in the hands of the county treasurer to be paid to them. This appeal is now prosecuted from that order.

The particular grounds of fact and law which actuated the trial court in making the order are not plainly disclosed by the record. The motion of defendants for the relief sought is based upon two grounds: (1) That the action of Broder and others against Conklin and others had come to final judgment against plaintiffs; and (2) the bond filed by plaintiffs upon the appeal in that case did not warrant the detention of the money in the hands of the county treasurer. Neither of these positions are tenable; for, firstly, the judgment rendered upon the merits was not a final judgment, for an appeal therefrom was pending in this court at the very time the motion was made; and, secondly, no bond upon appeal from the judgment was necessary, or authorized by the Code, to stay proceedings as to the money held by the county treasurer. See McCallion v. Society, 98 Cal. 442, 33 Pac. 329. But, looking at the other side of the case, the bond given by appellants upon their appeal in the main case did not prevent the trial court from dealing with this fund in the county treasury. The bond given upon that appeal was the statutory bond of $300 and a bond in double the amount of the judgment for costs. Under such circumstances, the trial court was still authorized to deal with the receiver, and also the funds paid into the treasury by him under the aforesaid order of the court. Baughman v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. 572, 14 Pac. 207.

Upon the stipulation, to which reference has already been made, and the bond filed and approved in pursuance of that stipulation, the order of the court from which this appeal is taken is affirmed. By that stipulation it was agreed "that the said receiver be discharged upon the defendant in said action, A. R. Conklin, giving a bond in the sum of ten thousand dollars to pay and account for all the rents and profits, for all the real estate that may come into his hands from this date to the final determination of said action, and that he will pay any judgment which may be recovered against him for the rents and profits of the same." The bond based upon this stipulation provides: "Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, are here and firmly bound to the said plaintiffs in the penal sum of twenty thousand dollars, to the tenor and effect that said defendants shall and will truly account for and pay to the plaintiffs any judgment that may be recovered against them for the rents and profits of said real estate, not exceeding said sum of ten thousand dollars." The money in the hands of the county treasurer was rents of the real estate, and came into Conklin's hands after the signing of the stipulation and the giving of the bond. We have no doubt but that a recovery upon the bond could be had for this money in a proper case. For the foregoing reasons the order is affirmed.

ACTION AGAINST EXECUTOR—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF EXECUTOR'S DENIAL—APPEAL—AFFIRMING ORDER FOR NEW TRIAL—EFFECT.

1. A complaint alleged that the plaintiff rendered services to testatrix, set forth their character and value, the amount paid thereon, the amount still due, and that the testatrix promised to pay for the same by a provision in her will. Without making a specific denial of each of these allegations, the defendant executor, in the form authorized by section 437, Code Civ. Proc., averred that he had no information or belief as to allegations of the complaint sufficient to enable him to answer the same; and he therefore placed his denial of each of said allegations on that ground, and denied each and all of the same, and every part thereof. Held, that his denial was sufficient.

2. As an order granting a new trial in effect vacates the judgment, affirmance thereof leaves nothing in the court below on which an appeal from the judgment can operate.

Action by Josefa Etchas against Leopoldo Orena, as executor, etc., for services rendered defendant's testatrix. A verdict was rendered for plaintiff, and from the judgment, and order of the court granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Gould and C. F. Carrier, for appellant. Thos. McNulta, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. When this cause was called for trial in the superior court, the plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings in her favor; and, the court having denied her motion, she excepted to the ruling. The cause was thereupon tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,500. The defendant moved for a new trial, upon the ground, among others, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict; and, after hearing the motion, the court made an order granting a new trial upon that ground, unless the plaintiff should before a certain day remit all of the verdict in excess of $735. She declined to remit this excess, and has appealed from the judgment, and also from the order granting a new trial.

1. The appeal from the judgment is based upon the refusal of the court to grant her motion for judgment upon the pleading, the appellant contending that such motion should have been granted and judgment rendered in her favor for $2,124, the amount claimed in the complaint. The ground of the motion was that there was no denial in the answer of the allegations of the complaint. The defendant is the executor of the will of Josefa Loureyro, deceased, and the action is brought against him to recover from the estate of the testatrix certain moneys claimed by the plaintiff to be due to her for services rendered the testatrix, and for which claims had been presented against the estate and been rejected by the defendant. In his answer the defendant "avers that he has no information or belief on the subject mentioned in paragraphs one, two, three, and four of said complaint sufficient to enable him to answer the allegations therein contained, and he therefore places his denial of each of said allegations on that ground, and denies each and all of the same and every part thereof." The paragraphs thus referred to are the allegations that the plaintiff rendered services to the testatrix, her character and value, the amount paid thereon, and the amount still due, and that the testatrix promised the plaintiff to pay for the same by making a provision for her in her will. None of these facts were presumably within the knowledge of the defendant, and he was authorized by section 437, Code Civ. Proc., to answer the allegations in the above form. In answering the complaint in this form, it was not necessary that he should make a specific denial of each of the allegations. The several allegations were a connected part of the transaction between the plaintiff and the testatrix out of which her cause of action arose; and, as the defendant was equally without information or belief upon either of them, he could properly make the denial in the form adopted by him. The same form of denial was held sufficient in Read v. Buffum, 79 Cal. 77, 21 Pac. 555.

2. The rule that the trial court may set aside a verdict, if in its opinion it is not sustained by the evidence, or may direct a new trial unless the plaintiff will remit a portion of the verdict if in its opinion the verdict is for more than the evidence will justify, is so well established that it is not necessary to cite authorities in its support. As the order granting a new trial had the effect to vacate the judgment, the affirmance of that order leaves nothing in the court below upon which the appeal from the judgment can operate. Pierce v. Birkholm, 110 Cal. 669, 43 Pac. 205. The order appealed from is affirmed.

WINTERS v. BUCK, Judge. (S. F. 1408.)

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SETTLEMENT—DUTY OF COURT.

Where a bill of exceptions improper for surplusage, in that it was a substantial transcript of the notes of the official stenographer, is presented for settlement, the court will not be justified in refusing to settle it until he has called on the attorney presenting it to remodel it, as directed.

Garoutte and McFarland, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Application by Harry Winters for a writ of mandamus against George H. Buck, judge of the superior court of San Mateo county. Writ granted.

Nagle & Nagle, for petitioner. Henry W. Walker, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The petitioner, Harry Winters, was convicted of murder in the first degree. He moved for a new trial, and his motion was denied. He gave notice of his appeal from the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial, and presented for settlement a purported bill of exceptions, which the trial judge (respondent herein) refused to settle, basing his refusal upon the fact that the proposed bill of exceptions was substantially a transcript of the notes of the official stenographer, taken by him upon the trial. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel a settlement of the bill of exceptions. In justice to the learned judge of the trial court, it should be said that his refusal finds support in declarations in some of the adjudicated cases. People v. Getty, 49 Cal. 581; People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 422; January v. Superior Court, 73 Cal. 537, 15 Pac. 108. But in its later utterances this court has softened the harsh rule previously laid down, and has expressed other views of the duty of the judge under the circumstances here presented,—views which we think are more in consonance with the spirit of the law, and which certainly tend to secure to a defendant the benefits of his appeal, which otherwise, through no fault of his own, but through the indolence or indifference of his counsel, might be wholly lost to him. Thus, in Cohen v. Wallace, 107 Cal. 133, 40 Pac. 101, it is said that it would be far better if the judge of the trial court should disregard technical objections, and should endeavor to settle the bill, rather than to refuse it; and it is pointed out that it is not necessary that the labor of framing a proper bill should be cast upon the judge, but that the party presenting an improper bill could be required by the judge to remodel it. In Sansome v. Myers, 80 Cal. 483, 22 Pac. 212, the trial judge had refused to settle a bill of exceptions because it was inaccurate, untrue, and but a meager and defective skeleton. The court in bank held this to be no sufficient ground for refusal, and what is there said to be the correct rule is as applicable to a case where the proposed bill is improper for deficiencies as where it is improper for surplusage. It is said in that case: "It was not the duty of the judge to prepare a statement, but it was his duty to see that one was properly prepared, and then sign it." It is further said that for the judge to refuse to settle the statement—an imperative duty cast upon him by the statute (Pen. Code, §§ 1174, 1175)—would place it in the power of the judge to deprive a litigant of his right of appeal by simply refusing to perform a plain duty. It need not be apprehended from this that any undue or excessive labor will be cast upon trial judges. If the proposed bill be radically objectionable or obnoxious, it is a simple matter for the trial judge to call upon the attorney to present a proper bill. In this case the offer of defendant's counsel so to do after the refusal of the trial judge was not entertained. Mr. Justice McFarland, in his concurring opinion in Sansome v. Myers, supra, has said: "If the document presented was not in reality a bill of exceptions, that fact should have been called to the attention of the attorney presenting it. The judge should have informed him that for such reason the document would not be considered as a bill of exceptions, and that he must prepare a real bill within a reasonable time." We think this language indicates the true rule, and the proper course under the circumstances for the judge to pursue. Let the writ issue as prayed for.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; TEMPLE, J.; HARRISON, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

I dissent: McFARLAND, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I dissent. In this case the defendant, by his appeal, makes the point that the evidence is not sufficient to establish his guilt. To support this contention, he presents to the trial judge a bill of exceptions containing all the evidence by question and answer introduced at the trial. For this court to recognize the legality of such a practice is in the interest of indolent attorneys, greatly increases the labor of this court, and doubles the expense entailed upon the various counties of the state in the printing of transcript upon appeal. This court has repeatedly held that the trial judge is justified in refusing to settle such a bill of exceptions, and has sustained his action in so refusing. See cases cited in Cohen v. Wallace, 107 Cal. 133, 40 Pac. 101. There is no case to the contrary in the reports of this state.

In re MATHENY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 907.)
HOMESTEAD—DISTRIBUTION—CONFLICTING STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Real estate, the separate property of a married woman, which was, on her decease, set apart by order of court to her surviving husband, for a limited period, as a homestead, where none had been selected by decedent or her husband, was properly distributed to her heirs at law, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1468, by which such property vests in the "heirs" of decedent, subject to such homestead, and not to her devisee, under Civ. Code, § 1265, which provides that it shall go to the "heirs or devisees" of such decedent, as the section first cited is a limitation on the power of testamentary disposition as to such homestead.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Final distribution of the estate of Jane Matheny, deceased. From a decree making such distribution to the heirs at law of decedent the devisee, John A. Miller, appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Richards, for appellant. W. H. Mahoney, for executor. Blake & Harrison, for Matheny. W. W. Davidson, for certain heirs.

CHIPMAN, C. Appeal from decree of final distribution. Appellant, John A. Miller, is the devisee by the will of deceased of certain real estate situated in the city and county of San Francisco. This real estate was the separate property of deceased in her lifetime, and was by order of court duly set apart to her surviving husband as a homestead for the term of five years, none having been selected by decedent or her husband. By decree of partial distribution all the estate was disposed of except the premises in controversy. The final decree distributed this property to the heirs at law of decedent. The sole question presented by appellant to which he asks answer is: What is the effect of an order of a probate court setting apart, for a limited period, separate property of a decedent to the surviving spouse, which has already been devised to another person, and upon which no ante-mortem homestead had been filed? It is conceded by appellant that the question is answered in the case of In re Walkerly's Estate, 108 Cal. 627, 41 Pac. 772, but counsel says that there "the issue was involved in several other perplexing problems, and was comparatively a minor factor in the general result." The precise question arose in that case, was given careful consideration, and received a deliberate answer. It is true that the devise was in trust for, and not directly to, the beneficiaries named; but that fact cannot affect the question. It was earnestly contended in that case, as it is here, that there exists an irreconcilable conflict between section 1468, Code Civ. Proc., by which the separate property selected as a homestead by the court vests in the "heirs" of deceased, subject to the homestead, and section 1265, Civ. Code, where a homestead selected from the separate property during the life of the spouse without his consent goes upon his death to his "heirs and devisees"; and that these sections can only be harmonized, and both allowed to stand, by reading into the section 1468 the words "or devisees." Appellant presents with much clearness the reasons for adopting this method of harmonizing these apparently inharmonious provisions. But we find no phase of the argument now made which did not have consideration in the Walkerly Case. After a clear statement of the objections as then and now urged, and the reasons for not yielding to their force, Mr. Justice Henshaw, in concluding that branch of the opinion, remarks as follows: "The section is plain and unambiguous. Its meaning is in no way uncertain, and when that meaning is found nothing is left but to declare it. The wisdom of the law is for the legislature alone. It is concluded, therefore, that the section is a limitation upon the power of testamentary disposition, and operates to vest the title to the homestead in the heirs at law, and so to withdraw it from the disposition made by the testator under his will." This opinion had the concurrence of an undivided court, which afterwards denied a rehearing. The answer to appellant's question, therefore, as given in the case In re Walkerly's Estate, must be regarded as final and conclusive. The judgment and decree should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and decree are affirmed.

LEMON v. WOLFF et al. (L. A. 397.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1898.)

CHATTEL MORTGAGES — PROSPECTIVE CROPS — FUTURE ADVANCES — STATUTORY FORMALITIES — PRIORITIES — LANDLORD AND TENANT — LIABILITY FOR RENT — PREFERENCE TO CREDITORS.

1. A valid mortgage may be made of a crop to be raised, before it has been planted, to secure future advances as well as existing indebtedness.

2. As between the parties thereto, a chattel mortgage is valid and may be enforced, though the formalities prescribed by statute (Civ. Code, § 2957) have not been observed.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 2957, prescribing certain formalities requisite to the validity of a chattel mortgage as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith, a mere creditor at large, without a lien on the mortgaged property, or some process for the collection or enforcement of his debt, cannot question the sufficiency of such mortgage, where valid as between the parties thereto.

4. Where the mortgagees of certain personal property obtained possession thereof with the consent of the mortgagor, before a creditor adversely interested acquired any lien thereon, they acquired a right thereto, irrespective of any irregularities in their mortgage.

5. Under a lease containing a provision that lessor should have and control all the produce from the leased land, with the right to sell and dispose thereof, until all the stipulated rent should be paid, she acquired no lien thereon or interest therein as against the creditors of lessee, or purchasers from him, though such produce had been harvested and sacked, and placed in a barn on the premises, and though lessor had marked such sacks with her initials, and removed them to a different place in the barn, where there was no evidence that lessee had surrendered to her the possession thereof.

6. Where the common debtor of both plaintiff and defendants, having the right to do so, appropriated the property in controversy in payment of his debt to defendants, in preference to that to plaintiff, defendants, by obtaining possession thereof with such debtor's consent, obtained a prior right thereto.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court Ventura county.

Action by Minnesota Lemon against M. L. Wolff and others to recover for the conversion of certain personal property by defendants. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Blackstock & Ewing, for appellant.
Barnes & Selby, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. W. S. Morton leased a tract of land in Ventura county from the plaintiff for the term of one year from November 1, 1895, at the annual rent of $420, payable before the termination of the lease. The terms of the lease were agreed upon, and a written instrument expressing them was prepared on that day, but was not signed by the parties until the 23d of December. The lease was not recorded, and contained the following provision: "It is agreed, by and between the parties hereto, that the party of the first part shall have and control all produce from said land, and shall have the right to sell and dispose of the same, until the whole amount of the rental herein provided for shall have been paid." On the 8th of November, Morton and his brother executed a chattel mortgage to the defendants upon "the crop of beans now being, standing, and growing, or to be grown, upon" the land leased to him, as security for a promissory note of $100 that day executed to the defendants, and for such monies as should be advanced or merchandise sold to them, not exceeding $500 in addition to the amount of the note. The beans were planted in June, 1896, and in August or September the crop was harvested and sacked and placed in a barn upon the premises. Morton did not pay the note of the advances, and on the 21st of September the defendants took the beans from the premises with the consent of Morton, and under a provision in the chattel mortgage authorizing them to do so, and thereafter disposed of them. The rent of the premises was not paid by Morton, and prior to the removal of the beans by the defendants she loaned him $100 upon their security, and September 15th the sacks in which they were contained were marked with her initials and moved from one side of the barn to the other. The present action was brought to recover the value of the beans, upon the ground that they had been converted by the defendants. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed.

Whether a chattel mortgage upon a crop yet to be planted is valid is a question which has not received a uniform decision. See Ping. Chat. Mortg. § 217 et seq. Whatever may be the law in other states, the right to make a chattel mortgage upon a crop to be raised before the same has been planted was affirmed in Arques v. Wasson, 51 Cal. 620, and has become an established rule of property in this state; and such mortgage may be made to secure future advances as well as an existing indebtedness. Civ. Code, § 2884; Tapia v. Demartini, 77 Cal. 383, 19 Pac. 641; D'Oyly v. Capp, 99 Cal. 153, 33 Pac. 736. As between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, such a mortgage is valid and may be enforced, even though the formalities prescribed in section 2957, Civ. Code, have not been observed. Works v. Merritt, 105 Cal. 467, 38 Pac. 1109. This section makes a failure in such compliance available only to creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith. Only a creditor who has acquired a lien upon the mortgaged property by virtue of some legal proceeding, or who is armed with some process authorizing a seizure of the property, can question the compliance with these formalities. A mere creditor at large, without some process for the collection or enforcement of his debt, cannot question the sufficiency of a mortgage which is valid between the parties thereto. Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 245; Jones v. Graham, 77 N. Y. 628; Button v. Rathbone, 126 N. Y. 187, 27 N. E. 266; Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612. As the defendants obtained possession of the property with the consent of the mortgagor, before the plaintiff acquired any lien thereon, they acquired a right thereto irrespective of any irregularities in their mortgage.

The plaintiff acquired no lien upon the beans by virtue of the foregoing provision in the lease. Society v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 236, 44 Pac. 561; Ferguson v. Murphy, 117 Cal.

134, 48 Pac. 1018. She was not entitled to recover from the defendants either the beans or their value, by reason merely of being a creditor of Morton. Being his creditor gave her no right to this specific property. She had, however, the right to obtain a lien upon it by virtue of some legal process, and, after obtaining such lien, to claim its priority over that of the defendants.

Neither did the plaintiff, by the act of marking the sacks and moving them to a different place in the barn, acquire any interest in the beans as against the creditors of Morton, or any one who should purchase them from him. Such acts did not constitute a delivery or change of possession of the property. Byxbee v. Dewey (Cal.) 47 Pac. 52; Button v. Rathbone, supra. The court finds that at the time the defendants took the beans from the premises they were in the possession of Morton, and under the evidence it was authorized to make this finding. The lease to Morton gave him the right to the possession of the land as against the plaintiff, and, having taken possession under the lease, he was presumptively in possession during its term. If the plaintiff would claim that he had surrendered the possession, this was affirmative matter to be shown by her. There was no direct evidence of this fact, and there was evidence to the contrary before the court.

The rent for the premises was, by express agreement between the parties, payable "before the termination of the term," and the plaintiff had no claim therefor at the time the beans were taken by the defendants (or, indeed, when the present action was commenced); and, as the beans were then in the possession of Morton, he had the right to appropriate them to the payment of his debt to the defendants, irrespective of the mortgage. As between his creditors, he had the right to give a preference to either, and the defendants, by obtaining possession of the property with his consent, obtained a prior right thereto. See Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612. The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (Cr. 396.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1898.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—VENUE—PLEA—SECOND TRIAL—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL.

1. Evidence which is introduced without objection may be considered as aiding in establishing any fact which it tends to prove.

2. Where the witnesses in a prosecution for manslaughter committed in K. county state that the deceased was killed at a certain store, and it incidentally appears from the testimony of several witnesses that the store named is in K. county, the venue is sufficiently established.

3. Where one accused of manslaughter pleads not guilty, and also "once in jeopardy," and the jury find against him on the latter plea, and disagree on the former, he is not entitled to have his plea of "once in jeopardy" submitted to the jury at his second trial.

4. In a prosecution for manslaughter, the evidence of the state consisted principally of the evidence of two men who testified that defendant killed deceased; but at the inquest and preliminary examination they testified that they did not know who did the killing. Defendant's brother was present when deceased was killed, and defendant testified that his brother told him that deceased killed himself, but his brother did not testify. Held, that comments by the district attorney in his argument to the jury to the effect that the defense had subpoenaed the brother, and then did not put him on the stand, and that the presumption of law was that the brother's testimony would have been adverse to defendant, were unauthorized, and the overruling of defendant's objections thereto material error.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Kern county.

Gonzales Smith was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Ahern and J. W. P. Laird, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the State.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant was convicted of manslaughter for the killing of one Emelio Bencomo, in the county of Kern, and was adjudged to suffer imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 10 years. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying him a new trial.

1. Appellant's first contention is that there was no evidence to prove venue. But this objection is not sustained by the record. It is true, as appellant urges, that no witness was asked the direct question, nor testified in so many words, that the killing took place in Kern county; but this was not essential if the fact otherwise sufficiently appeared. Appellant contends that the only evidence touching upon the question was contained in the deposition of the witness Miller, taken at the coroner's inquest; that this deposition was introduced at the trial for another purpose, and was not competent or admissible to prove venue. The deposition was introduced and read in its entirety without objection; and, while the primary purpose of its introduction was apparently other than to establish the venue, the purpose was not limited, and, being in, the evidence could be regarded in aid of any fact which it tended to establish. A defendant may waive the objection that evidence is incompetent, and a failure to object to it on that ground is such waiver. But, independently of the deposition, there was evidence sufficient to show that the offense was committed in the county of Kern. All of the witnesses refer to and designate the place where deceased was shot and killed as being at "Scodie's store," and it incidentally appears in the testimony of several of the witnesses, and without conflict, that this store was in the town of Onyx, in Kern county.

2. At the first trial of the case, in February, 1897, the defendant, with his plea of not guilty, introduced the plea of "once in jeopardy." As a result of that trial, the jury returned this verdict: "We, the jury impaneled to try the above-entitled cause, find for the people upon the plea of once in jeopardy, introduced by defendant; that is, we find that he has not been in jeopardy. James Curran, Foreman." But upon the plea of not guilty to the charge laid in the information the jury announced that they were unable to agree upon a verdict, and were discharged. Subsequently, in May, 1897, the cause was tried a second time. The record does not disclose whether the issue raised by the plea of jeopardy was again submitted to the jury upon this second trial, or that any evidence was offered in support thereof; but the jury returned a verdict convicting defendant of manslaughter, without any mention of the special plea. Thereupon the defendant made a motion for a new trial, but made no mention therein, nor in his bill of exceptions, of said plea of jeopardy, or any assignment of error based thereon or growing out of the trial thereof, in any way. His motion was denied, and judgment entered against him, which constitute the order and judgment from which this appeal is prosecuted.

It is now urged that defendant was entitled to have his special plea again submitted to the jury at his second trial, and to a verdict thereon at their hands, and that the judgment could not competently be entered against him without such finding. In other words, appellant's position is that the verdict of the jury upon that issue at his first trial, by reason of the failure to find upon the question of guilty, went for naught, and was wholly nugatory, and should not have been received; apparently upon the theory that, as no final judgment of conviction could be entered upon such verdict, no appeal would lie therefrom, nor any opportunity be afforded to the defendant to have the trial of that issue reviewed, and consequently that that issue should now be regarded as if never tried. But this objection is determined adversely to the position of the appellant by the case of People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 148, 3 Pac. 597. In that case the defendant, under an indictment for murder, had been previously tried upon the plea of "former conviction," and a verdict found against him thereon. Subsequently he was placed on trial under the same indictment, upon his plea of not guilty. At this second trial he asked to be permitted to again interpose the special plea, but this was refused, and the refusal was assigned as error. The objection was briefly answered in this court by the obvious suggestion that "the defendant had been tried on his plea of former conviction, and it was not the duty of the court to grant him another trial on that." Upon reason and principle, this must be so. Why should a defendant be entitled to a second trial of such an issue any more than that of guilt, except for error?

But it is said that it was error to receive such a partial verdict; that the contemplation of the statute is that the pleas of the defendant shall be tried and determined together. It is true that such is the more usual, more expeditious, and more desirable mode of trying criminal cases; but there is nothing in the statute, nor any reason, imperatively demanding that course. A plea of this character is in no way dependent upon or interwoven with that of not guilty, but is separate and apart therefrom; and there is nothing, therefore, in the nature of things, precluding the idea of trying it separately. The defendant had a verdict in response to both his pleas before final judgment was entered, and that was all he was entitled to.

But it is said that in such a case defendant can have no opportunity to have reviewed any error occurring in the trial of his special plea. This is refuted by the ruling in the Majors Case, and by the provisions of the statute. The fact that the special plea has been tried first, no matter how long before the question of guilt is determined, does not preclude defendant from moving for a new trial for any error arising therein. As suggested in the first appeal in People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 100, 3 Pac. 401, the statute does not contemplate a motion for a new trial until all the issues of fact have been tried. When those issues have been determined, and before final judgment is entered, the defendant has his motion for a new trial, upon which may be assigned and reviewed the errors, if any, occurring in the trial of any or all of the issues. That was the course pursued and recognized in People v. Majors, first above cited (65 Cal. 138, 3 Pac. 597), and to our minds a perfectly proper and logical one.

3. The most serious exception in the case is that based upon certain statements of the district attorney made in his closing argument to the jury, and the ruling of the court thereon. The evidence disclosed that there were present at the time Bencomo was killed but four persons other than deceased,—the defendant, his brother, John Smith, one Porfirio Tapia, and a lad named Harvey Mills. John Smith, the brother, was informed against jointly with defendant for the murder of the deceased, but prior to the trial had, on motion of the district attorney, been ordered discharged. Whether he had in fact been discharged, or was for some reason still in custody at the time of the trial, the record does not disclose. It was suggested at the argument that he was yet in custody, but there is no evidence to show that such was the fact. There is nothing in the record to show that he was present at the trial, or in the county, or even within reach of the process of the court at that time; and he was not called as a witness. Tapia and Mills were the principal witnesses for the state. They testified at the trial that the deceased was shot and killed by defendant, and they gave their version of the details of the shooting. There was evidence, however, on the part of the defense, tending more or less strongly to impeach the testimony of these witnesses, by showing that they had both theretofore made statements at variance with their evidence, to the effect that, while they were near the place of the shooting at the time it occurred, they did not see it, nor know who did it. In fact, it was shown that they had testified substantially to that effect before the coroner at the inquest on the body of deceased, and again at the preliminary examination of the accused. The defense was that the defendant did not commit the act; and in support of this defense the defendant testified that he was going to or standing by his horse at some distance from, and with his back to, the deceased at the time the shots were fired; that he heard the shots, but did not do the shooting, nor see who did it; that, when he started to go to his horse, he left his brother John and the deceased in conversation; and that, when he returned to where the deceased was lying after the shots were fired, his brother was still there, and told him that deceased had shot himself.

We are not to judge of the probabilities of this defense, nor of the case made by the prosecution; those were questions exclusively for the jury. But the defendant was entitled as of right to have the question of his guilt determined solely upon the evidence placed before the jury; and this right, it is claimed, was denied him by what follows: During his closing argument the district attorney stated to the jury: "There was present at that shooting Gonzales Smith, John Smith, Tapia, Harvey Mills; and Emelio Bencomo was killed. Now, sir, Mr. Tapia and Mr. Harvey Mills came on this stand and told you the story of the shooting. Mr. Gonzales Smith comes onto that stand, the defendant, and denies the story as given by those two men. Now, sir, I say, 'Where is John Smith?'" At this point the defendant interposed this objection: "If your honor please, we object to the district attorney commenting on the fact that John Smith was not called as a witness by the defendant, and we ask the court to instruct the district attorney that he has no right to comment on that to the jury." The district attorney: "That is just exactly the proposition I propose to talk to you about, and you gentlemen can see the defense is afraid of it or they never would have squealed." The defendant again objected to the remarks of the district attorney as improper, and asked for a ruling of the court on his objection. The court remarked that "the district attorney can comment on the fact, if he desires to," to which ruling the defendant excepted. Thereupon the district attorney further stated to the jury: "The presumption of the law is that, if John Smith had testified before you gentlemen as to the facts in this case,—the presumption of the law is that his testimony would have been adverse to the defense.” To this statement the defendant objected as improper, and asked a ruling of the court. The court: “Let the district attorney proceed with his argument.” The defendant’s attorney: “Note an exception.” The district attorney: “He was subpoenaed as a witness on the part of the defense, and not put on the stand.” The defendant’s attorney: “Note an exception to the remark of the district attorney commenting on something that is not in evidence.” The court: “You have got the benefit of the objection on this particular line of the district attorney’s argument, and don’t interrupt him any more.” It is hardly necessary to say that these statements by the district attorney were under the circumstances wholly unauthorized and highly improper, and that the overruling by the court of defendant’s objections thereto was error. Nor can we avoid the conclusion that the error was one calculated to greatly prejudice the defendant’s case. There was, as we have seen, no evidence to warrant the facts stated by the district attorney in the remarks quoted, nor the unfavorable inference deduced therefrom; and yet the court, by its ruling, implicitly told the jury that both the statement of fact and the deduction made by the district attorney therefrom were proper matters for their consideration. If the jury acted in the belief, as presumptively they did, that John Smith was not called by the defendant because he knew that his evidence would be against him, the consideration could but bear heavily against the degree of credence they might otherwise, and in view of the strong impeachment of the main witnesses of the prosecution, have given the case of the defendant; since it appeared without conflict that John Smith was an eyewitness of the affair, and therefore presumably knew the truth as to whether the deceased was killed by the defendant, or shot himself. The error was therefore a material one, and for it the case must be reversed. The rule is universal that it is error to permit counsel, against objection, in argument before the jury, to make statements of, or comments upon, facts not in evidence; and, unless the court can see clearly that the error was as to some matter which could not in its nature have prejudiced the defendant’s case, the judgment will be reversed. People v. Mitchell, 62 Cal. 411; State v. Hatcher (Or.) 44 Pac. 584. We find no other error in the case. The action of the court in modifying the instructions complained of was proper, and its rulings upon evidence correct. For the error above pointed out, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

AMBROSE v. BARRETT et al. (Sac. 390.)

MORTGAGE—PAYMENT.

A mortgagee, residing in one state, at the request of a mortgagor in another state, forwarded his note and mortgage and a release to the express agent where the mortgagor resided, with instructions to allow the mortgagor to examine them, and to deliver them to him on payment of a stated amount. The agent did as instructed, but before he could put the money in his safe it was attached on a claim of the mortgagor against the mortgagee. Held, that the mortgage was satisfied.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Madera county.

Action by Thomas Ambrose against James R. Barrett and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Mullany, Grant & Cushing, for appellant.
L. L. Coiy, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage upon real estate. Barrett and wife, mortgagors, resided in the town of Cazenovia, state of New York. Ambrose, the mortgagee, resided in the city of San Francisco. The note being due, and the mortgagors desiring to pay it, Barrett wrote to Ambrose at San Francisco, requesting him to send all the necessary papers by express, C. O. D., with permission to examine them as to their correctness upon their arrival, and stating that, if they were correct, he would thereupon pay the amount due upon the note. In response Ambrose executed the proper papers, and placed them in the possession of Wells, Fargo & Co., San Francisco, with the following written instructions: “San Francisco, April 19, 1894. Agent at Cazenovia, New York State: Please collect from James Russell Barrett twenty-five hundred and sixty-three dollars up to this date, and fifty cents per day from the date of this note until paid, and expense of collection of same and forwarding same to San Francisco, Cal. And don’t give papers up until money is paid, but let him examine papers. Thomas Ambrose.” These papers consisted of the note, mortgage, and release, and upon their arrival at point of destination Barrett appeared at the express office, accompanied by his attorneys, and the agent of the company passed over the papers for examination. Upon examination they were pronounced satisfactory, and thereupon Barrett handed to the agent of the express company the amount due upon the note, with $20 additional, expense of collection. The money was counted by the agent in the presence of all parties, whereupon, finding it correct, the agent took it in his hands, and walked towards the safe for the purpose of placing it there for temporary safekeeping. At that moment the sheriff of the county, at the instance and by instruction of Barrett and his attorneys, took the money from the agent of the express company under a levy and attachment upon a purported claim held by Barrett against Ambrose. The evidence in the record is very meager as to the nature of this claim and the subsequent proceedings had thereon in the state of New York. However, it does appear that this money, less costs, was eventually paid back to Barrett by the sheriff under those proceedings. Upon the foregoing state of facts the trial court found that the note was paid and the mortgage satisfied, and rendered judgment in favor of defendants. The important question presented upon this appeal is, was the note paid? or, rather, should this court disturb a finding of fact to that effect? Putting the proposition here involved in a different form, it is thus presented: At the time the money was taken by the sheriff, was it Barrett's money or the money of Ambrose? Or, again, if a robber had taken the money from the agent at the moment the sheriff took it, as between Barrett and Ambrose, who would suffer the loss? These interrogatories must be answered in line with the finding of fact made by the trial court. At the time the money was taken from the agent he had a complete and perfect possession over it. The papers had been delivered by him to Barrett, and the transaction between them was entirely closed. Everything to be done at that office had been done. It follows that if this agent of the express company was the agent of Ambrose, and acted as such in receiving the money and delivering the papers, then the money was the property of Ambrose when taken by the sheriff. When we examine the written authorization of Ambrose addressed to the agent, heretofore set out, nothing can be plainer than the fact that this agent was acting for Ambrose in the transaction had with Barrett; for by that authorization Ambrose directly instructs him not to give up the papers until the money is paid. That this agent was to receive the money from Barrett for Ambrose is perfectly apparent.

Appellant warmly insists that the whole transaction between Barrett, his attorneys, the sheriff, and the express agent, was collusive, and a gross fraud upon him. There is no evidence of it in the record, and the findings of fact are the other way. Certainly there is nothing to indicate that either the sheriff or the express agent were parties to any trick or fraudulent scheme. As to Barrett himself, it is not disclosed but that he had a perfect legal cause of action against Ambrose. He might have had such a cause of action. The record does not disprove it; and, if he had, there is no reason in law why he should not attach this money upon a claim based thereon. It may appear inferentially that Barrett adopted the plan of having this money paid to Ambrose in the state of New York for the particular purpose of giving the sheriff an opportunity to levy upon it in the action contemplated by him against Ambrose. And we find nothing in the record indicating any deeper scheme than this. In conceding that to be the fact, such concession would not operate to set aside and nullify the payment of the money to the agent of Ambrose. There would be no fraud in the transaction which could possibly compass that result. Looking at the case from all sides, we do not see a great injustice done to Ambrose by the judgment of the trial court. If Barrett's claim against him was a fraud and a myth, he should have pursued and recovered his money. If Barrett's claim was legal and just, the money has been well applied. If the claim was a fraud and a myth, the carelessness of Ambrose in neglecting to stamp its baseness with the seal of the courts of the state of New York leaves him now where equity will not greatly concern herself in securing for him a return of the money. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GILMORE. (Cr. 365.)

CRIMINAL LAW — INTOXICATION AS A DEFENSE — HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 22, providing that, whenever the existence of any particular motive is necessary to constitute any particular crime, the jury may consider the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time in determining his motive, a jury is warranted in holding accused responsible for a robbery committed while intoxicated, which he confessed to when in full possession of his faculties.

2. No prejudicial injury results from sustaining an objection to a proper question on cross-examination as to the manner of accused when intoxicated, where, by other questions to the same witness, the information sought is elicited, and the witness further testifies that accused was not intoxicated the day after the commission of the crime, when he confessed having committed it.

3. An instruction concerning intent, as an element in the commission of crime, is not objectionable because it omits to state that a conclusion adverse to defendant must be one that does not admit of a reasonable doubt, where the jury were elsewhere fully instructed as to the doctrine of reasonable doubt.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county.

S. A. Gilmore was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Daly and E. A. Rodgers, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

CHIPMAN, C. Defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary in the first degree, and was sentenced to four years' imprisonment at San Quentin. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying motion for a new trial.

1. It is claimed by defendant that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, because

(1) It was inadequate to convict; and (2) the evidence introduced showed the defendant incapable of committing the crime. The contention is that the evidence showed that defendant, by reason of his intoxicated condition, was incapable of forming a guilty intent, and that there was not a single circumstance corroborative of his confession. Section 22 of the Penal Code is as follows: "No act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such condition. But whenever the actual existence of any particular purpose, motive or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of crime, the jury may take into consideration the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time, in determining the purpose, motive or intent with which he committed the act." The evidence tended to show that defendant was in full possession of his faculties when he made his uncontradicted confession. In it he told where some of the stolen property could be found, and it was found there. He furnished a key to the barn in which the property was found, and remarked (which is not denied), when handing it to the officer, "It may be of use to you," and it was found useful. His confession was therefore in some substantial degree corroborated by circumstances and facts. While the evidence tended to show that defendant was "crazy drunk" during Monday, and talked in an incoherent and wild sort of way, even claiming that he was "Dunham," the hunted murderer, and while it appeared that when drunk he was in the habit of talking in an irresponsible and reckless manner, it also appeared that when sober "he was a square, straight man," and that, in fact, when he made the confession "he talked as rational as any man." The jury might well conclude that if he was so drunk as to be incapable of a criminal intent when he committed the act, he could not have remembered such details the next morning as he gave of the robbery; and so might the jury refuse to attribute to mere coincidence the fact that his story told at 11 o'clock the next morning turned out to contain circumstances which no person in a condition of maudlin drunkenness or irresponsibility would have been at all likely to remember. We cannot say that the jury were not warranted in holding the defendant responsible for the part he took in the robbery.

2. On cross-examination the witness Jackson was asked the following question by defendant's attorney: "Q. You have seen him [defendant] around there [referring to witness' saloon] a great deal when under the influence of liquor. What was his manner and talk?" The question was objected to, and the objection was sustained on the ground that it was too general. We think the question was a proper one, but the subsequent answers of the witness show that counsel for defendant drew out the facts he desired, and it also appeared from this witness' testimony that defendant was not drunk the day after the burglary, and did not talk like a drunken man. We cannot see that any prejudicial injury resulted from the ruling of the court.

3. We see no error in the instruction complained of. It reads: "In every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent or criminal negligence. The essence of every crime is criminal intent, without which the offense cannot be committed. It is the intent with which an act is done that constitutes its criminality. The act and criminal intent must concur to constitute the crime. The intent or intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the accused. * * * As to the intent or intention, you must arrive at it from all the testimony in the case, and all the acts, conduct, or circumstances shown in the case." The objection is that the latter part of the instruction commanded the jury to arrive at a conclusion as to the intent; that there was no warning given that, if adverse to the defendant, the conclusion reached must be one which does not admit of reasonable doubt. The jury were elsewhere fully instructed as to the doctrine of reasonable doubt, and also that "where two conclusions can be drawn from a single circumstance, one tending to establish guilt and the other tending towards the innocence of the accused, the law makes it your duty to accept the conclusion tending towards innocence rather than the one tending towards guilt." These were asked by and given for defendant, and we think fully informed the jury as to how the evidence should be applied. We discover no error, and recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. VISELICH. (Sac. 338.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1898.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS —APPEAL—NOTICE.

Under St. 1885, p. 156 ("Street Improvement Act") § 11, providing that, on appeal from any act of the superintendent of streets to the city council, notice of the time and place of hearing, etc., shall be published for five days, a general notice of appeal from a paving assessment, not limited to any particular person, need not mention the names of persons affected.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by one Williams, administrator, against one Viselich. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appealed. Reversed.

J. H. Budd and J. E. Budd, for appellant. James A. Louttit, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action upon a street assessment. Upon the completion of the work an assessment therefor was made by the street commissioner, from which the contractor appealed to the city council. The city council, after hearing the appeal, set aside the assessment, and directed that another be made, and upon this latter assessment the present action was brought, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendant. The ground presented in support of the appeal therefrom is that the notice of the appeal to the city council from the first assessment was insufficient, and that the city council acquired no jurisdiction to hear the same, and that the assessment made under its direction created no lien upon the property of the defendant. The notice of an appeal from any act of the superintendent of streets to the city council, which is required to be given, is defined in section 11 of the street improvement act (St. 1885, p. 156) as follows: "Notice of the time and place of the hearing, briefly referring to the work directed to be done, or other subject of appeal, and to the acts, determinations, or proceedings objected to or complained of, shall be published for five days." The notice which was published in the present case was as follows: "Notice is hereby given that an appeal of John E. Magary, contractor, for paving with basalt and curbing with granite curbing Washington street, from Hunter street to El Dorado street, in the city of Stockton, to the city council of said city, from the assessment for such paving and curbing made by the street commissioner of said city, and from the diagram and warrant thereto attached, on the ground that some of the lots so assessed were assessed to the wrong persons, and for informalities of said assessment, diagram and warrant, will be heard by said city council at its regular meeting to be held at the court room of department No. 1 of the superior court of San Joaquin county, California, on the 28th day of May, 1888, commencing at eight o'clock p. m. of that date, or as soon thereafter as same can be heard. Dated May 18, 1888. C. A. Campbell, Clerk of the City of Stockton." This notice sufficiently refers to the work contracted to be done for which the assessment was made, and also refers to the assessment as the act and proceeding of the superintendent objected to, and names the time and place at which the appeal will be heard, and was published for five days. It therefore complies with the above provisions of the statute, and authorized the city council to hear the appeal.

The objection made by the respondent to the sufficiency of the notice is that he is not mentioned therein by name, and that for this reason the council did not acquire jurisdiction to affect him or his property upon the appeal, and cites the case of Williams v. Bergin, 108 Cal. 166, 41 Pac. 287, in support thereof. That case, however, presented an entirely different state of facts from the present, and does not support his contention.

In that case the notice of the appeal was by direct terms limited "to the appellants," and we held that it could not be regarded as a notice to any other than those who were named therein, saying: "It was an express notice to the appellants alone, and by its terms implied that they only would be heard, and it must be construed as a notice only to them. By reason of its limitation to the appellants it failed to be a notice to the defendant, and the supervisors acquired no jurisdiction to act upon the appeal." But a notice which is general in its terms, as in the present case, and not limited to any particular individual, is directed to all persons in the entire world who may be affected thereby; and, if the statute under which the notice is given authorizes it to be given by publication, all persons will be bound by it when so given. What is said in Williams v. Bergin, in reference to the necessity of a notice indicating the person who is to be notified, is to be read in connection with the statute and with the facts of that case. The subsequent statement in the opinion, "A notice which by its terms is limited to a portion of those who may be so affected cannot be held to extend to others who may be also interested in the appeal, and is not a compliance with the statute," shows that it is not to be construed as intending to add to the terms of the notice any requirements that the statute itself has not provided for the sufficiency of the appeal. The statute does not require that the person to be affected by the appeal shall be named in the notice, and, as in many cases the persons who are affected by the assessment are named therein "unknown," it is evident that such requirement was not contemplated by the lawmakers. The judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial is directed.

PAULY v. ROGERS et al. (L. A. 430.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—RES JUDICATA.

A junior mortgagee, made a party defendant in foreclosure, filed a cross complaint, setting forth his mortgage, and asking to have it foreclosed; and a decree was rendered foreclosing the senior mortgage, without any action being taken on the cross complaint, which was treated as an answer, but containing a stipulation that any surplus after satisfying the decree should be applied to the junior claim. Held not an action to foreclose, so as to prevent him from thereafter bringing such an action, where other lands are included in his mortgage, within Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt secured by a mortgage.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Action by Frederick N. Pauly, as receiver of the California National Bank of San Diego, against C. W. Rogers and another, to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Haines & Ward, for appellants. M. A. Luce, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The facts of this case may be briefly stated as follows: One C. W. Rogers mortgaged certain real estate to the Security Savings Bank & Trust Company. Thereafter he and defendant Dora I. Rogers mortgaged the same real estate, and also other real estate, by one instrument, to the Pacific Bank. This plaintiff, as the successor in interest of the Pacific Bank, has brought this action to foreclose the mortgage made to the bank. Prior to the commencement of the present action, the corporation holding the first mortgage brought its action of foreclosure, making the Pacific Bank a party defendant. In the present action these defendants, by way of defense, set out the foregoing facts, and others, to the effect that the Pacific Bank, in the action of foreclosure, where it was made a party defendant, admitted by answer all the allegations of the complaint. They also alleged that the bank at that time filed a cross complaint, in which it set out the execution of the note and mortgage sued upon in the present action, and also alleged the nonpayment of such note, and prayed for judgment of foreclosure, with interest and attorney's fees. The defendants' answer in this action further alleges that such proceedings were had in the aforesaid action that a judgment and decree were entered "as follows:" (Setting forth, by exhibit attached, a copy of the decree of foreclosure.) This decree recited the following stipulation: "It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the attorneys for the plaintiff and defendants in this action that, upon the sale of the property described in plaintiff's complaint for the foreclosure of the mortgage in this action, the surplus, if any there be, after satisfying the plaintiff's judgment and costs, shall be turned into court and applied in satisfaction, in whole or in part, as the case may be, of the indebtedness due by the defendant Charles W. Rogers to the Pacific Bank, as set forth in the answer and cross complaint of said Pacific Bank in this action, and that the decree directing the sale of the property described in the mortgage foreclosed by the plaintiff be drawn in accordance with this stipulation, and that findings of fact herein be waived." This stipulation is signed by the attorneys for plaintiff in that action, the attorneys for Charles W. Rogers, and by the attorney for the Pacific Bank. The court by its decree found the amount due plaintiff; that plaintiff was entitled to have his mortgage foreclosed; that Charles W. Rogers "is indebted to the defendant the Pacific Bank in the sum of $5,993.90, with interest thereon from October 19, 1891, at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, compounded monthly, which said sum is secured by mortgage upon a portion of the premises hereinafter described, but that the lien of the Pacific Bank is subject to, and subordinate to, the lien of plaintiff herein"; that the mortgaged premises described in the complaint be sold; that the proceeds of the sale be applied to plaintiff's judgment and costs, and that the surplus "realized from the sale of said property, if any there be, shall be deposited with the clerk of this court, and applied in satisfaction, in whole or in part, as the case may be, of the indebtedness due by the defendant Charles W. Rogers to the Pacific Bank, as set forth in the answer and cross complaint of said Pacific Bank in this action, in accordance with the terms of the stipulation hereinbefore set forth in this decree." The foregoing matters are all set out in the answer in the present action, in the nature of an affirmative defense or bar. Defendants now insist that the Pacific Bank, in setting up its mortgage by cross complaint in the former action, cannot be allowed to bring this action of foreclosure. It is claimed that such a proceeding would be violative of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares, "There can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real estate or personal property." The trial court did not agree with these contentions as to the law, and, upon motion of the plaintiff, struck from the answer of defendants all the matters that we have, in a general way, recited therefrom. The real question here presented involves the validity of the action of the trial court in thus treating these allegations of the defendants' answer.

There are two salient facts, which, when coupled together, defeat the claim of appellants as to the existence of a defense or bar to the prosecution of the present action based upon the facts shown by their answer. First, the decree in the former action does not attempt to foreclose this plaintiff's mortgage; and, second, under the authority of Brill v. Shively, 93 Cal. 674, 29 Pac. 324, there could be no such foreclosure under a cross complaint, conceding an attempt was made so to do. Again, there is no allegation that defendant Dora I. Rogers, a necessary party to the cross complaint, was served with process or appeared in the action. The stipulation upon which the decree is based is not signed by her. There is nothing whatever to indicate that the case was tried and submitted to the court upon the cross complaint as a pleading demanding affirmative relief. A junior mortgagee, made a party defendant in foreclosure, may file an answer setting up his mortgage, and asking that any surplus derived from the sale of the security be applied as a credit upon his note. By following such a course, he in no sense brings an action to foreclose his mortgage, and is not barred from thereafter bringing such action, if other lands are included in his mortgage. This is the decision in Brill v. Shively, supra. In view of this principle of law, and possibly in view of this decision, the trial court, no doubt, pursued the course it did in the first foreclosure proceeding; for, from the facts shown by the present answer, it is evident that the trial court at that time treated the so-called cross complaint merely as an answer setting out the note and mortgage of the Pacific Bank, and asking an application of the residue of the proceeds of the sale to the satisfaction of its claim. The power of a court to treat a pleading simply as an answer of that character, under the circumstances here disclosed, we do not doubt. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

In re MITCHELL'S ESTATE.

MATHEWSON et al. v. GEER et al. (Sac. 423.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 7, 1898.)

APPEALABLE ORDERS—EXECUTORS—PARTIAL DISTRIBUTION—ORDER—INDEMNIFYING BOND—NOTICE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, providing that an appeal may be taken to the supreme court from a judgment or order of the superior court refusing or allowing or directing the distribution of an estate or any part thereof, an appeal may be taken from an order directing payment of certain general pecuniary legacies, and setting aside a former order denying the petition for such distribution.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1663, enacts that any legatee may, at any time after one year from the granting of letters testamentary, apply by petition for distribution of the net proceeds of the share to which he will be entitled, before receiving which he shall give a bond, with security, for the payment of his proportion of the debts of the estate; provided that, where the time for presenting claims has expired and all allowed claims have been paid or are secured, and the court is satisfied that no injury can result, it may dispense with the bond. Held, that where debts that had been allowed were unpaid, and not secured, it was error to order payment of legacies without requiring bonds from the legatees, though the time for filing claims had expired.

3. Where a will created legacies of $5,000 each, on which it developed that a partial payment had already been made, an order directing the executors to pay the whole of said legacies as shown by the will, with legal interest, less the inheritance tax thereon, is erroneous, as being indefinite.

4. Where, at the hearing of a petition for partial distribution, the executors appeared, and it was admitted that due notice was given to them and all parties interested, on a subsequent motion to set aside an order denying such petition notice to the executors' attorneys is sufficient.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county.

In the matter of the estate of John W. Mitchell, deceased, a petition by Grace Mathewson and others for partial distribution was granted, and Henry F. Geer and another, executors, appealed. Reversed.

J. F. Peck, for appellants. Earl H. Webb and C. A. Stonesifer, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. John W. Mitchell died testate, November 26, 1893. By his last will he bequeathed to Grace Mathewson, Minnie Henderson, and Charles Henderson (the assignor of Ellen Wetherbee and B. Schwartz & Co.) legacies of \$5,000 each, amounting in the aggregate to \$15,000. The will was admitted to probate December 16, 1893, and letters testamentary issued to Henry F. Geer and George S. Bloss, the executors named therein. They duly qualified, and gave notice to creditors. The decree establishing such notice was made November 21, 1895. An inventory and appraisement was filed November 21, 1895, showing the estate to be of the value of \$1,364,307.55. The time for presenting claims had expired, and secured claims amounting to say \$160,000, and unsecured claims amounting to \$18,000, had been allowed. The respondents filed their petition for a partial distribution under section 1663, Code Civ. Proc., on the 7th day of April, 1896, containing allegations which, if true, entitled them to distribution. The executors (appellants) filed their opposition to the petition, May 16, 1896, averring, in substance, that there is not sufficient funds on hand or readily attainable to pay the legacies, and that to pay them would embarrass the administration of the estate; that they had been unable to sell the real estate, although they had tried to do so, etc. A hearing was had May 16, 1896, after due notice to all parties in interest, and the cause was submitted, and taken under advisement by the court. On September 11, 1896, the court denied the application of the petitioners "without prejudice to making another application." Thereafter, and on the 17th day of December, 1896, the respondents gave notice to appellants of a motion to set aside the order of September 11th, and for a rehearing and reargument of the application for a partial distribution. This motion was based upon a stipulation between appellants and respondents, executed after the submission of the case and before its decision, viz. on May 26, 1896, whereby it was agreed that no further proceedings should be had in the application for distribution, and that the case should stand submitted, and not be decided for six months from date. In consideration thereof the executors agreed to pay to each of the three respondents the sum of \$1,166.33 $\frac{1}{3}$  on or before June 15, 1896. These several sums were paid to the respondents. This stipulation was not filed, and, so far as appears, was not brought to the attention of the court before its decision in the case. Upon the further hearing and argument the former order was set aside, and an order or decree was entered granting the petition, and ordering "the executors of said estate to pay the legatees or their assigns their respective shares of said estate under the will of said deceased, such payments to be made, one-third on or before the 1st day of March, 1897, and the balance on or before the 30th day of May, 1897, with legal interest thereon, less the inheritance tax thereon." It was further ordered "that no bond be required of said petitioners on said distribution." The order is dated February 27, 1897. Appellants excepted to these rulings, and prosecute this appeal therefrom. The case comes up on a bill of exceptions.

The order is an appealable one. "An appeal may be taken to the supreme court, from a superior court, in the following cases: * * * From a judgment or order * * * refusing or allowing, or directing the distribution or partition of an estate, or any part thereof." Code Civ. Proc. § 963.

Several points are made by appellants for reversal, only one or two of which need be noticed. At the hearing petitioners introduced in evidence the admission of appellants that the unsecured claims against the estate were about $18,000. The order of distribution to the petitioners was for the whole legacies left them by the last will, and, as before stated, it was further ordered "that no bond be required of said petitioners on said distribution." This was error. Section 1658 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that at any time after the lapse of four months from the issuing of letters testamentary, etc., any devisee or legatee may apply to have the legacy or share of the estate to which he is entitled given to him "upon his giving bonds, with security, for the payment of his proportion of the debts of the estate." Section 1661 provides for the amount and character of the bond. Section 1663 of the same Code provides that any heir, devisee, or legatee may, at any time after the lapse of one year from the issuance of letters testamentary or of administration, apply by petition upon notice for the distribution to him of the net proceeds of the share of the estate to which he will be entitled. Before receiving his share he must give a bond, as required by sections 1658 and 1661, "provided that where the time for filing or presenting claims has expired, and all claims that have been allowed have been paid, or are secured by mortgage upon real estate sufficient to pay them, and the court is satisfied that no injury can result to the estate, the court may dispense with the bond."

The foregoing quotation shows that it is only in cases where the time for presenting claims has expired, and that all claims allowed have been paid, or are secured by mortgage, etc., that the court is authorized to dispense with the bond. It reasonably appears, in the present case, (1) that the time for presenting claims had expired; (2) that $18,000 of claims were allowed, which had not been paid; (3) that they were not secured by mortgage upon real estate or otherwise, and hence that the court erred in not requiring a bond.

Respondents rely upon the case of In re Levinson's Estate, 98 Cal. 654, 33 Pac. 726, to sustain the position that "the question as to whether a bond should be given by any of the parties to a partial distribution is entirely within the discretion of the court below." It is true, the language quoted is found in the opinion in that case, but it is not in point here, for the reason that there it appeared from the record that the time for presenting claims against the estate had expired, and that "all claims had been paid." The expression used by the learned judge was correct as applied to the facts of that case, but is not the law in a case like the present. See In re Crocker's Estate, 105 Cal. 368, 38 Pac. 954; In re Hale's Estate (Cal.) 53 Pac. 429.

2. The order of the court is quite indefinite in not enunciating the sum of money to be paid to each of the legatees. True, it refers to the will as the criterion by which to determine this question, but the will does not appear in the record. It would, to say the least, be the better practice to specify in the order the sum to be paid by the executors and the amount of the collateral inheritance tax to be deducted therefrom. Waiving this question, however, and the fact remains that there was positive error in ordering the whole of the legacies paid, as shown by the will, without deducting therefrom the sums of \$1,166 $\frac{2}{3}$  paid to each of the legatees, after the original hearing and before the final hearing, and which payments were admitted on such final hearing to have been received by petitioners.

3. It was admitted at the hearing that due notice of the application was given to the executors and all persons interested. This was sufficient to require all those interested who desired to combat the proceeding to put in an appearance, and when the order was made, and respondents desired it to be set aside, it was sufficient to give notice to the executors, who had appeared through their attorneys.

The other questions raised by appellants are not of sufficient importance to call for comment. On account of the two errors indicated we recommend that the order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BELCHER, C.

McFARLAND, J. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

HENSHAW, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal. Upon the question of the sufficiency of the notice to confer jurisdiction to make the order in question I express no opinion.

TEMPLE, J. I concur in the judgment.

HERNIA SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. v.
BEHNKE. (S. F. 922.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1898.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE — SALES — MODE—IN-ADEQUACY OF PRICE—BIDS—ORDER OF SALE—TAXES.

1. A foreclosure judgment embraced several parcels of land, describing each separately. On the sale the sheriff offered each parcel separately, and bids were severally made for three of them, two of which were withdrawn, and one was accepted, and one parcel struck off to the bidder. After offering each remaining parcel separately, without obtaining any purchaser, the sheriff offered them in a lump, and they were sold to the mortgagee. The judgment debtor was present, but gave no directions. Held, that the sale was valid.

2. Where mortgaged property was sold for $12,000, which, for two years preceding the sale, had been assessed at said sum, and which the appraisers appointed by the probate department had appraised at $38,000, the sale would not be set aside on the ground of inadequacy of price.

3. Where, at a foreclosure sale, the sheriff had offered the property in separate parcels, and, failing to sell it so, had sold it en masse, the sale was not invalidated by the subsequent refusal of the purchaser to fix a sum at which the different parcels might be redeemed separately.

4. At a sheriff's sale the bidder may withdraw his bid at any time before the property is struck off to him.

5. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 684, providing that a judgment requiring the sale of property may be enforced by writ reciting the material parts thereof, a foreclosure sale is not invalidated by failure of the order of sale to recite a payment made on the judgment after rendition; section 682, which requires an execution to state the amount actually due on a money judgment, not applying to an order for sale.

6. Where a mortgage was not taxed, and the owner of the premises covered by it paid the taxes assessed against the lands, she was not entitled to have them applied as a payment on the mortgage under Const. art. 13, § 4, providing that taxes on the mortgage, paid by the owner of the mortgaged premises, shall constitute a payment on the mortgage.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society against Rosa Behnke, as executrix. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and a sale thereunder, and from an order refusing to set it aside defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. A. Tobin and Thos. F. Barry, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of San Francisco refusing to set aside a sale of property made by the sheriff under an order of sale issued out of said court upon a judgment rendered therein for the foreclosure of a mortgage in favor of the plaintiff. The sale was made June 8, 1896. Notice of the motion to set aside the sale was made October 19th, and heard November 19th, and was denied December 1st.

1. One of the grounds of the motion is that several parcels of the land were sold en masse instead of separately. The judgment embraced 10 parcels of land, which were separately described and ordered to be sold in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim. The defendant was present at the sale, but gave no directions respecting it, or the order in which the parcels should be sold. The sheriff offered each of the parcels separately, and bids were severally made for two of them, but were withdrawn by the bidders before a sale was effected. One of the parcels was sold for $750 to Mrs. Dillon. After the sheriff had offered each of the parcels without obtaining any purchaser for them, except in the case of the one sold to Mrs. Dillon, he offered the remaining nine parcels in a lump, and they were sold to the plaintiff for $11,954. In thus making the sale the sheriff followed the rule approved in Marston v. White, 91 Cal. 37, 27 Pac. 588, and no facts are presented herein which take the present case out of that rule. One of the grounds urged by the appellant for setting aside the sale is that the property was sold for much less than its actual value, but the only evidence presented to the superior court in support of this proposition was the fact that two years prior to the sale the lands had been appraised at the sum of $38,125 by appraisers appointed therefor by the probate department of the court in the administration of the estate of the mortgagor. It was also shown that the lands had been assessed by the city and county assessor for the year 1894 at $12,870, and for the year 1895 at $12,490. No attempt was made to show their value in the year 1896, or at the time of the sale, and, as they were sold for $12,704, the court was not required, under the evidence before it, to hold that this amount was so inadequate to their value as to authorize it to set aside the sale. Neither did the refusal of the plaintiff, after the sale, to fix a sum at which it would allow a redemption of either of the parcels bought afford a reason for setting aside the sale. The right of redemption is purely statutory, and, unless the defendant brought himself within the statute, he could not claim the right to redeem. The purchaser of land at a sheriff's sale acquires a right in the land which can be divested only in the mode and to the extent provided by the statute. The object of the statute in requiring a sale to be by parcels is to afford the judgment debtor an opportunity to redeem either of the parcels, but the mortgagee has a right to have the land sold in satisfaction of his claim, and, if it cannot be effected in parcels, the sheriff is authorized to sell it as a whole, unless otherwise directed by the judgment debtor. Any redemption from the sale must be of the land sold, and according to the parcels in which it was sold. It must be assumed from the fact that the sheriff was unable to sell the several parcels, and could only sell them as a whole, that the lands were more valuable taken together than separately.

2. When the first parcel was offered by the sheriff, the plaintiff bid a certain sum therefor, but before it was struck off to it withdrew its bid. Another person present at the sale made a bid for another parcel, but withdrew his bid upon being informed by the sheriff, in answer to his inquiry, that the title to the land sold was not guaranteed. There was nothing irregular in this. The sale by the sheriff is by auction, and the rule of auction sales that the bidder may withdraw his bid at any time before the hammer falls applies to a sale by the sheriff. The contention of the appellant that there was a collusion between the sheriff and the plaintiff to bring about the sale of the land en masse, or that the sheriff sought to induce Struven to withdraw his bid, is not sustained by the record.

3. The judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $11,434, with interest from February 23, 1894, and was entered November 30, 1894. December 10 1894, the sum of $881.50 was paid to the plaintiff, and a partial satisfaction to that amount filed by it. The order of sale annexed to a certified copy of the judgment was issued April 28, 1896, but no reference was made therein to the amount that had been paid upon the judgment, and it is urged by the appellant that this omission vitiated the order of sale, since it required the sheriff to make more money out of the lands than the plaintiff was entitled to receive. Section 684, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "When the judgment requires the sale of property, the same may be enforced by a writ reciting such judgment, or the material parts thereof, and directing the proper officer to execute the judgment by making the sale, and applying the proceeds in conformity therewith." The provision in section 682 that an execution for money shall state "the amount actually due thereon" does not apply to such order of sale. The sheriff is directed by such judgment to sell the lands, or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. After he has sold parcels enough for this purpose, his power ceases, and the sale of any further parcel would be unauthorized; but, if he is authorized to sell them as a single parcel, and they are sold for more than the amount of the judgment, the sale is not void, and the surplus belongs to the judgment debtor. In the present case, as the plaintiff bid for the property the exact amount due to it after deducting the aforesaid payment and the costs of the sale, there is no ground for the contention that the sale was unauthorized. The item of seven dollars for "printing points," etc., was not an obligation of the defendant, and the plaintiff was not authorized to include it in its account, but this error does not justify setting the sale aside. The appellant, moreover, contends that the judgment should have been still further reduced by the sum of $170 for taxes upon the land for the year 1894, paid by the defendant after the judgment had been rendered. It appeared by the evidence on the part of the appellant that the mortgage was not assessed for that year, and that the assessment for which the taxes were paid was upon the land, without any deduction for mortgage or other obligation. It is only the tax "levied upon the security" that the owner may pay and have the amount deducted from the amount of the security (Const. art. 13, § 4); and, as there was no assessment of the security, the defendant was not authorized to have this payment deducted. The order is affirmed.

SACRAMENTO BANK v. ALCORN et al.

(Sac. 332.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1898.)

TRUST DEEDS—VALIDITY — WHAT PASSES THEREUNDER—STARE DECISIS.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 857, authorizing the creation of express trusts, a valid trust deed to secure a debt may be executed, giving the trustees power to sell the property conveyed.

2. The decisions of the supreme court upholding the validity of trust deeds to secure loans establish a conclusion which has become a rule of property, and will not be disturbed.

3. Although the title passes under a trust deed given to secure a debt, none of the incidents of ownership attach, except that the trustees are deemed to have such estate as will enable them to convey.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Kings county.

Action by the Sacramento Bank against Israel P. Alcorn and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Freeman & Bates and Archibald Yell, for appellants. W. W. Middlecoff and J. F. Prior, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to determine conflicting claims to real property. In May, 1893, defendant Alcorn and wife conveyed the property to trustees, to secure a sum of money then loaned by the bank to Alcorn, due according to the terms of a promissory note. The note, by its terms, became due one year from date. The deed of trust provided that, if the debt was paid, the trustees should reconvey to the trustors; but, if default were made, they were authorized to sell after certain designated notice, and to convey to the purchaser. The moneys realized were to be appropriated to payment of the debt and certain charges, and the residue, if any, returned to the grantors in the deed. The interest was to be paid annually, and, in case of a default in the payment of interest, the trustees were authorized to sell. A sale was made on the 28th day of December, 1895, and it is not claimed that the proceedings for a sale or the deed are deficient. Plaintiff claims under this sale, and the questions here arise upon objections made to the introduction of the trust deed. But two points are made by appellants, and it seems to be agreed that these questions are properly presented upon the record: (1) The trust was for a purpose not authorized by section 857 of the Civil Code, and the deed is therefore void. (2) The trust deed is void because it restrains alienation for a period not dependent upon the duration of life. Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716, 771.

The appeal is supported by very elaborate and forcible briefs, which, if the questions were open for consideration, would challenge and receive serious and careful examination; but we do not think the matter can now be considered open for discussion. Our own records will disclose the fact that trust deeds have been quite frequently used as security for loans. Their validity has been upheld in numerous cases, beginning very soon after the adoption of the Code, and continuing until the present time. Bateman v. Burr, 57 Cal. 480; Durkin v. Burr, 60 Cal. 360; Carey v. Brown, 62 Cal. 373; Loan Soc. v. Deering, 66 Cal. 281, 5 Pac. 353; More v. Calkins, 95 Cal. 435, 30 Pac. 583; Loan Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 528, 39 Pac. 922. These decisions, which have been uniform, establish a conclusion which has become a rule of property, and, however thoroughly we might now be convinced that the rule is erroneous, it should not be disturbed. Doubtless, many people have invested their money relying upon this construction of the law by the highest tribunal of the state, while those who have executed such deeds have done so with the expectation that they would be held valid. Ruin and injustice would result from such a decision as is now sought. If the question as to whether the rule of stare decisis shall prevail be one of policy, there is here no balancing of the evil done against the good attained. The result would be evil only. It is said that in none of the cases heretofore decided was the point raised. Whether it was or not may be a matter of argument. In Bateman v. Burr it was contended that the deed did not pass the legal title, and that the trustees, not being the owners of the fee, could not sell as provided in the trust deed. True, the argument urged was that the deed, having been given as security for a debt, was a mortgage only, and therefore did not carry the fee. This was an argument merely. The question was whether the instrument was operative as a deed. If void, it certainly did not confer power upon the trusttees to sell. It was decided that it did confer such power. And if the effort to create a trust failed, because trusts for that purpose are prohibited, it would seem to follow that the instrument would be a mortgage; and the question whether it is a mortgage or a conveyance is the real question involved, and the proper one to discuss. Counsel say it does not purport to be a mortgage, but to convey a fee in trust. True, neither does an absolute deed purport to be a mortgage; but it is shown to be so when it is established that it was given to secure a debt. The trust deed purports to have been given to secure a debt, and, if the attempt to create a trust is ineffectual, it presents all the elements of a mortgage. Indeed, under the decisions it is practically, though not in legal effect, little more than a mortgage with power to convey. The legal title passes, but it conveys no right of possession, and the trustor may remain in possession, and, until the execution of the trust, may maintain an action to recover possession even when the trust deed is silent upon the subject of possession. Tyler v. Granger, 48 Cal. 259. Notwithstanding the deed of trust, the trustor may file his declaration of homestead, and hold the premises as such against his creditors who are not secured by the trust deed or some valid lien. King v. Gotz, 70 Cal. 236, 11 Pac. 656. Notwithstanding the trust, the trustor may devise or transfer the property subject to the trust. Civ. Code, § 864. And the devisee or grantee acquires a legal estate against all persons except the trustees and persons lawfully claiming under them. Id. § 865. And, when the purpose of the trust ceases, the estate of the trustees also ceases. Id. § 871. Under these decisions and statutes, it would seem that, while we must say that the title passes, none of the incidents of ownership attach, except that the trustees are deemed to have such estate as will enable them to convey. So limited, such a trust has all the characteristics of a power in trust.

As originally adopted, the Civil Code had a title authorizing and defining powers; and section 894 of that title provided as follows: "A power is a lien upon the real property which it embraces from the time the instrument in which it is contained takes effect, except," etc. The following section (895) was almost identical with the present section 858 in regard to the power to sell contained in a mortgage. The title in regard to powers was repealed, but in one respect the creation of a power is still authorized. The continuance of this power in a mortgage is as inconsistent with the general policy of requiring all forced sales to be subject to redemption as are trust deeds. The legislature has also recognized these deeds of trust as an existing mode of securing loans. We do not place much value upon the mention of deeds of trust in the constitution. It was well enough to provide for the taxation of any property that the legislature could create, or authorize to be created. Similar remarks may perhaps be made in regard to the various provisions authorizing savings banks to deal in such securities, although this is not quite so obvious. The provisions in the Political Code (sections 3617, 3627, and 3629) cannot be so explained. These must be understood as referring to existing property, and not to something which might be thereafter brought into existence under future laws. Sections 2872 and 2924 of the Civil Code also imply the present existence of such property. Nor do we think these statutes can be understood as referring only to trusts for an immediate sale. It is possible that a trust to effect an immediate sale for the benefit of creditors whose debts are due may also be security for the debts while the sale is being made. But such trusts would not call for the regulations provided in the statutes referred to, and authority to savings banks to loan money upon such trusts would be fatuous. If these statutes are not in themselves sufficient, as against the statute defining the purposes for which trusts can be created, to authorize these trust deeds, as an exception to the rule, they nevertheless recognize and add weight to the judicial decisions which practically hold that they are authorized by section 857 of the Civil Code, and which rulings, long acquiesced in, have become a rule of property, not now to be reversed though erroneous.

We do not care to enter into a discussion of the second point,—as to whether these trust deeds are prohibited by the Code provisions against restraints on alienation. We are much impressed by the argument of counsel for appellants upon that subject. Under the decisions limiting the effect of such deeds, they are hardly within the evils to avoid which those sections were passed. The right to the possession and full enjoyment of the property is not rendered inalienable. But the legislature can correct the evil if there be one. The courts cannot do so without producing widespread distrust and confusion, and we think, upon well-established and sound principles of jurisprudence, ought not now to interfere. The judgment and order are affirmed.

ADAMS v. MINOR. Judge. (S. F. 1,090.)<sup>1</sup>

JUDGES—DISQUALIFICATION.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 170, provides that no judge shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding in which he is interested. Held, that a judge owning stock in a bank, intervening in a proceeding before him involving the validity of bonds owned by the bank, is an interested party, within the meaning of the statute, and disqualified to sit in the case.

2. The fact that he sat throughout the trial with the consent and at the request of counsel, believing he was not disqualified, and after the cause was submitted, pending a decision, has disposed of his stock in the bank, would not remove his disqualification to render a decision.

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Application for mandamus by John Adams against William O. Minor, judge of the superior court of Stanislaus county. Writ denied.

C. W. Eastin, for petitioner. The Attorney General, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Application for writ of mandate commanding respondent to proceed to the rendition of a decision and judgment in a certain cause now pending in the superior court of Stanislaus county, wherein John Adams (petitioner here) and others are plaintiffs, and G. R. Stoddard, collector of Modesto Irrigation District, in said county, is defendant, and First National Bank of Los Angeles is intervener. The facts are to be found in an agreed statement and in the pleadings, from which it appears that the action involved the validity of certain bonds issued by the said irrigation district, of which the Bank of Modesto held a portion, of the par value of $3,000; that the respondent was the owner of certain shares of the capital stock of said bank, the amount not shown. It is but fair to the learned judge who tried the case to add that he expressed doubt at the beginning as to his right to sit in the cause, and did so reluctantly, and only upon the assurance by both parties to the action that the validity of the bonds held by the bank would not be drawn in question. Subsequently, and at the argument upon the evidence, the validity of the entire issue of bonds, including those held by the bank, was made an issue. The cause was submitted on briefs to be filed, but shortly afterwards respondent called up the case of Adams v. Stoddard, counsel for both parties being in court, and made an order vacating the submission, and a few days later made another order refusing peremptorily to decide the case.

1. The principal question presented is, had the judge such interest as disqualified him from deciding the case? We think the answer must be in the affirmative. Code Civ. Proc. § 170, provides as follows: "No justice, judge," etc., "shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding: (1) To which he is a party or in which he is interested." We cannot take into consideration the amount of the judge's interest in the bank,—indeed, it is not given; nor can we say that, of the entire issue of bonds, the part held by the bank was too small for judicial cognizance. It certainly was not so small as to come within the maxim, "De minimis non curat lex." Parker, C. J., in Pearce v. Atwood, 13 Mass. 324, said: "No man can lawfully act as judge in a case in which he may have a pecuniary interest. Nor does it make any difference that the interest appears to be trifling, for the minds of men are so differently affected by the same degrees of interest that it has been found impossible to draw a satisfactory line."

Petitioner urges that the interest disclosed was not such as to disqualify the judge. The brief of counsel exhibits great industry in bringing to our attention the adjudicated cases bearing upon the question. But they fail to convince us of the soundness of his position. The meaning of the word "interested," where it occurs in section 170, supra, was defined in City of Oakland v. Oakland Water-Front Co., 118 Cal. 249, 50 Pac. 268. It was there said: "The word 'interested,' as used in the section of the Code relied on, embraces only an interest that is direct, proximate, substantial, and certain, and does not embrace such a remote, indirect, contingent, uncertain, and shadowy interest as that asserted as a disqualification in the case at bar." The interest relied on in that case was that "all of the judges were disqualified because they were owners of property subject to taxation by the city of Oakland, and therefore 'interested' in the result of the action." The court said: "The theory of the appellant is that, if respondent should recover the land sued for, it might be so used as to produce some municipal revenue, and thus affect to some extent the rate of taxation, as a consequence of which the taxes which the said judges would have to pay on their property might to some imaginable extent be lessened, and that thus they are interested and disqualified." The meaning of the word "interested," as given above, must be understood in the light of the facts in the case where the definition is found. But that definition cannot aid petitioner, for we think the interest here in question was neither remote, indirect, contingent, uncertain, nor shadowy. See, also, Mining Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 315, and Heilborn v. Campbell (Cal.) 23 Pac. 122 (not yet officially reported). See, also, Meyer v. City of San Diego (Cal.; opinion filed May 31, 1898) 53 Pac. 434, where the question is very fully considered and the cases reviewed.

Petitioner cites cases where the interest arose out of the question involved as distinct from any pecuniary interest in the result of the case; others where a part of a penalty went to a city in which the judge was a taxpayer; others where the interest was of such impersonal nature as a citizen has in the property of the state at large; others where there was some speculative possibility; and like cases. But of the numerous cases cited we have been unable to find one where a judge, holding the shares of a banking or other corporation, or being a partner in a business, was held qualified to try a case involving the right of such corporation or partnership to its property. It was held by Chancellor Sanford in Insurance Co. v. Price, Hopk. Ch. 1, that a chancellor, being a stockholder in a corporation, cannot do any judicial act in a cause in which that corporation is a party, although he is not personally a party to the record. We can see no substantial difference in the case of a judge who is a stockholder in a corporation sitting in a case brought by or against such corporation and a case where the matter in controversy involves the property of such corporation, although it is not a party to the action.

2. Petitioner contends that because the judge sat throughout the trial with the consent and at the request of counsel, and he himself believed he was not disqualified, and because he has, since the cause was submitted, and pending a decision, disposed of his stock in the Modesto Bank, he is not now disqualified. We do not think that the belief of the judge one way or the other would change the fact of his disqualification. He might honestly believe and hold that he was qualified, but that would not qualify him any more than he could acquire jurisdiction by deciding that he had it. Nor do we think that removing the cause of his disqualification after the case was submitted to him for decision would operate to remove the disqualification. The Code says, if he is interested, no "justice, judge," etc., "shall sit or act as such." Code Civ. Proc. § 170. This does not mean that he may hear the evidence in a case in which he is interested, and may decide it, after sitting and acting in it, provided he remove the cause of disqualification before he enters judgment. As we all know, the decision of questions arising during the course of the trial often determines the final judgment itself. The statute must be held to mean what it says, and it is that he shall not sit or act as judge in an action in which he is interested. We are of opinion that the writ should be denied, and so recommend.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. MILLER. (Cr. 355.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where a man is murdered by a stranger while attempting to prevent the stranger from murdering a woman whom he was pursuing, evidence of the motive which prompted the murderer to attempt the life of the woman is admissible on his trial for killing the man, although it is not necessary.

2. Under Pen. Code, § 459, providing that a person entering a house with intent to commit any felony is guilty of burglary; and section 189, which provides that murder committed in an attempted burglary is murder in the first degree,—an instruction concerning burglary is proper in a prosecution for the murder of a man while attempting to prevent the murderer from killing a woman whom he had pursued into a house for the purpose of killing her.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county.

John Miller was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. N. E. Wilson, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

HAYNES, C. Appellant was tried upon an information charging him with murder in the first degree, committed upon one James Childs. The jury returned a verdict of guilty without imposing a penalty, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of death entered thereon, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The errors alleged relate to questions of evidence and the correctness of certain instructions to the jury. The following outline of the circumstances attending the homicide is essential to a consideration of the questions discussed by counsel for appellant: The homicide occurred November 18, 1896, on Clementina street, in the city of San Francisco. For some time prior to that date, and up to within a few days before the homicide, appellant had as a housekeeper one Mrs. Nellie Ryan, a widow. Whether any other relation existed between them is disputed and not important to be considered. A few days before the homicide, they separated; and on that day Miller went to the house of one Mrs. Burns, with whom both were acquainted, and requested her to send for Nellie Ryan, saying he had some money and a house in Texas which he wished to give her. Mrs. Burns' sister consented to go, but defendant instructed her not to tell Nellie Ryan that he was there. Nellie Ryan was sent for, and came, and, meeting Mrs. Burns at the foot of the stairs, inquired whether Miller was there, and, being told that he was, remarked, "The dirty hound; I don't want to see him," and started from the house; and, as she left, Miller came downstairs, passed out onto the street, and immediately began shooting at Nellie Ryan, who ran across the street and a little distance along it, and ran up the steps and into the house in which James Childs lived. The door was open, and Childs was standing near the top of the steps. When she entered the house, she cried out for protection; and a brother of the deceased closed the door, but did not lock it. Miller, pursuing Nellie Ryan, went up the steps, and, according to one witness, had "his hand on the handle of the door, trying to get in." James Childs put out his arm, and took hold of Miller, when the latter immediately turned, and shot Childs through the head, causing almost immediate death. As Childs fell down the steps upon the sidewalk, Miller again fired at him, but the shot did not take effect. Miller then attempted to shoot himself, but his revolver was empty. Miller and Childs were strangers, and it does not appear that anything was said by either of them. Three or four shots were fired by Miller at Nellie Ryan as she ran, one of them passing through the rim of her hat.

1. Two days before the shooting, Nellie Ryan procured a warrant, and had Miller arrested on a charge of disturbing the peace; and his trial upon that charge had been postponed for several days. Upon the trial of Miller upon the charge of murder, the prosecution offered in evidence the complaint, warrant of arrest, and minutes of the police court in the matter of the charge of disturbing the peace, to which defendant objected; and it is contended that the court erred in admitting the evidence. The attempt to kill Nellie Ryan and the shooting of Childs were parts of one continuous transaction. Miller and Childs were strangers, and Childs was killed while he was in the act of interrupting Miller's pursuit of Nellie Ryan; and the purpose he had in pursuing her must have entered into the purpose with which he shot Childs. If he had not intended to kill her, it is not likely that he would have suddenly formed the purpose to kill Childs. The purpose or intention of Miller in the pursuit of the woman was therefore material and important evidence; and while the circumstances under which he sent for her to come to the house of Mrs. Burns, and his pursuit of her, shooting at her as she ran, were clear and sufficient evidence of his intention to kill her, and therefore the motive which induced the intention was not necessary to be shown, yet it was not irrelevant, nor was the record incompetent evidence. Motive is important to be shown only where the purpose or intention with which the act was done, or the person by whom it was done, is uncertain or in doubt. It is quite true, as said by counsel for appellant, that the commission of an independent offense is not proof of itself of the commission of another and distinct offense. But here there was no attempt to prove the commission of another offense. The evidence was simply that Nellie Ryan had charged him with an offense, and had procured his arrest thereon, and the jury were instructed by the court that these documents could not be considered as in any way establishing or tending to establish the truth of the charge, but solely for the purpose of determining whether a criminal charge had been made against him by Nellie Ryan.

2. It is also contended that the court erred in its instruction to the jury as to the purpose for which said complaint and warrant were admitted. The instruction referred to we have in substance given above. Counsel does not state wherein the court erred in giving it, and, unaided, we perceive no error in it.

3. It is also contended that the court erred in its charge to the jury upon the subject of burglary, for the reason, as stated by counsel, "that the element of burglary did not enter into this case in any way, and that such instruction could not be otherwise than prejudicial to the defendant." I think there was evidence from which the jury might properly find that Miller went up the steps for the purpose of entering the house in pursuit of Nellie Ryan for the purpose of killing her; and entering a house for such purpose is burglary, under section 459 of the Penal Code, which provides that every person who enters any house, etc., "with intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony, is guilty of burglary"; and section 189 makes murder "committed in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, burglary or mayhem," murder of the first degree. I think it clear that the evidence justified the instruction, and that the instruction is correct, as matter of law, is not questioned.

4. Appellant's last point is that "the court erred in its instructions to the jury upon the subject of insanity." No argument is made upon this point, nor are we referred to any part of the instructions upon that subject which is supposed to be erroneous. We have, however, carefully examined the instructions given upon that subject; and taken together, and as applicable to the evidence, we find no error therein. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re HICKEY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 1072.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1898.)
PROBATE—APPEALABLE ORDERS.

An order vacating a prior order settling the final account of an administrator is not appealable, since not enumerated among the appealable orders provided for by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

In the matter of the estate of Emmet Martin Hickey, deceased. From an order vacating a prior order settling the administrator's account, he appeals. Dismissed.

J. D. Sullivan, for appellant. E. C. Harrison, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This appeal is taken by the administrator from an order vacating a prior order settling his final account. In an addendum to respondent's brief, the point is made that the order is not appealable, and that the appeal should therefore be dismissed; citing In re Wittmeier's Estate, 118 Cal. 255, 50 Pac. 393. It was there expressly held that "appeals in probate proceedings lie only from such orders and decrees as are enumerated in subdivision 3 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure." That the order here appealed from is not enumerated among the appealable orders there provided for is clear. This disposition of the appeal is the less to be regretted, since, when the court again settles the administrator's account, if he should then feel aggrieved, he can appeal from the order then made settling it. We advise that the appeal be dismissed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal is dismissed.

MERY et al. v. BRODT. (Sac. 428.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1898.)
PUBLIC LANDS—LOCATION UNDER TIMBER ACT—FRAUD—TRUSTS—EXPENSES.

1. Where one has fraudulently obtained a patent to land under the timber act, one who has made a valid location of the land as a mining claim may bring suit against the patentee to have his title declared to be held in trust for plaintiff, and for a conveyance by defendant to plaintiff, although the United States statute of 1878 (20 Stat. 89) declares that one who fraudulently obtains a patent under the timber act shall forfeit "all right and title to the same; and any grant or conveyance which he may have made except in the hands of bona fide purchasers shall be null and void."

2. One who has fraudulently obtained a patent under the timber act is not entitled to have his expenses in obtaining the patent paid by one who is a valid locator of the property under the mining laws, before the latter is entitled to have the former's title declared to be held in trust for the latter, and a conveyance decreed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county.

Suit by M. L. Mery and another against Lincoln Brodt. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John Gale, for appellant. Richard White and Park Henshaw, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This action is inaugurated by a bill in equity, which asks that certain lands be declared by judicial decree to be held in trust by defendant for the use and benefit of plaintiffs, and that a conveyance thereof be made by him to them. The evidence is not in the record, and the appeal from the judgment is to be considered upon the pleading and findings. By the judgment plaintiffs were granted the relief sought.

Without detailing in full the findings of fact made by the trial court, it may be said that the material facts for our consideration are as follows: Plaintiffs were valid and legal locators of mining claims covering the land in dispute. They had been such locators for many years, were in the exclusive possession of the land all of the time, had spent $20,000 upon the property in mining work, and had complied with all demands of the law tending to support a valid mining location. These conditions being present, defendant, Brodt, filed a claim for the land under the timber act. In due time he gave his notices, made his proofs and payments at the land office, and a patent to the land was issued to him by the land department of the United States. These proceedings were all had by defendant and the government without any actual notice to plaintiffs, and, consequently, without objection upon their part. It is found as a fact that defendant and his witnesses, when making final proof before the land office upon application for the patent, testified that the said land was not occupied, and no improvements of any kind thereon; that the land contained no indications of deposits of any kind of mineral, and was chiefly valuable for the timber growing thereon; that said testimony was false and fraudulent, and was given for the purpose of misleading and deceiving the officers of the government, and that said officers were in fact deceived and misled thereby. It was further found that the material allegations of defendant's application, made under oath, were false and fraudulent, and were made with the intent to deceive and mislead the officers of the land department, and did so mislead said officers. It is also found that one of the witnesses for defendant before the land office was well acquainted with these lands, and had been upon them at various times, and examined the work being done by plaintiffs, and was familiar with such work. He knew that mining was being carried on upon the land, that such land was claimed by plaintiffs as a mining claim, and that they had expended many thousands of dollars in the development of the claim. It was further found as a fact that the officers of the land department believed all this testimony, and issued a patent to defendant for these lands based upon this showing.

The character of the action here disclosed is a very common one. The judicial reports of this state and other states contain many similar cases. The principle of law involved cannot be questioned, for courts of equity everywhere recognize it. Litigation in these matters is caused, not by any dispute of lawyers as to the elementary and basic principles of law bearing upon the case, but in the application of the facts of each individual case to those principles. And it would seem that each individual case has a state of facts peculiar to itself. This is eminently true as to the case at bar, for it is essentially sui generis in this: that plaintiffs base their rights upon a mining location simply, and as such locators ask that title to land under a United States timber patent issued to defendant be held by him for their benefit. Fraud of the defendant against the United States in the procurement of this patent is abundantly shown. Perjury was committed, and the officers of the government imposed upon and deceived by such perjury. Under these conditions the government had the right to have the patent canceled; for a fraud or the worst character was perpetrated upon it, and such a fraud as has always been recognized as proper ground for the cancellation of a patent. These things being true, it may be declared to be the rule, without exception, that, when the government has grounds for canceling a patent theretofore issued by it, based upon imposition and fraud, then an individual properly connected with the paramount source of title may bring an action similar to that brought by these plaintiffs.

The important question of this case then presents itself, to wit, are these plaintiffs in such privity with the source of title as to give them a status sufficient to bring this action? And this inquiry necessarily brings us to a consideration of their status as related to the United States. In other words, what is the nature and character of their holding, they being valid locators of mining claims? The locator of a mining claim, under the laws of the United States, has the right to the exclusive possession and enjoyment of that claim; he has an estate of inheritance; he has a title which can only pass by deed. The land is withdrawn from the public domain. There is an outstanding grant from the United States, and the government has no right to pass any title to a third party. Under the circumstances here shown, it would seem that the status of these plaintiffs as to the land was the same as that of a pre-emption claimant who had made his filing, was in the peaceable and undisputed occupation of the land, and otherwise had complied with all the demands of the law. These parties have been in the adverse and exclusive possession of this property for more than five years, doing all things demanded by the law to validate their title, and far more. Under the Revised Statutes of the United States these facts alone entitled them to a patent upon application. At the time the defendant procured his timber patent these plaintiffs, as against the world, were entitled to a patent, and were in a position to defend their claims against any and all attempting to dispute them.

In the case of Chism v. Price (Ark.) 15 S. W. 885, the court declared: "A stranger or occupant without right cannot assail a patent for fraud practiced against the state, but an occupant with a right to purchase may attack a patent issued in fraud of his rights, and upon equitable terms may demand a conveyance from the patentee." In the case of Noyes v. Mantle, 127 U. S. 349, 8 Sup. Ct. 1134, in speaking to this question, the court there said: "The claim was thenceforth their property. They needed only a patent of the United States to render their title perfect, and that they could obtain at any time upon proof of what they had done in locating the claim, and of subsequent expenditures to a specified amount in developing it. Until the patent issued, the government held the title in trust for the locators or their vendees. The ground itself was not afterwards open to sale." In

Smelting Co. v. Rucker, 28 Fed. 220, Judge Brewer said: "The statutes of the United States provides that upon performance of certain conditions the discoverer of a mine becomes entitled to a patent. If all these conditions have been performed, the full equitable title is vested in the discoverer, and all that the government retains is the naked legal title in trust for the equitable owner. If only partially performed, he has an absolute right of possession, and an inchoate title which further performance will perfect and complete. Such a right, possessory in its nature, yet coupled under existing laws with further rights as to acquisition of title, is declared by the decisions of the supreme court of Colorado to be a real-estate title. Such a property passes to the heir, is subject to seizure and sale as real estate, must be conveyed by deed, and is subject to partition." We find the following language in Haws v. Mining Co., 160 U. S. 303, 16 Sup. Ct. 282: "The possession under a claim established according to law is fully recognized by the acts of congress, and the patent adds little to the security of the party in the continuous possession of a mine he has discovered or bought." In Plummer v. Brown, 70 Cal. 546, 12 Pac. 465, this court said: "To entitle the alleged owner, however, to such equitable relief, he must show that he occupies such a status as entitles him to control the legal title." This court in Robinson v. Forrest, 29 Cal. 320, has declared in express terms what must be the status of a party who seeks the character of relief sought by these plaintiffs. "It is simply necessary that there shall be a privity of title between him and the United States; that is, that he shall possess some right, title, interest, or claim in or to the lands that is permitted by the laws of the United States to be acquired before the final transmission of title, and which is recognized by those laws as a valid, subsisting right, though further acts may be necessary to be performed by both parties before the title finally passes from the United States to the claimant."

Applying the law to the facts of this case, there can be but one conclusion. Indeed, it would be a hard case where a court of equity would sanction a result that would deprive these plaintiffs of their property obtained at the price of many years' labor and $20,000 expenditure, and this labor done and money expended under authority of the laws of the United States, and in strict conformity thereto. Tested by Plummer v. Brown, supra, it may well be said that these plaintiffs occupy such a status as entitles them to control the legal title. Measured by Robinson v. Forrest, supra, it may well be said that these plaintiffs meet all the requirements laid down in that case. We are satisfied they are possessed of a status which gives them authority to bring the action.

The United States statute of 1878, which deals with parties desirous of securing patents under the timber claims act, provides: "If any person taking such oath shall swear falsely in the premises he shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of perjury, and shall forfeit the money which he may have paid for said lands, and all right and title to the same; and any grant or conveyance which he may have made, except in the hands of bona fide purchasers, shall be null and void." 20 Stat. 89. It is now contended by defendant that under the showing made in this case by the complaint and findings of fact he has no title; that by reason of the express declaration of the statute the patent issued to him is void, and that, consequently, he has no interest which may be conveyed to plaintiffs. No case is cited to support this contention, and we assume there is none. The very fact that the statute declares a fraudulent claimant shall forfeit his title to the land is complete evidence that the United States concedes that by the patent he has the title. If he has no title there would be none to forfeit. Again, by the statute, his grant to a bona fide purchaser vests the title in such purchaser. This could only be the case where the title rests in the patentee. The position here taken by appellant would in every case defeat a party in his efforts to secure relief of the character here desired. There is no merit in the contention. As before suggested, it is these very cases where the United States by direct attack may have the patent set aside and canceled, upon the ground of fraud, that a claimant connecting himself with the paramount source of title is authorized to ask a court of equity for the relief here sought.

It is next insisted that plaintiffs are entitled to no relief because they have failed to do equity in not paying defendant the expense incurred by him in the procurement of his patent. A court of equity is not inclined to treat the conduct of this defendant kindly. There is nothing in his conduct to commend it to the court. He has been guilty of gross fraud, and equity owes him nothing. The statutes of the United States, already noticed, declare that his money, paid to the government in the consummation of his fraud, shall be forfeited. In U. S. v. Minor, 114 U. S. 238, 5 Sup. Ct. 836,—a case where the government directly attacked a patent it had theretofore issued,—it was held that the fraudulent patentee was not entitled to his money, and that a repayment thereof was not a condition precedent to the cancellation of the patent. We are satisfied the same rule should be invoked in favor of these plaintiffs. The money paid by defendant being forfeited to the government by reason of his fraud, these plaintiffs should not be required to make it good. The labor and expense of prosecuting this action, necessarily entailed upon plaintiffs by defendant's fraudulent acts, may well be said to counterbalance any such alleged claim of equity in his favor. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

GIFTS CAUSA MORTIS—DRAFTS—PASSING TITLE—DELIVERY.

1. Negotiable paper payable to order is the subject of a gift causa mortis, though it is not indorsed by the payee.

2. The title to a negotiable draft can be passed by mere delivery, since Civ. Code, § 1052, provides that a transfer may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by statute.

3. A judgment will not be reversed or a new trial granted for nonprejudicial error.

4. The presentation of a claim against an estate for services rendered the deceased does not preclude the right to claim certain drafts as a gift causa mortis from deceased; and the failure to prosecute the claim for services does not deprive the donee of setting up, as a defense to an action by the administrator to recover the drafts, that they were her property by virtue of such gift.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by Robert L. Edwards, as administrator, against Kate Wagner, to recover possession of two drafts. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Baldwin & Thompson and A. L. Levinsky, for appellant. W. S. Wright and J. B. Hall, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Joseph B. Boody in his lifetime held two bills of exchange that had been drawn in his favor,—one by the York National Bank of Maine upon the Chemical National Bank of New York for $500; and one by the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Stockton upon the National Bank of the Republic in New York, for $300. He died, intestate, November 6, 1893; and the plaintiff, having been appointed administrator of his estate, brought the present action against the defendant to recover the possession of these drafts, alleging that she had taken them into her possession after the death of Boody. The defendant, in her answer, alleges that Boody in his lifetime transferred and delivered the drafts to her, and that they thereby became her property. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the defendant. From the judgment thereon and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

The evidence before the jury was clear and convincing, and without any contradiction, that on the day of his death, and in evident contemplation thereof, Boody transferred and delivered the bills of exchange to the defendant, with the intention that they should be her property, and as a gift, and that she so accepted them. These facts are not disputed by the appellant, but he contended that as the bills of exchange were made payable to the order of Boody, and were not indorsed by him, the title to them did not vest in the defendant, but remained in him at the time of his death, and to this effect the court below instructed the jury. The rule is well settled that the holder of negotiable paper, payable to his order, may negotiate the same by a mere delivery or indorsement, and the person to whom it is so negotiated acquires all the title thereto that his transferor had. It was always held that by such delivery the equitable title to the bill, and the right to recover its amount, would pass, although the legal title might remain in the payee, and, under the rules of procedure at the common law, the transferee be compelled to bring his action thereon in the name of the payee; but, under the rules of procedure prevailing in states which require an action to be brought in the name of the real party in interest, he may sue the maker in his own name. Story, Prom. Notes, § 120; Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 741; Davis v. Lane, 8 N. H. 224; Coombs v. Warren, 34 Me. 89; Holly v. Holly, 94 N. C. 670; Thompson v. Onley, 96 N. C. 9, 1 S. E. 620; Billings v. Jane, 11 Barb. 620; Van Riper v. Baldwin, 19 Hun, 344. See, also, 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 252. It is also well settled that negotiable paper payable to order is the subject of a donatio causa mortis, even though it is not indorsed by the payee. Druke v. Heiken, 61 Cal. 346; Vandro v. Roach, 73 Cal. 614, 15 Pac. 35. Civ. Code, § 1052, provides that a transfer may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by statute; and, as there is no requirement by statute that a negotiable promissory note can be transferred only by writing, its title can be passed by a delivery. The instruction to the contrary by the court was erroneous; but as the plaintiff failed to show any right to the bills of exchange, and as it clearly appeared that they became the property of the defendant prior to the death of Boody, the jury would not have been justified in rendering a verdict except in favor of the defendant, and their disregard of the instruction was without injury to the plaintiff. A judgment will not be reversed or a new trial granted for mere error when it clearly appears that the appellant has sustained no injury therefrom. See Hughes v. Wheeler, 76 Cal. 230, 18 Pac. 386.

The defendant was not precluded from claiming the drafts by reason of her presentation of a claim against the estate for services to the deceased; nor did her failure to prosecute that claim deprive her of her defense to the present action. The judgment and order are affirmed.

CARPENTER v. JONES, Judge. (S. F. 1494.)

STATUTES — REPEAL — PAYMENT OF JURY FEES — CIVIL "CASES."

1. Acts 1871-72, p. 188, providing, inter alia, that where, in a civil case, the jury is discharged without finding a verdict, the jury fees must be paid by the party demanding the jury before further proceedings shall be allowed in the action, is not repealed ipso facto by Civ. Code, § 20, providing that, "in all cases provided for by this Code," all statutes heretofore in force, whether consistent or not, unless expressly continued in force by it, are repealed, since there is no legislation in the Codes bearing on the subject of the first-named statute.

2. Nor is said provision of the statute repealed by implication by the general fee bill (Acts 1895, p. 267), providing as to fees payable to jurors, since the later act is not amendatory of the former act, and is not in conflict with any of the various subject-matters involved in the former act, except in regard to the provision as to the amount of fees payable to jurors, which it repeals.

3. Acts 1871-72, p. 188, relating to payment of jury fees in a civil "case" by a party as a condition to bringing other proceedings, embraces a trial arising on an application to revoke the probate of a will, though a special proceeding, since it is a civil "case," though not a civil "action."

Petition by Clinton H. Carpenter against Edward B. Jones, as judge of the superior court of San Joaquin county, for a writ of mandate. Denied.

Elliott & Elliott and A. H. Carpenter, for petitioner. The Attorney General, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to be directed to Edward I. Jones, judge of the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, requiring him to set a certain cause pending in said court for trial. The facts upon which the application is based are briefly these: One Bailey was the executor of the estate of C. W. Carpenter, deceased. This petitioner and others filed a petition and contest asking that the probate of the will of deceased be set aside, and that Bailey's letters testamentary be annulled and vacated. Upon the issues thus made the contestants demanded a jury trial, and upon such trial the jury failed to agree upon a verdict. These contestants thereupon demanded that the cause be placed upon the trial calendar to be set for a second trial. This application the court refused to grant until contestants paid the jury fees of the previous trial, and also the reporter's fees accruing at that trial. No law has been placed before us in any way justifying the court's action as based upon a nonpayment of the reporter's fees, and, under the circumstances, we assume the action of the court to that extent unjustified.

To support the action of the court as to the jurors' fees, the respondent relies upon an act of the legislature found in the statutes of 1871-72, p. 188. That act, among other matters, provides: "If in any trial in a civil case the jury be for any cause discharged without finding a verdict, the fees of the jury shall be paid by the party who demanded the jury, but may be recovered as costs if he afterwards obtain judgment; and until they are paid no further proceedings shall be allowed in the action." It is contended upon the part of the petitioner that this act of the legislature was repealed ipso facto by the adoption of the Codes. To support this contention, that section of the various Codes is invoked which provides: "No statute, law or rule is continued in force because it is consistent with the provisions of this Code on the same subject; but in all cases provided for by this Code all statutes, laws and rules heretofore in force in this state, whether consistent or not with the provisions of this Code, unless expressly continued in force by it, are repealed or abrogated." Civ. Code, § 20. There is no legislation in any of the Codes bearing upon the matter covered by that portion of the act above quoted from the Statutes of 1871-72. And, there being an entire absence of legislation in the Codes upon the subject, that part of the act of 1871-72 is not repealed by the above law, invoked to accomplish that purpose. By that general provision the Codes only repealed existing statutes "in all cases provided for by this Code." The legislation before us embraces a "case" not provided for by "this Code."

The act of 1871-72 not being repealed by the Codes, has it been repealed by the legislature subsequent thereto? We find no law which accomplishes that result. In St. 1895, p. 267, there is found a general fee bill, which, among other matters, fixes the fees of trial jurors; and, if not repealed prior to the act of 1895, that portion of the act of 1871-72 fixing the fees of trial jurors was, by the act of 1895, undoubtedly repealed. But that act is in no sense an act amendatory of the act of 1871-72, and therefore does not repeal the earlier act by implication. Again, that portion of the act of 1871-72 here under consideration is not in conflict with any of the provisions of the act of 1895, and consequently there is no direct repeal of the earlier act. The act of 1871-72 embraces various subject-matters of legislation. The act of 1895 embraces one of these subject-matters of legislation. The later act not dealing with the subject-matter of legislation here under consideration, that subject-matter has all the vitality it ever had.

It is further contended by petitioner that a trial arising upon an application to revoke the probate of a will is a special proceeding, and therefore does not come within the provisions of the act of 1871-72, which deals with a trial in a "civil case." While it may be conceded that a special proceeding is not a civil action, and there are many authorities from this court to that effect (In re Joseph's Estate, 118 Cal. 660, 50 Pac. 768), still it has never been decided that a special proceeding is not a "civil case." Especially is this true in those particular special proceedings where issues are made and trials authorized to be conducted as in civil actions. Under such circumstances the proceeding may well be termed a "civil case." Indeed, the law bearing upon the contest of the probate of wills has so christened it. "When a jury is demanded, the superior court must impanel a jury to try the case in the manner provided for impaneling trial juries in courts of record." If the proceeding be a "case," it certainly is a civil case. For the foregoing reasons the application for the writ is denied.

WATER COMPANIES—REASONABLENESS OF RATES—APPEAL—REVERSAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. The value of the property of a water company which is necessarily used in furnishing the water is the basis for determining the reasonableness of rates, and not its liabilities, and their reasonableness cannot be determined in the absence of evidence of such value.

2. Where an appeal is brought upon the judgment roll alone, a reversal will be conditioned on error appearing on the face of the judgment, or an erroneous consideration of the facts found, or error in making the findings of fact.

3. Where the evidence is not submitted, it will be presumed that it is sufficient to support the findings of fact.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Action by the Redlands, Lugonia & Crafton Domestic Water Company against the city of Redlands and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bicknell & Trask, for appellant. C. C. Bennett, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff is engaged in furnishing water to the city of Redlands and its inhabitants for domestic purposes and for irrigation, and seeks by this action a judgment annulling the ordinance or resolution adopted by the board of trustees of that city, in February, 1895, fixing the rates to be charged or collected therefor during the year commencing July 1, 1895, and requiring the board to fix rates therefor "so as to assure an annual income to the plaintiff sufficient to pay the interest on its indebtedness, its running expenses, taxes, and to pay the plaintiff's stockholders a dividend of not less than 7 per cent. per annum upon the par value of said stock, and also sufficient to keep the works of said plaintiff used in business in repair." At the trial of the cause, the court found that the plaintiff had expended the sum of $314,000 in the acquisition of the plant used by it in so furnishing the water; that its capital stock is divided into 5,000 shares of the par value of $100 each, of which 2,260 shares have been subscribed, and the full amount of $226,000 paid to the plaintiff by the stockholders subscribing therefor; that the plaintiff has issued its bonds amounting to $75,000, bearing interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, all of which are outstanding, and has also executed to various persons its promissory notes, amounting to $19,000, and bearing a like rate of interest, but that it has bills receivable, bearing interest, so that the net amount of its annual interest is $5,600; that the maximum amount of revenue from the rates fixed by the ordinance will yield to the plaintiff the sum of $18,158.51, and the minimum amount of said revenue $14,526.40; that the necessary expenditures to be made by it during said year will be as follows: Operating expenses, $5,150; taxes, $1,350; for maintenance and repairs, $1,562.06. Upon these findings the court refused the plaintiff the relief it sought, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed, bringing the appeal upon the judgment roll alone without any bill of exceptions.

Many of the questions involved in this appeal are considered in the case of San Diego Water Co. v. City of San Diego, 118 Cal. 556, 50 Pac. 633, and the propositions then determined are applicable to the present case. It was held in that case by a majority of the court that, for the purpose of fixing the rates to be charged or collected for furnishing water to the inhabitants of a city, provision should not be made for the bonded or other indebtedness of the company, or of the interest thereon; that the rates should be the same whether the works are acquired or constructed by the company from its own resources, or with money borrowed from others; that the value of the property which is necessarily used in furnishing the water is the basis upon which to determine the amount of revenue to be provided by the ordinance fixing the rates; and that, while the cost of the plant is an element proper to be considered in determining its value, it is not conclusive thereof. Since the decision of that case, the supreme court of the United States has decided the case of Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S., 466, 18 Sup. Ct. 888; and in the opinion rendered by it this subject received further consideration. The question there presented was the reasonableness of the rates that had been fixed by the state of Nebraska for transportation by railroads; and the court held that "the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public." Under the principles determined by these cases, the amount of the capital stock paid in to the plaintiff by its stockholders, as well as the amount of its bonded and floating indebtedness, and the interest payable thereon, become immaterial factors in the question. In the case last cited, the court, in considering the principles to be observed in determining the reasonableness of the rates of compensation that had been fixed, said: "It cannot be admitted that a railroad corporation maintaining a highway under the authority of the state may fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests, and ignore the rights of the public. But the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for transportation of persons or property on a railroad are exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public, or the fair value of the services rendered, but in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay the interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to stockholders. * * * What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth." In Turnpike Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S., 578, 17 Sup. Ct. 198, the same court had previously held that an act fixing rates could not be declared unconstitutional merely because under its provisions the company could not earn more than 4 per cent. on its capital stock, and what it then said upon this subject is repeated in the later case of Smyth v. Ames, and is pertinent to certain allegations of the complaint herein, viz.: "It cannot be said that a corporation is entitled as of right, and without reference to the interests of the public, to realize a given per cent. upon its capital stock. When the question arises whether the legislature has exceeded its constitutional power in prescribing rates to be charged by a corporation controlling a public highway, stockholders are not the only persons whose rights or interests are to be considered. The rights of the public are not to be ignored. It is alleged here that the rates prescribed are unreasonable and unjust to the company and its stockholders, but that involves an inquiry as to what is reasonable and just for the public. The public cannot properly be subjected to unreasonable rates in order simply that stockholders may earn dividends. If a corporation cannot maintain such a highway and earn dividends for stockholders, it is a misfortune for it and them, which the constitution does not require to be remedied by imposing unjust burdens upon the public. So that the right of the public to use the defendant's turnpike, upon payment of such tolls as, in view of the nature and value of the services rendered by the company, are reasonable, is an element in the general inquiry whether the rates established by law are unjust and unreasonable. * * * The utmost that any corporation operating a public highway can rightfully demand at the hands of the legislature when exerting its general powers is that it receive what under all the circumstances is such compensation for the use of its property as will be just both to it and to the public."

To authorize a reversal of the judgment appealed from, it is incumbent upon the appellant to show that the judgment is erroneous upon its face, or that the superior court either gave an erroneous consideration to the facts found by it, or committed some error in making its finding of those facts. As the evidence upon which the facts are found is not before us, we must assume that it fully supports the findings of fact. The ordinance of the board of trustees which the plaintiff seeks to annul was regularly adopted, and is in proper form, and whatever grounds there may be for asserting its invalidity must be shown by extrinsic facts. It was therefore incumbent upon the plaintiff to present to the superior court, and to have incorporated into the record upon this appeal, the facts upon which it would claim such invalidity. The invalidity urged by it is that the rates fixed thereby will not yield a reasonable compensation for its service, in addition to the amount necessary to be expended by it in performing the service. But, as the value of the plant is the basis upon which the court was to determine the sufficiency of the compensation, it was essential to present that fact to the court before the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment that the rates are unreasonable.

The court finds that the operating expenses, taxes, and cost of maintenance and repairs to be incurred by the plaintiff during the year amount to $8,062.06. Deducting this sum from the minimum amount of revenue which the rates will yield, the plaintiff will receive a net income of $6,464.34, while the maximum amount of this revenue would yield a net income of $10,096.45. As the value of the plant is an essential element in determining whether either of these amounts will be a reasonable compensation to the plaintiff for its services, and as there was no averment or showing upon this point before the superior court, we cannot say that it appears from the record that the rates fixed by the ordinance will not yield a fair compensation, or that the court erred in refusing to the plaintiff the relief it asked. It cannot be determined as a matter of fact what portion of the maximum amount of this revenue the plaintiff will receive, nor can it be said as a matter of law that it is entitled to receive the maximum amount of whatever rates may be fixed. Neither can it be stated as a proposition of law that the amount which the court finds that it will in either instance receive in excess of the above expenditures is not a fair compensation for its service. As we have before seen, the amount of income it is entitled to receive is not to be determined by merely considering the value of the property used in rendering the service; but the value of the service which the public receives is also an element to be determined in considering whether the rates are reasonable. The supreme court of the United States said in Turnpike Co. v. Sandford, supra: "Each case must depend upon its special facts; and when a court, without assuming itself to prescribe rates, is required to determine whether the rates prescribed by the legislature for a corporation controlling a public highway are as an entirety so unjust as to destroy the value of its property for all the purposes for which it was acquired, its duty is to take into consideration the interests both of the public and of the owner of the property, together with all other circumstances that are fairly to be considered in determining whether the legislature has, under the guise of regulating rates, exceeded its constitutional authority, and practically deprived the owner of property without due process of law." The record herein fails to show that the court did not give proper consideration to all the elements forming the plaintiff's right to any greater compensation for its service than it will receive from the rates fixed by the board of trustees, and we cannot say that the court erred in refusing to annul the ordinance. The judgment is affirmed.

4. An attorney may be disbarred where transactions in which he was not employed professionally show him to be so wanting in integrity that the legal business of others cannot be safely intrusted to him.

In bank. An application was made at the instance of the Bar Association of San Francisco to disbar Edgar B. Haymond. Accusation dismissed.

William Fifield, for Bar Ass'n. Crittenden Thornton, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Application at the instance of the Bar Association of San Francisco. It is charged that the accused has violated his oath of office and his duty as an attorney, in that he has failed to maintain the respect due to the courts of justice, and has not discharged his duty as an attorney and counselor to the best of his ability. It is recited that one Albert F. G. Veresenecock-hoff was being tried in department 12 of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco upon a charge of the crime of murder. He was being defended by three counsel, one of whom was B. W. McIntosh, Esq., who had been duly admitted to practice law. Several days were occupied in impaneling a jury, during which time, though some jurors had been accepted and sworn, the panel was incomplete. The Daily Examiner was a newspaper published daily in San Francisco, and was a paper of general circulation in the city, and likely to be read by the judge and jury which were engaged in said trial. During the trial, and while McIntosh was defending the said defendant, he informed respondent that Veresenecockhoff had been approached by a representative of the Examiner, and offered $10,000 for a confession of guilt on the part of the said defendant, to be published while the trial was pending. Respondent did not believe such a price had been offered, but thought such a confession could be sold to the newspaper for $2,000 or $3,000. "Thereupon respondent and McIntosh entered into a scheme, whereby said McIntosh should procure a confession of guilt from his client, the said Albert Hoff, and the respondent should negotiate, or attempt to negotiate, a sale thereof for money to the said Daily Examiner for publication in said newspaper while said trial was in progress." The next day McIntosh procured what purported to be such a confession, and which respondent believed to be such. Respondent undertook to attempt a sale of it to the newspaper for $2,000, to be published while the trial was in progress. The respondent accepted the employment, and attempted to effect a sale, but failed to do so. During the negotiations the respondent was informed that the Daily Examiner would purchase no confession "unless it were

DISBARMENT OF ATTORNEY—EVIDENCE—GROUNDS.

1. An accusation charging an attorney with conspiring with the attorney for a defendant accused of murder to sell to a newspaper, during the trial, a confession from defendant, to be procured by his attorney, and attempting to sell a purported confession, which he said he could have attested by the district attorney and the judge, is not sufficient to disbar him.

2. An accusation against an attorney in disbarment proceedings is in the nature of a criminal charge, and all intendments are in favor of the accused.

3. Conspiring with the attorney of one charged with murder to publish, during the trial, a confession of defendant secured by his attorney, is not an offense under Pen. Code, § 95, hedged about with all the formalities of law, attested by the district attorney and a judge of the superior court, to which the respondent replied that he (respondent) was authorized to comply with such conditions." Respondent was then informed that the Examiner would pay $750, and no more. This closed the negotiations. So far as appears, Haymond never did receive the confession, and certainly did not sell it, or cause it to be published. Although Haymond never did receive or sell a confession,—and, so far as appears, no confession was ever made,—the fact that he attempted to make such a sale was published during the said trial in all the daily newspapers published in the city and county of San Francisco. No doubt such publication tended to some extent to embarrass the court in the trial. Such a publication was not intended by the respondent. No answer has been made by the accused, but the matter was presented on demurrer. The committee insist with the greatest earnestness upon the charge that the accused offered to sell the confession, and agreed that it should be attested by the district attorney and a judge of the superior court, as a ground for expulsion. They say: "It amounts to saying that the district attorney and a judge of the superior court will attest or certify a confession of guilt of the man on trial for his life, which is to be then sold to a newspaper for publication while the trial is going on. A more gross imputation upon a court or judge cannot be imagined." In this they charge respondent failed to maintain the respect due to courts and judicial officers. This accusation is in the nature of a criminal charge, and all intendments are in favor of the accused. The accusation is not sufficient if, all its statements being true, the accused could be innocent. It does not appear, and is not charged, that Haymond offered to procure such a certificate, or asserted that he could do so. It is simply charged that a representative of the Examiner demanded such a confession, and that Haymond was willing to comply with the condition. A construction favorable to innocence must be given to this, if possible; and I think it naturally indicates no more than that Haymond and his principal were willing. This charge cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The most plausible ground upon which a disbarment is asked, in my opinion, is that respondent entered into a scheme or conspiracy with McIntosh, in which the latter was to do an act violative of his duty to his client and to the court. They were to publish a confession which would increase the difficulty of the court to get a jury, and would also be placing before jurors already sworn evidence not introduced at the trial and in court. It is contended that this would be violative of section 95 of the Penal Code. But, plainly, other facts would have to be shown in addition to those already alleged to bring the case within that section. It would certainly be unprofessional for one engaged to defend a person accused of crime to attempt to get evidence before a jury in that mode, whether it were favorable or not. And it would constitute a gross violation of his duty to his client to publish in that mode evidence which would be injurious to his client. It must be remembered, however, that Haymond was not an attorney in this case, that he was not acting as an attorney and was not employed because of his professional character. True, if the transaction showed him to be so wanting in integrity that the legal business of others cannot be safely intrusted to him, he should be disbarred. But not every reprehensible transaction will be ground for disbarring an attorney. This matter was very thoroughly considered in Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 2 Sup. Ct. 569, and particularly in the dissenting opinion of Justice Field. Upon this general proposition I do not understand that there was a difference in that case. All agreed that an attorney could be disbarred, not only for professional misconduct, but for such misconduct outside of his profession as shows want of integrity and trustworthiness. But Justice Field contended that when the alleged misconduct involved the commission of a public offense, for which the attorney might be prosecuted criminally, that respondent should not be required to make any answer by which he might criminate himself, and that he could not be disbarred for an act constituting a crime involving moral turpitude, but outside of his professional duty, until he had been tried and convicted. Does the accusation charge the respondent with an offense involving such moral delinquency as would affect his trustworthiness as an attorney? It certainly was not wrong for Haymond to receive the confession of Vereseneckockhoff—sometimes called Hoff—if no inducements or threats were used to obtain it. Having it, no law would prevent him from publishing it. It might have made it more difficult to obtain a jury. But so does every publication of the evidence that a crime has been committed. Yet newspapers are permitted to publish such news. I see no more objection to the publication by Haymond than by a daily newspaper.

The accusation does not show a conspiracy to procure a confession from Hoff. Haymond's first connection with the affair is upon the proposition that Hoff desired to make it. We are not at liberty to suppose that it was obtained by dishonest practices, or that Haymond knew that a defense was being made which was inconsistent with the confession. There is no such charge in the accusation, and our present knowledge as to what defense was made is not to be attributed to Haymond. Suppose Hoff was defended by honest and able counsel, as we must presume he was, and that upon a full statement of his case, and a consideration of the evidence, he had been advised, and himself believed, that he had no defense except the plea of insanity. Suppose his line of defense had been fully determined upon, and also that it involved a full admission of the fact of the homicide. Upon that supposition, it would be difficult to specify what there was wrong in the conduct of the respondent. True, most attorneys would scorn to act as brokers in such a case. But we are not trying questions of taste. It is true, no such facts are stated in the accusation, but the question on demurrer is, does the accusation negative the possibility of innocence? And then we are not to attribute knowledge to the accused of the wrong on the part of McIntosh unless it is so averred. Why should we presume that Hoff had been imposed upon, or that the alleged confession was bogus, or that its publication would interfere with any defense that would be made; or, if all these possible facts were true, that Haymond knew of them? It is always an unpleasant thing to disbar an attorney. The committee have stated their reluctance to move in the matter. They have presented their views fairly, and with malice to none. And, although convinced that the charge should not be sustained, I think the committee deserve the gratitude of the courts and of the profession for the manner in which they have performed their unpleasant duty. The accusation is dismissed.

PERKINS v. FISH et al. (S. F. 958)<sup>1</sup>

APPEAL—OBJECTIONS WAIVED—INSURANCE COMPANY—LIABILITY OF OFFICERS—FRAUD.

1. After plaintiff introduced a large amount of evidence, defendant suggested that, as there were more than 100 causes of action requiring evidence, it then be determined whether plaintiff's evidence in the causes already tried would warrant the expenditure of time necessary to hearing all causes of action. Thereupon, by consent of plaintiff, argument was had on the case as it stood. Defendant objecting to introduction of other evidence, the objection was sustained. It did not appear that plaintiff desired to introduce other evidence. Held, that plaintiff's consent concluded him from objecting that the court stopped the introduction of further evidence.

2. The agents and directors of a co-operative life insurance society chosen by the members of the society to conduct its affairs cannot, in the absence of fraud, be held responsible by a member after the insolvency of the society for money paid to the society, and paid out by it under its articles and rules.

3. Where the directors of a co-operative life insurance society honestly believe it to be incorporated, and so represent it, such a representation is not fraudulent, although the society be not legally incorporated.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Daniel H. Perkins against Charles H. Fish and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Spelling (Reddy, Campbell & Metson, of counsel), for appellant. Chickering, Thomas & Gregory and Edward R. Taylor, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. This action is brought to recover the sum of $83,704.15, alleged to have been paid by plaintiff and his assignors to defendants while acting as the agents and managers of the so-called "Home Benefit Life Association." Defendants had judgment, from which this appeal is prosecuted on bill of exceptions. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Plaintiff introduced a large amount of testimony, oral and documentary, covering over 450 folios of the printed transcript. The bill of exceptions then contains a statement as follows: "At this point it was suggested to the court by counsel for the defendants that as there were more than one hundred causes of action, each one of which would require evidence on the part of plaintiff to sustain it, that it might be well to determine at this stage whether or not it was advisable to further proceed in the trial until ascertaining whether plaintiff had made such proof on the causes of action already tried as would warrant the consumption of time necessary to hearing all the causes of action. Thereupon, plaintiff's counsel assenting thereto, argument was had by counsel on both sides of the case as presented; the counsel for defendants, in order to get the matter properly before the court, then and there objecting to the introduction of any further evidence; and on the 31st day of August, 1896, the court filed and caused to be filed in said action, and entered in the minutes of said court, an order in words and figures following, to wit: 'The objection of defendants to the introduction of any further evidence is sustained, and the action is ordered dismissed,'—to which order and ruling of the court plaintiff by his attorney then and there objected and duly excepted."

1. It is now claimed as error that the court stopped the introduction of any further evidence by plaintiff, and ordered a judgment of dismissal. The record discloses no formal motion for nonsuit by defendants, nor does it show that plaintiff had other testimony to offer, or desired to offer other testimony, either before argument upon defendant's suggestion, or after the ruling of the court; nor did plaintiff assign any reasons for objecting to the order. The situation is anomalous, and yet we do not think the court erred in acting on the suggestion as though plaintiff had closed his testimony, and was willing to have the court pass upon its sufficiency to support the complaint. Whether the court rightly decided the merits of the case as presented is another question presently to be noticed. We concur with plaintiff that where there is a good cause of action stated, as the court here must have held there was in overruling the demurrers, the plaintiff cannot be arbitrarily stopped against his consent in the midst of the introduction of admissible evidence in support of his allegations. No appellate court ever laid down a rule that would thus leave litigants at the mercy of trial courts. Nor do we think the trial court in this case did any such thing. It is manifest from the record, we think, that counsel and court all proceeded upon the understanding that the court might, upon the evidence as it then stood, determine the merits of plaintiff's case. Plaintiff's consent must be held to conclude him; and to hold otherwise would be to hold that plaintiff intentionally led the court into the commission of the error of which he now seeks to take advantage. We are unwilling to impute to counsel for plaintiff any such motive. The cases cited in relation to nonsuiting a plaintiff before concluding his evidence, or upon an opening statement, are not in point.

2. The theory upon which the complaint proceeds is that this association was never legally incorporated, for the reason that there was no statute law authorizing its organization as a corporate body. It is claimed that the association never became even a de facto corporation, because it failed to do the acts required by section 437 et seq. of the Civil Code; and that defendants, in assuming to form a so-called "corporation," as they undertook to form it, acted wholly outside any statutory permission or authority, and their efforts were utterly abortive and void. It is claimed that plaintiff (and plaintiff's assignors) paid to defendants at sundry times certain sums of money, induced thereto by the false and fraudulent representations of defendants, and under the belief, willfully and falsely engendered and created by defendants, that the association was a legal corporation organized under the laws of the state. It is hence contended that defendants became and are individually liable for the money thus received by them. Defendants claim to have organized the corporation under the provisions of section 593 of the Civil Code and the sections immediately following; that section 451 of the same Code was in force at the date of the organization by which the corporation thus formed was declared not to be an insurance company in the sense and meaning of the insurance laws of this state, as set forth in section 437, supra, et seq., and was exempt from the provisions of all existing insurance laws of the state; and that, if any doubt existed theretofore, it was entirely removed by the act of March 19, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 126), and particularly section 3 of that act, which, it is claimed, validated the said corporation, and recognized its existence as a legal corporate body.

The questions involved in these conflicting contentions are numerous, and lead into a very wide field of corporation law, where the decisions are not by any means harmonious. From the view we have taken of the case, we do not find it necessary to follow counsel in their somewhat extended excursion. The evidence shows that defendants formed a corporation whose declared purposes and objects were both lawful and commendable; and it is not questioned that the articles of incorporation were in due form in all respects. The articles declared: "That the purposes for which it is formed are to associate together persons for the purpose of equalizing the risk of death, and to pay to the nominees of such members as may die stipulated sums of money, to be collected from surviving members upon the assessment or co-operative plan; to do any and everything requisite, necessary, or convenient for accomplishing the said purpose." Immediately upon filing certified copy of the articles with the secretary of state, officers were elected, by-laws adopted, and circulars containing the same, in which a full statement of the plan upon which the business of insuring the lives of members was to be conducted was embodied, as well as other forms of advertising literature, giving the names of the officers and directors, were given broadcast to the public and intending members. It was clearly stated in the articles and appeared in many of these documents what were the purposes and objects; that the company had no capital stock, and was not organized for profit; that the cost of the insurance was to be met by assessments, and these would depend upon the number of deaths and the age of the insured; that the directors were to be chosen by the members, and had the management of the affairs of the corporation. The members were kept informed from time to time by printed annual statements of the business affairs of the company, and they had access to its books at all times. A similar organization was formed in 1880, of which the present corporation was spoken of as a re-incorporation. The tenth annual statement for 1890 showed as follows:

Total income .....	$804,747 07
Death losses paid.....	$575,000 00
Expenses, including salaries, commissions, advertising, and all other items .....	178,021 14
Reserved fund in bank.....	41,713 01
Cash in bank.....	10,012 92
	<hr/> $804,747 07

This income was paid to the corporation by members by way of assessments to meet losses accruing by the death of members and for expenses. It was paid out by the corporation for these purposes in accordance with its plan, and pursuant to the direction of its governing board of directors who were chosen by the members. The directors were themselves members, and paid their assessments as did others. They received no compensation except a small sum for per diem attendance at each regular meeting, and pay for actual services rendered in any other special capacity. They derived no benefit, with this exception, different from any other member. The money was all paid to the treasurer, and deposited in bank, and paid out only upon proper vouchers. The directors personally handled no money of the corporation. The certificate of membership issued to each member was signed and assented to by him, and it made the by-laws a part of the contract of membership, and they were printed on the back thereof. Plaintiff testified that a policy was issued to him in 1880, and he paid assessments until 1894, having twice renewed his membership after reincorporation in 1885. It appears that the association continued business up to 1893, when it found itself unable to go on owing to the falling off of membership and lack of funds, and passed into the hands of a receiver.

Conceding that there was neither a de jure nor a de facto corporation behind these defendants, which is the most favorable view for plaintiff, we cannot see upon what principle plaintiff should be permitted, in the absence of fraud on the part of defendants, to recover back money voluntarily paid by him to an association of which he was a co-equal member. The allegation of the complaint is that he paid the money to defendants; but the evidence is that the contract of membership was with the association as such, and that the defendants personally neither received nor handled any of the money, and that it was paid to the association, and disbursed by the association as such. It was paid in and paid out under articles of association and rules and regulations framed by plaintiff and other members, or assented to by them in advance of any payment by them; and they must be held to be bound by their own acts. Whether the association be regarded as a partnership, a joint-stock company, or a voluntary association, its promise to insure the lives of its members imported a good consideration; and the defendants, as the chosen agents of the members, in causing the association to enter into such contracts, cannot be held liable for duties honestly and faithfully performed.

Plaintiff cannot now be heard to say that his money was improvidently invested or illegally paid out. It would, we think, be a perversion of law to hold that after doing business for several years in the way this was done, and after having paid out large sums of money for death losses and necessary expenses, the members who had the good fortune to survive the enterprise could, upon the insolvency of their association, or its inability to continue business, compel their directors and immediate agents to pay back to them out of their own pockets what the members had themselves caused to be disbursed for losses and expenses. We think this is so obviously the just view of the matter as to make the citation of authorities superfluous.

The only ground upon which, in our judgment, plaintiff could recover is the alleged ground of fraud. The gravamen of the charge is that defendants falsely represented that the Home Benefit Life Association was a legally organized corporation, and was authorized to do business as such. The particulars in which it is alleged that the representations were false consisted in the failure of the association to have any capital stock or guaranty fund, and its failure in other respects to comply with the provisions of the Civil Code (section 437 et seq.). It is only by inference that defendants are charged with representing that this was such a corporation as is contemplated by these sections. The evidence is that they never represented that the corporation had any capital stock or reserved fund. On the contrary, all the representations were that there was no capital stock, and that the organization was not formed for profit. The scheme set forth in the published circulars and in the articles contemplated such a corporation as is provided for in the sections under which defendants claimed to be operating. A comparison of these sections of the Code with 437 et seq. will disclose an essential difference in the two plans of insurance. Sections 437 et seq. contemplate a "mutual insurance" corporation, with a paid-up capital of not less than $100,000, with a guaranty fund of not less than $250,000. In the other case, where the purpose is "mutual insurance on the assessment plan," and the corporation is formed not for profit, no capital or capital stock was required, and no guaranty fund, except by the act of 1891 a deposit of $5,000 was required to be paid in by not less than 200 members. However, the evidence shows that the directors organized the corporation and conducted its affairs in the honest belief that the association was legally formed. Whatever was done, and the manner in which it was done, was made known to the members; and they were in possession of all the facts as completely as were the directors. There is no evidence of any misrepresentation of facts such as could have misled persons to become members. The directors did represent that the association was a corporation organized under the laws of California, and they so believed. If the association was not a corporation, it was a mistake of law upon the part of all the members for which the courts afford no relief to them. If in fact it was a mistake of law (which we do not think necessary to decide), it was shared in by the defendants at the beginning, and also by the secretary of state, and by all the members, for the consequences of which defendants are not liable. We do not attach any importance to the evidence of plaintiff as to what he thought was the character of the corporation, or what he supposed the directors were doing. They are not more responsible for his misconceptions of law than they were for their own honest beliefs. Nor do we attach importance to the evidence of plaintiff and his assignors that if they had not believed the corporation to be legal, and that it had a guaranty fund, and had capital stock, and if they had not had faith in the directors as men of wealth and honor and high standing, they would not have become members. They knew all about the corporation, or had that means of knowledge, which is the equivalent of knowledge. They dealt with the association as a corporation, and were bound to take notice of the articles as well as the statutes of the state. Mor. Priv. Corp. § 591. The certificates of membership showed on their face the very contrary to what some of the witnesses testified they understood to be the fact. There is absolutely no evidence from which the court could find fraud either in the organization of the corporation or in the conduct of its affairs. With all this knowledge and means of knowledge, plaintiff continued to be a member, paying assessments and receiving statements until the company failed, and must be held to have acquiesced in the acts of which he now complains. Id. § 630 et seq. Mr. Justice Brewer, in Coal Co. v. Maxwell, 22 Fed. 197, said: "Where persons knowingly and fraudulently assume a corporate existence, or pretend to have a corporate existence, they can be held liable as individuals; but where they are acting in good faith, and suppose that they are stockholders in a valid corporation, and where the corporation assumes to transact business for a number of years, and the assumed corporate existence is not challenged by the state, then they cannot be held liable as individuals." Mor. Priv. Corp. § 748. The principle that shields the members from the claims of persons dealing with the corporation under such circumstances is equally efficacious to protect the members as between themselves. There being no fraud shown to have been committed by defendants, the members were all parties to whatever was done, and stood in equal relations to all the facts. Neither should now be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong; and, so far as any wrong was done, the members were in pari delicto.

The essential inequity of this action lies in the undisputed fact that plaintiff and his assignors knowingly and advisedly contributed from time to time for several years to the payment of large sums for mutual insurance through agents of their own selection. They stood by all this time, and saw this money paid out for death losses and expenses, and at no time called in question the legality of the proceedings under which this was done; and, now that the association can no longer continue business, they seek to establish a rule by which to compel ten of their number to restore to the other four or five hundred the money they paid in, and which has been paid out upon contracts and under regulations to which they were themselves willing parties. There is, in our opinion, no principle of law or equity warranting any such claim. The errors alleged to have occurred during the course of the trial do not seem to call for special comment. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

GARTON v. STERN et al. (L. A. 408.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1898.)

NEW TRIAL—WHEN PROPER—APPEAL—REVIEW—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE.

1. It is the province of the superior judge, on motion for a new trial, to inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, and, if insufficient, to grant a new trial, whether the original trial was held before him or not.

2. Where a new trial was granted by a judge other than the one who tried the case, on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, and such evidence was conflicting, the ruling will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Where both buyer and seller testified to lack of knowledge on the buyer's part of the seller's fraudulent purpose in selling a stock of merchandise, or of her insolvency, and though the fact of a sale of the entire stock tended to throw suspicion on the transaction, and the seller had for several months offered to sell the goods to the buyer and others, it was not an abuse of discretion to grant a new trial on the ground that a finding that the buyer had reasonable cause to know of the fraud was unwarranted.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Orange county.

Action by Charles N. Garton, assignee, against Jacob Stern and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial, on motion of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. M. Graff and J. G. Scarborough, for appellant. Max Loewenthal, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order granting a new trial, made on motion of defendants. The action was brought by the appellant, as assignee of Mrs. E. M. Sprague, an insolvent debtor, to recover certain goods alleged to have been sold by the insolvent to the respondents for the purpose of hindering and delaying her creditors, etc. The court below, in the first instance, rendered a judgment for the plaintiff, and upon defendant's motion for a new trial the same was granted by the court while a superior judge other than the one who originally tried the case was presiding. The motion for a new trial was made upon various grounds, and, among others, that the evidence was insufficient to support certain findings of the court; and it incidentally appears from the opinion of the judge of the court below who granted the motion, which opinion appears in the brief of the respondents, that the motion was granted mainly upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the seventh finding that, at the time of the sale, the defendants had reasonable cause to believe that the said Sprague was insolvent, and reasonable cause to believe that the transfer was made with a view to preventing her property from coming to her assignee in insolvency, etc. It is the province of the trial judge, upon motion for a new trial, to inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence upon which a verdict or finding was found, and it is his duty to grant a new trial when, in his judgment, the evidence was insufficient to support the decision; and his power and duty in the premises are not affected by the fact that the original trial was not had before him. And when there is an appeal here from an order granting a new trial, upon such grounds, the question presents the same aspect as that which would be presented upon an appeal from the original judgment. In either case the ruling of the trial court will not be disturbed here, if there was a fair and substantial conflict of evidence on the issue involved. In Jones v. Sanders, 103 Cal. 678, 37 Pac. 649, the decision has been made by one judge, and a motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the findings were not justified by the evidence, had been granted by another; and it was there claimed that the findings of the first judge should be treated as conclusive. But this court said: "We do not understand this to be the rule applicable to a case like this. It is true that this court will not review findings where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, but it has been repeatedly held that upon motion for a new trial it is the duty of the trial court to examine the evidence, even though it be conflicting, and, if dissatisfied with the conclusion reached, to grant a new trial. And the rule is the same whether the motion is heard by the judge who tried the case, or by some other judge, whose only knowledge of the facts is obtained from the record." Cases cited. In the case at bar there is certainly a substantial conflict of evidence as to the point above cited, on which the judge who granted the new trial mainly based his decision. Counsel for appellant very vigorously and strongly argues that the evidence was sufficient to support the findings, but it cannot be said that there was no substantial evidence against the correctness of that finding. It is sufficient to point out, for instance, that the defendants themselves positively swore that they had no knowledge that there was any intent upon the part of the insolvent to hinder her creditors by making the sale, or that they knew of her insolvency, and the insolvent herself testifies to the same thing. The fact that there was sold at the time all of the small stock of goods which the insolvent had was undoubtedly a fact tending to show to the buyers that there was something suspicious about the sale; but, on the other hand, it was shown that these goods had been continuously offered for sale for three months before the occasion on which they were sold; that the insolvent had offered them for sale during that time to the respondents, who had made a standing offer of a certain amount of money for them, and that they had been offered to others, preceding that time, for sale. These are some of the facts which appeared in the case, and, under these circumstances, we cannot certainly say that there was so little evidence in favor of the decision of the court below as to make it apparent that there was a gross abuse of discretion. The order appealed from is affirmed.

WITTER v. MISSION SCHOOL DIST. et al.
(L. A. 275.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENT OF SCHOOL LANDS.

Land belonging to school districts is only liable to assessment for street improvement when not used for school purposes, and a complaint seeking to subject such land to an assessment must allege that it was not so used.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county.

Action by W. G. Witter against the Mission school district and others. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, he appeals. Affirmed.

G. F. Witter, Jr., for appellant. W. H. Spencer, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to enforce payment of assessment for constructing a sidewalk in front of certain lots in the city of San Luis Obispo, of which defendant Mission school district is alleged to be the owner in fee. Judgment passed for defendants on demurrer to the sufficiency of facts alleged, from which this appeal is prosecuted. The complaint does not show whether the lots in question were or were not used by the district for school purposes, nor that any provision was made by the district for the payment of the debt out of its funds raised during the year the debt was created. The only question presented by appellant is whether these lots were subject to assessments under the act of March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 196). The act makes no exception as to owners or lots. The distinction between the term "assessment" and the term "taxation" was clearly pointed out in City of San Diego v. Linda Vista Irr. Dist., 108

Cal. 189, 41 Pac. 291; and it was there shown that there might be exemption from "taxation," under the constitution and the provisions of the Political Code (section 3607), where there would not necessarily be exemption from "assessments" of lands. Appellant relies upon this distinction and upon this case to support his claim. It was held in Mayrhofer v. Board, 89 Cal. 110, 26 Pac. 646, that the term "any building," in the mechanics' lien law, did not include a public schoolhouse. In Whittaker v. Tuolumne Co., 96 Cal. 100, 30 Pac. 1016, it was held that the word "person," used in section 1050, Code Civ. Proc., giving a right of action in a certain case, did not include a county or authorize it to be sued. In Skelly v. School Dist., 103 Cal. 652, 37 Pac. 643, it was held that, while a school district may be a "person," within the meaning of subdivision 5, § 542, Code Civ. Proc., it could not be garnished, "because laws made primarily to provide for individual rights will not be presumed to include the state when the effect might be to authorize a suit against the state, or embarrass it in the discharge of its functions." The principle of construction was stated in Mayrhofer v. Board, supra, to be "that the state is not bound by general words in a statute, which would operate to trench upon its sovereign rights, injuriously affect its capacity to perform its functions, or establish a right of action against it."

The proceeding here is to foreclose the lien of plaintiff on the property of a school district, and, in default of payment, to sell the property. If this property is used for school purposes, the inevitable result would be to injuriously affect the capacity of the district to perform its functions, quite as effectually as by the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien as was attempted in Mayrhofer v. Board, supra. In the case of City of San Diego v. Linda Vista Irr. Dist., supra, the lands were alleged to be pueblo lands of the city of San Diego, and were "vacant, unoccupied, and uncultivated agricultural lands, susceptible to cultivation, and would be largely benefited by irrigation; that they could not and cannot be profitably cultivated without irrigation, and are practically valueless for any other uses than agricultural and horticultural"; and that they were held and devoted to the private uses of the city, and were not incidental to the performance of any public or municipal function. A demurrer was sustained in the lower court, but the judgment was reversed on appeal. No such state of facts appears in the complaint here. So far as shown, the lots in question may have school buildings upon them, and may be used and occupied exclusively for school purposes, in which case we do not think this action could be maintained. As a private owner, however, of land not used exclusively for school purposes, but held as an investment, or from which to derive rentals, as property of an individual is held and owned, we see no reason why the lands of a school district should not be assessed for improvements the same as those of any other private owner. But we think, as land belonging to school districts is liable for such assessments only when it is not used for school purposes, the complaint should allege the facts necessary to bring the case within the exception. This it failed to do, and as plaintiff did not ask leave to amend in the court below, and does not suggest now that he can amend in the particular referred to, the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

In re MILLER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 1,203.)

WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE—LIFE INSURANCE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 690, providing that the life insurance of a debtor is exempt from execution where the annual premiums paid do not exceed $500, and section 1465, providing that the court may set apart to the surviving wife of a decedent all property exempt from execution, the court may set apart decedent's life insurance to the widow, where the annual premiums paid do not exceed $500, and where the insurance was payable to decedent's executors or administrators.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Samuel Miller, deceased. Appeal from an order setting apart property to the widow of deceased. Affirmed.

E. C. Chapman and E. Ames, for appellant. C. S. Barkeford and J. K. Johnson, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an appeal from an order setting apart property to the widow of deceased as exempt from execution. The facts appear in the petition of the widow for the order, all of which are admitted by the demurrer. No answer was filed or evidence taken at the hearing. Samuel Miller died in 1896, intestate, and Lillian Miller was appointed administratrix, December 14, 1896, and duly qualified. An inventory and appraisalment was filed March 15, 1897. It is averred that the administratrix has received $5,000 on account of a policy of insurance on the life of Samuel Miller, deceased, dated February 22, 1888, and payable, by its terms, to the executors or administrators of the insured. The annual premiums did not exceed the sum of $500. The heirs at law of decedent were the petitioner and two daughters of the deceased, both over the age of majority, and resident in the state of New York. It is claimed that the said sum of money so received is exempt from execution, and petitioner asks that it be set apart to her under the provisions of the statute. The two daughters, Marian E. Whitcomb and Grace E. Miller, appeared, and resisted the application, but, as stated, they did not controvert any of the allegations as to the facts. They object that (1) the money is not exempt from execution; or (2) it is not exempt as against the heirs; and (3) the daughters are each entitled to a one-fourth interest in the proceeds of the policy.

Section 690 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so far as material here, reads as follows: "The following property is exempt from execution, except as otherwise specially provided: * * * (10) All moneys, benefits, privileges or immunities accruing or in any manner growing out of any life insurance on the life of the debtor, if the annual premiums paid do not exceed five hundred dollars." Section 1465 provides that the court may set apart for the use of the surviving husband or wife of the decedent all the property which is exempt from execution. It is contended that the policy being made payable to the administrator, and not to the insured, the policy did not belong to the deceased, and never could have been sequestered for the benefit of his creditors, even though there had been no statutory exemption. Therefore the money did not accrue to the deceased out of such policy, and it is not within the description of property referred to in section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

But to make a policy payable only to the insured after death is to make it payable only to his administrator, executors, or assigns; and I think it is the invariable practice of all life insurance companies, where no other beneficiary is named, to make all policies payable to the insured, his executors, administrators, or assigns. The legal effect would have been the same (provided the policy is assignable) if it had been made payable to himself only, or to his executors and administrators. If the insured had assigned the policy in his lifetime, the administrator would have had no vested beneficial interest which would have been affected and which would have warranted his being heard to object.

At common law the administrator or executor was the legal beneficiary in all policies payable to the insured. Cooke, Life Ins. § 57. The policy descended to him. Our system differs, in that personalty descends to the heirs, with a special interest in the administrator. But, so far as affects this question, the difference is purely ideal. In either case, the personal representative must collect and administer upon it. Although set apart under the statute, the money is administered upon, and until so set apart is a part of the estate. The order setting it apart is a species of distribution.

Yore v. Booth, 110 Cal. 238, 42 Pac. 808, is not in point. The real question there was whether a policy payable to the heirs generally was not the same in legal effect as when payable to the executors or administrators. A rule had been made in those jurisdictions where property which goes to the heirs rather than to the administrators is not, except under special circumstances, subject to administration, to the effect that such a designation was intended to take the proceeds out of the estate, and vest it at once in the heirs as beneficiaries. The rule had become general,—in fact, universal,—and after discussion was adopted here. I can think of no reason for holding that, when the money is made payable to the executors or administrators generally, they are vested with any interest in, or right in reference to, the policy. I think, therefore, the policy was the property of Samuel Miller in his lifetime, and was properly set apart to his widow. The order is affirmed.

SAN FRANCISCO SAV. UNION v. LONG et al. (S. F. 1,041.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1898.)

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE—SPECIAL FUNDS—LIENS
—EXTINGUISHMENT—LIMITATIONS—SURETIES—SUBROGATION—INTERPLEADER—PARTIES—PLEADING—SPLITTING DEMANDS—ASSIGNMENT.

1. Under St. 1891, p. 126, § 2, compelling mutual assessment life insurance companies to deposit a fund for the protection of policy holders; and section 4, providing that the beneficiaries shall have a lien on all property of the corporation, with priority over all indebtedness thereafter incurred,—one who was entitled to payment of a death benefit at the time the statute became effective had a lien on such deposit as soon as it was made, the protection of the lien being not restricted to after-incurred debts.

2. Where sureties for a life insurance company were obliged to pay a death benefit, they are entitled to be subrogated to a lien in favor of the beneficiary on a fund created for the protection of policy holders.

3. Where the holder of a deposit created under St. 1891, p. 126, § 2, providing that assessment life insurance corporations shall deposit a certain sum for the protection of policy holders, had brought an action to interplead various claimants to such fund, it was proper to permit a party who claimed the right to enforce a beneficiary's lien on such fund to assert such lien in the same action, and not to relegate him to a creditors' bill or a writ of execution.

4. The right of sureties to be subrogated to a lien on their principal's property may be assigned.

5. Where sureties had paid part of a judgment against the principal, which had paid the balance itself, and were entitled to be subrogated to a lien against the principal, the enforcement by their assignee of such lien to the amount paid by them is a single demand, and not obnoxious to the rule against splitting demands.

6. A surety who has not contributed to the payment of the principal's judgment debt is not a necessary party to the determination of a right of lien claimed by the assignee of his co-sureties by subrogation to the rights of the judgment creditor.

7. Allegations that a judgment out of which defendant's claim grew was based on a certificate of life insurance issued by a named life association to one L. M. on May 1, 1896, and in favor of M. M., who was then the wife of said L. M.; that said certificate was for the sum of $6,000; that on a certain date said M. died, and at the time the said certificate was in full force and effect, and by reason of his death, there became due and payable, etc.,—in the absence of demurrer or objections to their sufficiency below, sufficiently plead such policy, performance of conditions thereof, and accrual of the right of action thereon.

8. Where a lien on a fund created to secure payment of death benefits under St. 1891, p. 126, §§ 2, 4, relating to assessment life insurance corporations, attached pending an action on a policy, the establishment of such indebtedness by final judgment gave the right to enforce such lien, and it attached to the judgment, and continued until same was satisfied; and hence such lien did not, by virtue of Civ. Code, § 2911, providing that liens shall be extinguished on the expiration of the time within which an action may be brought on the principal obligation, become extinguished on the lapse of such period of limitation from the time the lien attached.

9. Where a lien on a fund created to secure payment of death benefits under St. 1891, p. 126, §§ 2, 4, relating to assessment life insurance corporations, attached pending an action on a policy, the establishment of such indebtedness by final judgment gave the right to enforce such lien; and, such enforcement being sought in an action begun thereafter within the time prescribed for bringing an action on the policy, the claim of lien was not barred by limitation, though more than the period of such limitation had elapsed since the lien attached.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the San Francisco Savings Union against E. B. Long and others. From a judgment in favor of defendant Guy Shoup and another, and from orders denying a new trial, the other defendants appealed. Affirmed.

Dorn & Dorn, Chas. S. Perry, Theo. Savage, T. Carl Spelling, and Guy Shoup, for appellants. H. C. Campbell, Lane & Lane, Byron Waters, and Van Ness & Redman, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff is, and at all the times mentioned in the complaint was, a savings bank, duly incorporated, and doing business as such under the laws of this state. The defendant Home Benefit Life Association was organized as a corporation under the laws of this state in 1880, and from that time until on or about September 26, 1894, was continuously engaged doing a life insurance business upon the assessment plan.

In March, 1891, an act was passed by the legislature, entitled "An act relating to life, health, accident and annuity or endowment insurance on the assessment plan, and the conduct of the business of such insurance" (St. 1891, p. 126), which contained the following provisions:

"Sec. 2. Corporations may be formed under the general laws of this state to carry on the business of mutual insurance upon the assessment plan, and shall be subject only to the provisions of this act. No such corporation shall issue contracts of insurance until at least two hundred persons have applied, in writing, for membership or insurance therein, and have paid to the treasurer of such corporation the sum of five thousand dollars. This sum shall be invested in bonds or securities, approved by the insurance commissioner of this state, or deposited in some bank in this state, where it will earn interest. Said bonds or securities, or evidences of such deposit, shall be placed, through the insurance commissioner of this state, with the state treasurer, and the principal sum shall be held in trust for the contract holders of such corporation," etc.

"Sec. 3. Any existing corporation engaged in transacting the business of life, health, accident or endowment insurance on the assessment plan may re-incorporate under the provisions of the Civil Code of this state and under the provisions of this act: provided, that it shall not be obligatory upon such corporation to re-incorporate; and any such existing corporation may continue to exercise all rights, powers and privileges conferred by this act the same as if incorporated hereunder.

"Sec. 4. The contracts of insurance issued by such corporations shall specify the sum or sums to be paid upon the happening of the contingency insured against, and when such payments will be made. Unless the contract shall have been invalidated by fraud or by breach of its conditions, the corporation shall be obligated to pay the beneficiary the amount or amounts specified in its contract at the time or times therein named, and such indebtedness shall be a lien upon all the property of such corporation, with priority over all indebtedness thereafter incurred," etc.

In compliance with the requirement of said act the Home Benefit Life Association on March 15, 1892, deposited in the San Francisco Savings Union, plaintiff herein, the sum of $5,000 as a term deposit, and took a "special certificate of term deposit" therefor. This certificate the said association, on the next day, by an indorsement written on the back thereof, assigned and transferred to the insurance commissioner of the state for the protection of its certificate holders; and thereupon the said commissioner, in pursuance of the requirements of the said act of 1891, caused the said certificate to be placed and deposited with the then state treasurer, and the plaintiff was notified of the assignment at or about the time it was made. In September, 1894, the said association became insolvent, and ceased to do business. At that time the association was indebted upon contracts of insurance of deceased members in the sum of more than $50,000, and nearly all the property applicable to the payment of these claims was the said $5,000 on deposit in the plaintiff's bank. There were also more than 100 living contract members of the association. Prior to and about the time it suspended business, several suits upon the death claims were commenced against the association, some of which had gone to judgment before this case was tried, and some were still pending. Various remedies were resorted to by said claimants for the purpose of realizing wholly or in part upon their claims, and each sought to establish a first lien upon the said deposit. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff brought this action against the conflicting claimants of the said money to compel them to interplead and litigate their several claims among themselves. The said association, the state treasurer, the insurance commissioner, and about 130 certificate holders, including the judgment creditors, were made parties defendant. The complaint set out the facts and stated that the plaintiff was ignorant of the respective rights of the defendants; that it had and made no claim to the said money, and was ready and willing to pay the same into court upon the surrender and cancellation of said certificate. And the prayer was that the defendants be required to interplead; that the state treasurer and insurance commissioner be required to deposit the said certificate in court; and that thereupon plaintiff be permitted to pay into court the sum of $5,000, with the accrued dividends thereon; and that, upon so doing, the certificate be canceled by the clerk, and the plaintiff be discharged from all liability to each and all of the defendants in relation thereto. Answers and cross complaints were filed by the defendants, setting up their respective claims and rights to the said money, and controverting the alleged rights of others thereto. When the cause came on for trial, the said certificate of deposit and the money in controversy, then, with the accrued dividends thereon, aggregating $5,743.16, were, in pursuance of an order of court duly made and entered in its minutes, deposited in court. The cause was then tried and submitted, and thereafter the court made and filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, whereby it was found and determined that the defendant Guy Shoup had the first lien upon the money deposited in court by the plaintiff, to the extent of $4,310.10, with interest thereon, and was entitled to be first paid out of said money the sum of $4,735.87, and that the defendant Sophia Koneke had the second lien upon the said money, superior to that of all claimants except said Shoup, and was entitled to the balance of said money, less a small amount of costs, namely, the sum of $997.20; that the remaining defendants were not entitled to anything by reason of the action; and that the plaintiff was entitled to be released and discharged from all liability to any and all of the parties to the action for and on account of the said money. A decree was accordingly so entered, from which, except that portion thereof awarding a part of the money to Mrs. Koneke, nearly all of the defendants have appealed, and two of them have also appealed from orders denying their motions for a new trial.

The record presented covers more than 300 pages of the printed transcript, and there have been several suggestions of a diminution of the record, and some of the omitted parts have been since supplied. Ten briefs have been filed on behalf of the contesting parties, and the questions discussed are numerous, and some of them complicated. The principal question relates to the rights of respondent Shoup, and to that we shall chiefly give our attention. It is earnestly contended that Shoup had no interest in or right to any of the money, and that the court erred in awarding to him any part of it. The facts upon which the alleged rights of Shoup were based are as follows: On May 1, 1886, the Home Benefit Life Association executed and delivered to Lemuel T. Murray its certificate of membership, by the terms of which it promised to pay to his wife, Miranda E. Murray, the sum of $6,000 upon his death and upon the prior performance by him of all the conditions of the said certificate. Murray died September 29, 1886, and meantime he had complied with and performed all the conditions of the certificate of membership. Mrs. Murray made due proof of his death and of her claim under said certificate, and, by reason of his death, there became due and payable to her from the said association the sum of $6,000. In due time she demanded of the association payment of the said sum of money; but it refused to pay the same, or any part thereof, and claimed that said certificate was not in force at the time of Murray's death. In July, 1888, Mrs. Murray commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the association to recover the sum of $6,000, with interest, alleged to be due her on the said certificate. The action resulted in a judgment, rendered May 17, 1892, in favor of the plaintiff (then, by reason of her second marriage, known as and called Miranda E. Mills), and against the defendant, for the sum of $8,255.08, and $215 costs of suit. From that judgment, and an order denying a new trial, an appeal to this court was taken by the defendant association; and a stay bond or undertaking was executed and filed by it, on which W. H. Chickering and F. C. Havens were sureties. On December 26, 1894, the judgment and order were affirmed by this court (Mills v. Association, 105 Cal. 232, 38 Pac. 723); and in due time a remittitur was sent to the clerk of the court below. At the time of the affirmance there was due and owing from the defendant to Mrs. Mills the sum of $10,130.22, and of this sum the said Chickering and Havens, by reason of their liability as sureties under the stay bond, were compelled to, and did, pay from their own funds, to Mrs. Mills, in the months of April and September, 1895, $4,310.10, the balance of the judgment being paid from other funds of the association. On October 8, 1896, said Chickering and Havens sold, assigned, and transferred in writing to respondent Shoup all their right, title, and interest in and to the said judgment, so partially paid and satisfied by them, and also all their interest in and claim of lien upon the money paid by the plaintiff into court in this action. Upon these facts, the court found: "That the said Miranda E. Mills acquired a lien securing her claim arising as aforesaid upon the money paid into court by the plaintiff immediately upon its deposit with the plaintiff by said Home Benefit Life Association, as above found, by reason of the provision of the act of 1891, above referred to; that the lien thereby acquired was then, and ever since has been, the first lien upon said money or fund, and was and is superior and prior to all others"; and "that by reason of the partial payments made by said sureties as aforesaid, and the said assignment made by them to defendant Shoup, he (the said defendant Shoup), ever since the date of said assignment, has had, and now has, the first lien upon said sum or fund of money, to the extent of said sum of $4,310.10, with interest thereon from the dates of payment thereof, as before found."

It is claimed that these findings were mere conclusions of law, and were not supported by the facts proved or found by the court. But we think it must be held that, under the provisions of the act of 1891, the indebtedness due Mrs. Mills became a lien on the money deposited with plaintiff as soon as the deposit was made. The act does not seem to limit the lien to indebtedness arising after the act was passed, but makes it apply to all indebtedness upon certificates of insurance, whether it became due and payable before or after the passage of the act. And, if this be so, then it is clear that, so far as is shown by the record, Mrs. Mills had the first lien upon the said money to secure payment of her claim; and, when Chickering and Havens paid a part of her judgment, they were subrogated to all her rights as to the amount paid. "The general rule is that a surety who pays the debt of his principal will be subrogated to all the securities, liens, and equities, rights, remedies, and priorities held by the creditor against the principal, and entitled to enforce them against the latter in a court of equity or of equitable jurisdiction."

24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 194. And see the numerous authorities cited in support of the proposition. Chickering and Havens were therefore entitled to claim and enforce the lien which Mrs. Mills had, and, when they assigned to Shoup, he succeeded to all their rights.

But say appellants: "At any rate, neither the sureties nor their assignee may entertain any other action based upon the substitution than a creditors' bill. They may, by a supplementary proceeding, discover equitable assets, and, having discovered them, may resort, first, to garnishment or other legal process, and, upon that proving ineffectual, bring an action in equity in the nature of a creditors' bill to subject them to the satisfaction of the judgment. But, if such action and such proceeding are not needed, they can only resort to an execution." This proposition cannot be sustained. Evidently, Shoup was compelled to assert his rights in this action, if he would assert them at all. The action was one of interpleader, in which all the claims to the money in controversy were to be disposed of. It admitted necessarily the assertion of equitable as well as legal rights, and the court was authorized and empowered to adjust them all.

It is next urged that the right of the sureties was a mere equity, and was not assignable; and, in support of this proposition, Sanborn v. Doe, 92 Cal. 152, 28 Pac. 105, is cited. That case has no bearing upon the question in hand. It related to a question of fraud, and it was simply held that "a right to complain of fraud is not assignable."

"The rule against splitting demands" is also invoked, and it is claimed that under it respondent was not entitled to recover. But that rule does not apply here. The association paid a portion of the judgment, and the sureties paid the balance of it. After the judgment was paid, there remained but one demand, and that was held by the sureties. No question, therefore, as to "splitting demands" could be involved.

Appellants further say: "Even if a part of such claims were assignable, there would still exist a defect of parties; and there could be no final determination of the rights of the parties unless the judgment creditor and the other obligor on the bond were before the court." But the judgment creditor, Mrs. Mills, was before the court, and the other obligor, Mr. Allen, paid nothing, and had no claim to be satisfied.

It is also claimed that the answer and cross complaint of defendant Shoup stated no cause of action entitling him to any equitable relief; and it is said: "There is not a single allegation upon which to base a claim to this or any form of equitable relief, even if that act covered the Mills claim"; that "the terms of the certificate or policy of life insurance are not set forth or even mentioned"; and that the pleading "does not allege the performance of any of the conditions of any certificate or policy of life insurance" by Murray, nor the furnishing of any proofs of his death. The answer and cross complaint, after setting out the facts in relation to the judgment recovered by Mrs. Mills, the appeal therefrom, etc., alleged "that the said judgment so rendered in favor of said Miranda E. Mills was based upon a certificate or policy of life insurance issued by said Home Benefit Life Association to one Lemuel T. Murray, on May 1, 1896, and in favor of said Miranda E. Mills, who at said last-named date was the wife of said Murray; that said certificate was for the sum of $6,000; that thereafter, and upon the 29th day of September, 1896, the said Murray died; and that at said time the said certificate was in full force and effect; and that, by reason of his said death, there became due and payable," etc. No demurrer to the pleading was filed, nor, so far as appears, was any objection to its sufficiency raised in the court below. We think, therefore, it must be held to have stated all the facts necessary for the purposes of this action, and that the objections to it cannot be sustained.

It is objected that, at any rate, respondent had no lien on the deposited money, and counsel say: "I know of no law which gives one whose life is insured a lien on the property of the insurer, or which makes the insurer a debtor to the insured." But that, in cases like this, the beneficiary of the insured may have a lien on the property of the insurer was expressly declared by the act of 1891; and it was so held in Kruger v. Association, 106 Cal. 98, 39 Pac. 213.

It is further objected that the Shoup claim was barred by the statute of limitations; and, in support of this objection, counsel cite section 2911 of the Civil Code. That section is as follows: "A lien is extinguished by the lapse of the time within which, under the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation." The section is not a statute of limitation, but relates alone to the extinguishment of liens. The question, then, is, had the lien of the Mills-Shoup claim become extinguished before Shoup filed his answer and cross complaint? We do not think it had. An action upon the principal obligation was brought in 1888, and was pending when the act of 1891 was passed. The deposit was made March 15, 1892; and thereupon, under section 4 of the act, Mrs. Mills' claim became a lien upon the money deposited, which might be thereafter enforced, provided the claim should be established as a valid indebtedness. When judgment was recovered in the action, the judgment became a lien on the money, and continued to be so until the amount thereof was or shall be paid. It was not necessary for Mrs. Mills to change her pleading, and ask for an enforcement of the lien, as it did not become merged in the judgment, but was attached to it and accompanied it to the end. It is evident, therefore, that the lien claimed by Shoup had not become extinguished.

Nor do we think, if the statute of limitations had been properly pleaded, as it was not, that Shoup's claim of lien would have been barred. The lien is statutory, and exists until the indebtedness which it secures is satisfied. Mrs. Mills' claim was not finally established until December, 1894, when her judgment was affirmed by this court, and she was not required to assert any right to a lien before that. This action was commenced March 31, 1896, and Shoup's answer and cross complaint was filed October 9, 1896. This was in time, and his claim was not then barred.

Many other points are made and very elaborately and ably argued by counsel, but to review them would require this opinion to be extended to a very great length. We have carefully considered all the points made, and are of the opinion that no error calling for a reversal is shown; and as the judgment and order must be affirmed, if we are right in what has already been said, any discussion of the other points presented seems unnecessary. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

RUGGLES v. CANNEDY et al. (Sac. 244.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1898.)

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—RECORDING OF—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—SUIT BY ASSIGNEE IN INSOLVENCY.

1. Civ. Code, § 2957, provides that a mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors unless recorded in like manner as grants of real property. Held that, since recordation has been made by the Code the equivalent of an immediate delivery and continued change of possession, a chattel mortgage not immediately recorded is void as to creditors whose claims arose between its execution and recordation.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 2957, providing that a mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors unless recorded, a creditor may sue to set aside as fraudulent a mortgage not seasonably recorded, though he has not acquired a lien by judgment or attachment before the recordation of such mortgage.

3. A chattel mortgage not seasonably recorded is valid as between the parties, and as against creditors whose claims arise after recordation.

4. For the purpose of enforcing their rights against fraudulent or void acts of an insolvent, the allowance and approval of creditors' claims in an insolvency court are equivalent to a judgment.

5. In a suit to declare an unrecorded mortgage void, it is not necessary for a creditor to show that he cannot make good his debt out of property not covered by such mortgage when his averment of his debtor's voluntary insolvency is not denied.

6. Under the insolvent act (sections 18 and 21), all the estate of the insolvent passes to the assignee in insolvency, and the latter may maintain a suit to set aside a transfer void as to creditors, since, as between the debtor and creditors, the debtor is regarded as holding the title to property which he has fraudulently transferred, and such title therefore passes to his assignee in insolvency.

7. A judgment setting aside a chattel mortgage because not seasonably recorded, and therefore void as to creditors, will be sustained, though there was no finding that the recordation was not seasonably made, where it was averred, and not denied, that six months elapsed between the making and recording thereof.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county.

Action by J. B. Ruggles against W. J. Cannedy and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Thomas, for appellants. Philip Benton, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action is brought by the assignee in insolvency of one Wilgus, seeking a decree declaring void against creditors a chattel mortgage executed by Wilgus to defendant Cannedy. The appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. The findings of fact negative all claim of actual fraud and of a violation of the provisions of the insolvency act. The mortgage was made upon February 17, 1893, for a valuable consideration, and, for a like consideration, was assigned to the defendant bank, which took without knowledge of Wilgus' contemplated insolvency. It was not recorded, however, until August 26, 1893, six months later, and two days before Wilgus, under his voluntary petition, was declared an insolvent. Intermediate the time of giving and the time of recording the mortgage, Wilgus incurred debts, some of which were proved and allowed in the insolvency court. The creditors knew nothing of the mortgage until its recordation. The court, under the facts, adjudged the mortgage to be null and void to these creditors at the suit of the assignee.

Two leading questions are thus presented: (1) Is a chattel mortgage, withheld from record beyond a time reasonably necessary for its prompt recordation, void against creditors whose claims have arisen between the date of its execution and the date of its recordation? (2) May such a mortgage be declared void at the instance of the assignee in insolvency on behalf of such creditors whose claims have been proved and allowed against the estate of the insolvent mortgagor? Respondent, of course, maintains that both these interrogatories should be answered in the affirmative. Appellants oppose this, insisting that our recordation laws do not compel nor contemplate an immediate recordation of a chattel mortgage; that, if the mortgagee delays recordation, he merely takes the risk of losing his lien by a sale to an innocent purchaser, or of having it subordinated to that of creditors who have acquired superior rights by judgments, attachments, or executions; that, whenever recorded, the mortgage is valid against all creditors, saving those who have themselves acquired prior liens; and, finally, that, at all events, the mortgage recorded before insolvency, and not in violation of the insolvency law, may not be set aside at the instance of the assignee, who represents the insolvent, and who has no rights in the matter which the insolvent himself did not possess. As the unrecorded mortgage is valid between the mortgagee and the insolvent, as in its execution and delivery there was no fraud upon the insolvency law, and as no creditor has acquired a lien upon the mortgaged property before recordation, it is argued that the contract of mortgage is valid as to the assignee.

The determination of the first question must depend upon the language of our Codes, and upon the policy of the law deducible therefrom. In the early jurisprudence of the state the law touching sales and mortgages of personal property was found in one and the same "act concerning fraudulent conveyances and contracts." St. 1850, p. 266. By section 15 of that act it was provided: "Every sale made by a vendor of goods and chattels in his possession or under his control, and every assignment of goods and chattels, unless the same be accompanied by an immediate delivery and be followed by an actual and continued change in possession of things sold or assigned, shall be conclusive evidence of fraud as against the creditors of the vendor, or the creditors of the person making such assignment, or subsequent purchasers in good faith." In section 17 it was declared: "No mortgage of personal property hereafter shall be valid against any other persons than the parties thereto, unless possession of the mortgaged property be delivered to and retained by the mortgagee." Recordation at that time was unknown. Delivery and possession of the mortgaged chattel were required. But it is to be noted that while, as to sales, the statute expressly demanded an immediate delivery, there was no such explicit exaction in the terms of the law governing mortgages. At a very early day this fact was called to the attention of the court, and upon it was attempted an argument of some substantial difference between the law governing sales and that governing mortgages. Thus, in Chenery v. Palmer, 6 Cal. 119, we find the appellant complaining of an instruction by the lower court that, to render a chattel mortgage valid against creditors, there must be an immediate delivery. In Hackett v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 85, it is argued that such a mortgage is good against those who were not creditors, even after delayed possession taken. Finally, in Woods v. Bugbey, 29 Cal. 467, this court treated the question at length, and held that, as to delivery and change of possession, the same principle and rule applied whether the sale was absolute or conditional by way of mortgage. First quoting from Lay v. Neville, 25 Cal. 552, to the effect that the delivery must be immediate, it continued: "The rule which our statute prescribes admits of no excuse dispensing with an actual and continued change of possession of the property sold, assigned, or mortgaged." There is thus no room left for doubt but that the law of 1850 rendered void, at the instance of creditors, a chattel mortgage, unless it was accompanied by an immediate delivery, and by an actual and continued change of possession of the property affected.

In time, this statute of 1850 was repealed, and in place of the sections we have been considering were substituted the following Code provisions: "Every transfer of personal property, * * * and every lien thereon, other than a mortgage, when allowed by law, * * * is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession, and the successors in interest of such creditors, and against any persons on whom his estate devolves in trust for the benefit of others than himself, and against purchasers or incumbrancers in good faith subsequent to the transfer." Civ. Code, § 3440. "A mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith, and for value, unless: (1) It is accompanied by the affidavit of all the parties thereto that it is made in good faith, and without any design to hinder, delay or defraud creditors; (2) it is acknowledged or proved, certified and recorded in like manner as grants of real property." Civ. Code, § 2957. Thus, in the case of the articles of personal property enumerated in section 2955 of the Code, recordation became a substitute for delivery and change of possession. "The recording of the mortgage is therefore made by the Code the equivalent of an immediate delivery and continued change of possession." Berson v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 550; Martin v. Thompson, 63 Cal. 3.

But here it is argued that, while the law makes recordation the substitute for an immediate delivery, it does not mean or require immediate recordation, but only provides that, when effected, recordation is the equivalent of immediate delivery and continued and actual change of possession. Considering that the law demands immediate delivery, and that recordation is but a substitute for it, it is not easy to see how an indefinitely delayed recordation may be said to take the place of an actual, immediate delivery. One being designed as a substitute for the other, what is the condition, in the one case, if the property be not immediately delivered? Indisputably, the mortgage is void as to creditors. What, then, is the condition in the other case for the indefinite period during which there has been no recordation? While recordation is lacking, there is not only no equivalent for an immediate delivery, but there is no delivery at all. Recordation itself is the substitute for delivery. A prompt recordation most obviously takes the place of an immediate delivery, and a delayed recordation of a tardy delivery. How, then, can a recordation effected one year or ten years after the execution of the mortgage be said to be the equivalent of the delivery which by the law is required to be made with all reasonable dispatch? Even more untenable does this argument seem when consideration is had for the manifest policy of these laws. The very object of them all—the reason for their being—is to prevent secret liens upon and interests in personal property. Says Chancellor Kent (2 Kent, Comm. *523): "The policy of the law will not permit the owner of personal property to create an interest in another, either by mortgage or absolute sale, and still continue to be the visible owner. The law will not stop to inquire whether there was actual fraud or not, for it is against sound policy to suffer the vendor to remain in possession. * * * It necessarily creates a secret incumbrance as to personal property, when to the world the vendor or mortgagor appears to be the owner, and he gains credit as such, and is enabled to practice deceit upon mankind." In Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 Pac. 858, it is said: "It must be remembered, in general, that the policy of the law is against upholding secret liens and charges to the injury of innocent purchasers or incumbrancers for value, and, in particular, that mortgages of personal property are permitted only in certain specified cases, and this only upon the observance of certain formalities designed to secure good faith, and to give notice to the world of the character of the transaction." This language has very recently been quoted with approval in Society v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 236, 44 Pac. 561.

With this for the unquestioned policy of the law, how can it successfully be urged that an interpretation which fosters and encourages the very evil which the law was destined to check can be the true one? A mortgage without immediate delivery would create a secret lien, admittedly void against creditors. Is a mortgage without immediate recordation any less a secret lien, or any less an evil to be avoided? Prior to the amendment to section 2955 of the Civil Code, adopted in 1895, as counsel well instance, if a person had desired to borrow money upon his farming implements he would have been compelled to transfer possession immediately under section 3440 of the Civil Code. By the amendment these implements are placed in the list of those upon which statutory chattel mortgages may be given. Therefore he may now make such a mortgage upon them without delivery. Did the legislature intend to accommodate the farmer by enabling him to retain possession and use of his property, while at the same time protecting the public by recordation? Or did it design to make fraud easier by framing an ever-increasing list of articles upon which might be placed secret liens? The mortgagor holding possession could thus obtain credit upon the strength of his apparent untrammelled ownership, while the mortgagee could defeat the creditors' recovery by recording his mortgage at any time before the levy of an attachment. Fassett v. Wise, 115 Cal. 316, 47 Pac. 47, 1095, which appellants cite, is not in point upon the proposition we have been considering. This court was there called upon to construe the sections of the Civil Code (2959 and 2965) dealing with the "place" of recordation. It was insisted that the mortgage having been executed in Kings county, and the sheep having been removed thence to Tulare county before recordation anywhere, there was allowed, under section 2965, 30 days after such removal in which to record in Tulare county. It was decided that this section did not apply, that the mortgage was not recorded, and therefore not a mortgage at all as to creditors until after it had been placed on record both in Kings county and Tulare county. The effect as to creditors of the tardy recordation in Kings county was not determined.

We conclude upon this question that our law requires immediate recordation in lieu of immediate delivery, and that, when such recordation is not effected, the mortgage "is void as against creditors of the mortgagor." The penalty for a failure to record promptly in the case of a mortgage is identical with the penalty under section 3440 for a failure to deliver promptly in the case of a sale. In either case the failure results in a legal fraud against those whom the statute enumerates and protects. Section 3440 excepts a "mortgage when allowed by law" from the requirement of immediate delivery, because, and only because, the recordation takes the place of delivery. It certainly cannot be said that it was the design of the legislature to exclude the articles of personal property affected by such mortgages from the operations of the laws forbidding secret liens. But this, it is to be noted, does not mean that such a mortgage between the parties, and as to all the world, is absolutely void, like an unrecorded builder's contract under the mechanic's lien law. It does mean, however, that it may be avoided at the instance of any one in the enumerated classes—creditor, purchaser, or incumbrancer—whose right accrues during the time the recordation is withheld. Between the parties the unrecorded mortgage is, of course, valid. It is likewise valid against any creditor, purchaser, or incumbrancer whose claim arises after recordation. So, too, the mortgagee's interest in or title to the chattel affected by the unrecorded mortgage may be successfully asserted against a mere trespasser. Whether it is void against a creditor who extended credit before the making of the mortgage does not here call for decision. Suffice it to say that, upon this as well as upon many other questions concerning chattel mortgages, an irreconcilable conflict in the decisions of the courts upon statutes practically identical in language will be discovered. Stephens v. Perrine, 143 N. Y. 476, 39 N. E. 11; Dempsey v. Pforzheimer, 86 Mich. 652, 49 N. W. 465.

But it is insisted that, even if an unrecorded mortgage is void at the instance of creditors, only those creditors may take advantage of the law who by judgment and execution levy, or at least by attachment levy, have acquired a lien upon the property before recordation. In this appellants place reliance upon section 237 of Jones on Chattel Mortgages, and upon the authorities which the learned author cites in support of his text. He speaks as follows: "The only effect of delay in recording or filing a mortgage is to render it void as against intervening purchasers or mortgagees, or creditors obtaining liens by attachment, judgment, or execution. If the time within which a mortgage must be recorded or filed be not expressly prescribed by statute, it is sufficient that this be done at any time before possession is taken, or interest or liens are acquired by others, no matter how long this be after the execution of the mortgage. The record of a mortgage being only a substitute for the mortgagee's possession, it follows that, in the absence of any record, possession taken by the mortgagee before others have acquired any interest in the property makes his mortgage lien complete." To this the answer is that such is not the law of this state. In terms, this rule is limited to those cases where immediate recordation is not required by law, and in our state, as has been discussed, as well as in other states under similar and well-nigh identical statutes, as will be shown, immediate recordation is exacted. Again, as we have seen, a perfect analogy exists in our law between the case of sales and the case of mortgages of personal property. In both instances immediate delivery, or its equivalent,—immediate recordation,—must take place. In each the result of a failure in this particular is to render the contract absolutely void as to creditors. In Watson v. Rodgers, 53 Cal. 402, it is held that a sale of personal property unaccompanied by an immediate delivery is void as to creditors, notwithstanding the delivery was effected before the creditors acquired a lien by attachment levy. In Chenery v. Palmer, 6 Cal. 119, it is decided that, whether the contract is a sale or a mortgage, in either event, not being followed by immediate delivery, it was void as to creditors, though delivery was made before levy. In other words, two distinct propositions have thus been decided,—the first, that neither in the case of a sale nor of a mortgage would a delayed delivery validate the contract against creditors; and, second, that it was not necessary that these creditors should have acquired rights by judgment or attachment before delivery of the chattel sold or mortgaged to warrant their setting aside the transfer. Our recordation laws, admittedly being but a substitute for such immediate delivery, certainly have not changed the principles here announced, and should not be said to have changed the rule which elsewhere finds abundant support.

It is recognized that the authorities are in conflict upon this proposition, and that in some states it is held that a creditor must have acquired a lien before recordation of the mortgage, else it is valid against him. Such, we have said, is not the rule in this state. It is not the rule in Washington, whose law provides: "A mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor * * * unless it is recorded in the same manner as is required by law in conveyances of real property." Gen. St. § 1648; Willamette Casket Co. v. Cross Undertaking Co., 12 Wash. 190, 40 Pac. 729. The same may be said of Wisconsin, whose statute is as follows: "No mortgage of personal property shall be valid as against third persons unless the property be delivered to and retained by the mortgagee, or unless the mortgage or a copy thereof be filed." Rev. St. § 2313; Drugstore Co. v. Hvambzahl (Wis.) 61 N. W. 299. The Michigan statute provides (Howell's Ann. St. § 6193): "Every mortgage or conveyance intended to operate as a mortgage of goods and chattels, which shall hereafter be made, which shall not be accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the thing mortgaged, shall be absolutely void as against the creditors of the mortgagor, * * * unless the mortgage or a true copy thereof shall be filed in the office of the township clerk," etc. In Crippen v. Fletcher, 56 Mich. 386, 23 N. W. 56, and in Dempsey v. Pforzheimer, 86 Mich. 652, 49 N. W. 465, it is held that such mortgages, under the law as quoted, are absolutely void against creditors whose claims have arisen during the time they were withheld from recordation, notwithstanding the fact that they had acquired no lien upon the specific property until after recordation or possession taken. Without further quotations, it is sufficient to cite additionally upon this point the cases of Noyes v. Brace (S.

D.) 65 N. W. 1071; Thompson v. Van Vechten, 27 N. Y. 581; Karst v. Gane, 136 N. Y. 316, 32 N. E. 1073; Stephens v. Perrine, 143 N. Y. 476, 39 N. E. 11; Roe v. Meding, 53 N. J. Eq. 350, 33 Atl. 394; Simpson v. Harris, 21 Nev. 353, 31 Pac. 1009; Bank v. Anthony, 39 Neb. 343, 57 N. W. 1029; Kimball Co. v. Kirby, 4 S. D. 152, 55 N. W. 1110. Of course, it is true in general that a creditor at large of the mortgagor cannot set aside a mortgage for lack of recordation, any more than can such a creditor set aside a sale void for want of immediate delivery. He must come first with his judgment lien, execution levy, attachment, or some other process or right by which he has acquired a specific interest in or claim upon the particular property. But since, as has been discussed, he may acquire this lien or right after recordation, and since, when acquired, the mortgage is void as to him, it makes little difference whether it be stated as the rule that the law requires immediate recordation, or whether it be said that, while it does not require immediate recordation, the mortgage is void as to creditors who have become such during the time recordation has been delayed. It is but a change in the form of words, while all of the legal effects are the same. The law may be said to contemplate or require immediate recordation because the rights of creditors arising before recordation are superior to those of the mortgagee, or it may be said that, while the law does not exact immediate recordation, it renders the mortgage void as to such creditors, unless it be so recorded. In both cases the results are identical, and over any precise form of expression there need be no haggling.

In this case the creditors had not obtained judgments against the mortgagor; nor, indeed, had they instituted any proceedings against him at the time he was adjudged an insolvent. After that judgment, by force of the insolvency act itself, they were prevented from resorting to any proceeding in law or equity for such purpose. They were limited to the presentation of claims in the insolvency court. This they did, and, when those claims were allowed and approved, the questions involved in them became res judicata. The presentation, allowance, and approval of the claim, while not in strictness a judgment, had much of the force and effect of a judgment, and was the only thing in the nature of a judgment which creditors so situated could obtain. For the purpose of enforcing their rights against fraudulent or void acts of the insolvent, it is the equivalent of a judgment. Roan v. Winn, 93 Mo. 503, 4 S. W. 736. We are not advised, nor do we understand it to be the rule in this state, that a judgment creditor must exhaust all other property before avoiding a sale, transfer, or mortgage by his debtor, which by the law is declared as to him void or a fraud upon his rights. But, if it should be said that it is necessary for the creditor to show that he cannot otherwise make good his debt, we think a sufficient showing to that end is made in this case by the undenied averment of the debtor's voluntary insolvency. Insolvency in the law has two distinct and well-defined significations. Anderson, in his Law Dictionary, defines an "insolvent" as "a person who is not pecuniarily able to pay his debts as they fall due; also a person whose property, if distributed among his creditors, would not be sufficient to pay their claims in full." Our insolvency act recognizes these distinct meanings. In proceedings for involuntary insolvency (Insolvent Act, § 8), aside from the acts of fraud therein enumerated, one may be cast into insolvency who is shown to be unable to meet his debts as they fall due; yet his assets may be ample for the full payment of his debts, though not immediately available for their prompt payment. But, where one voluntarily seeks the benefit of the act, he may not aver his inability to pay his debts as they fall due, but, by verified petition, must allege "his inability to pay all his debts in full," and the adjudication in insolvency is made pursuant to that allegation. In such a case, certainly, the adjudication of insolvency, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, is sufficient proof of the inadequacy of the property to pay the debts in full. Turner v. Adams, 46 Mo. 95; Case v. Beauregard, 101 U. S. 688.

2. We are come now to consider whether the assignee representing these creditors whose claims have been proved and allowed may institute on their behalf an equitable action to avoid the mortgage, an action which, but for the insolvency of the debtor, the creditors themselves unquestionably could have maintained after pressing their debts to judgment. The assignee's right so to do is combated upon two grounds, the first, because, while section 3440 of the Civil Code declares that a transfer or lien upon personal property may be avoided at the instance of the creditor, or of him upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust, no such expression is found in section 2957, which declares merely that a mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors, not expressly including either successors in interest or trustees; second, it is contended that, in any event, the assignee in insolvency can attack the acts of the insolvent on behalf of the creditors only for actual fraud, and that the act here contemplated is but a constructive legal fraud. It may here be suggested that this so-called "legal fraud" was, if anything, a fraud not of the mortgagor, who is to suffer nothing by it, but of the mortgagee, who may be compelled to lose his lien for his own remissness and neglect. Says Mr. Justice Cooley, in Putnam v. Reynolds, 44 Mich. 114, 6 N. W. 199: "Even creditors, it is said, cannot attack the mortgage except indirectly, through a seizure of the property by attachment or other scorable process. This is, doubtless, true where the invalidity of the mortgage arises from the fraud of the mortgagor; but whether the same rule will apply when the mortgage was originally valid, but is made void by the neglect of the mortgagee, may well be questioned. It would be easy to suggest weighty considerations arising in such cases, but not existing in the case of a fraudulent mortgage, and which it might well be thought should control." We do not regard the omission in section 2957 of the Civil Code to declare that those upon whom the estate of the debtor may devolve in trust have the right to avoid the mortgage as being at all important. It was early held under the English statutes of George the Fourth (1 Geo. IV. c. 119; 7 Geo. IV. c. 57), which conferred no right upon the assignee in insolvency to avoid conveyances of the assignor, and in cases where this fact was pressed upon the attention of the court, that the assignee had this right by virtue of the fact that he represented the creditors. Butcher v. Harrison, 4 Barn. & Adol. 129; Grimsby v. Ball, 11 Mees. & W. 531; Norcutt v. Dodd, 1 Craig & P. 100. In Holmes v. Penney, 3 Kay & J. 90, a bill was brought by the assignee in insolvency. Vice Chancellor Wood, discussing his right so to do, said: "I have no doubt of the right of the assignee in insolvency to sue in this case. In Grimsby v. Ball, Baron Parke and the present lord chancellor decided that an assignee in insolvency might properly represent all the creditors in proceedings to set aside an instrument which any of the creditors might have instituted." The failure to observe the well-defined distinction between the powers of the assignee in insolvency, who thus represents the creditors, and those of an assignee for the benefit of creditors, who is the representative of the assignor, has led to much conflict of authority upon this question. In this state it is held that an assignee for the benefit of creditors may not maintain such an action, but the distinction between such an assignee and the assignee in insolvency is clearly pointed out. Thus, in Francisco v. Aguirre, 94 Cal. 180, 29 Pac. 495, in discussing the conflict of authority which exists upon the question, it is said: "In other states the assignee for the benefit of creditors has been held to have such right, upon the ground that, by virtue of statutory provisions, the assignment partakes so far of the nature of a proceeding in bankruptcy that the assignee succeeds to the same rights as does an assignee in bankruptcy." Merrill v. Hurlburt, 63 Cal. 496, and Brown v. Bank, 77 Cal. 544, 20 Pac. 71, were both cases by the assignee in insolvency to set aside a sale of personal property for legal fraud. In both the action was upheld. It is determined, therefore, in this state, that the powers of the assignee in the premises are not limited to cases of fraud in fact.

But, independent of these reasons, there is still another consideration by which such an action as this upon the part of the assignee in insolvency is justified and upheld. By sections 18 and 21 of the insolvent act all of the estate of the insolvent passes to the assignee. As is said in Brown v. Bank, supra: "The assignee has the right to sue for and recover everything due to the estate for the benefit of the creditors." While, as between the assignor and his vendee or mortgagee, the transaction is valid, as between him and his creditors it is void, and the title still remains in him. This title passes to the assignee in insolvency for the benefit of the creditors, and justifies him in maintaining an action in their behalf to reduce the property to possession. "The statute provides for the assignment of property by insolvents, to the end that it may be appropriated to the payment of debts. It authorizes proceedings to subject the property of debtors to the payment of their debts. As between the creditors and the debtor who fraudulently conveys property to defeat them, he is regarded as holding the title to or an interest in the property conveyed, and it may for that reason be made subject to his debts. If he holds no such interest, the law will not permit the creditors to appropriate the property, for it would not suffer the property of another to be taken for his debts. It thus appears that the debtor did hold as to the creditors an interest in the property, and that it passed to the assignee. It is said that the assignee takes the derivative title from the debtor, and stands in his shoes. This is correct so far as persons other than creditors are concerned. As we have seen, as to creditors the assignee is regarded by law as holding an interest in and title to the land." Schallier v. Wright, 70 Iowa, 667, 28 N. W. 460; Jones v. Yates, 9 Barn. & C. 532; Pillsbury v. Kirgou, 33 N. J. Eq. 287. By reason of the title which is thus vested in him, we hold that the assignee may maintain this action.

It is said that the judgment should not be upheld because of the absence of a finding that the recordation was not seasonably made. It is averred, and not denied, that six months elapsed between the making and the recording of the mortgage. This unexplained delay would, as matter of law, and without a finding, be sufficient to show that the recordation was not seasonable. Or, taking it in the other view which has been presented, even if it be said that the law does not require immediate recordation, still the mortgage is void as to those who, during the time that the mortgage has been withheld from the records, have given credit to the mortgagor; and it is in favor of these that the mortgage has been set aside. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

APPRATE v. FAURE. (Sac. 291.)

HOMESTEAD—DECLARATION—STIPULATION.

1. Recitals in a declaration of homestead of the facts required by the statute to establish a right of homestead in lands are no evidence of the truth of such facts, which must be proved aliunde.

2. A stipulation "that there was a homestead filed" is insufficient to prove that a homestead was acquired.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Kings county.

Action by Marianna Apprate against Jean Faure. From judgment for defendant and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appealed. Reversed.

W. D. Foote, W. D. Crichton, H. L. Smith, and Rowen Irwin, for appellant. Archibald Yell, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to quiet title to a certain tract of land. The defendant, Faure, in his answer claims an interest therein. Judgment went for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying the motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken. Plaintiff should recover in the action unless defeated by reason of the claims of defendant founded upon a homestead. The defendant rested his case upon the introduction in evidence of a declaration of homestead duly filed for record, and containing all the recitals demanded by the statute, coupled with the additional evidence found in the stipulation of counsel to the effect "that there was a homestead filed on the premises in dispute by Mrs. Marguerite Belard for the benefit of herself and husband, and that the mortgage by F. Belard was executed and is a lien upon said premises." Based upon this stipulation and the declaration of homestead, the trial court made a finding of fact to the general effect that said premises constituted the homestead of Marguerite Belard and F. Belard. It is now insisted that this finding of fact has no support in the evidence, and this position of counsel is well taken. The recital of the facts stated by the homestead claimant in her declaration is no evidence of the truth of such recitals. The statements there made by Mrs. Belard are mere ex parte statements, not under oath, and it would be a violation of all of the rules of evidence to allow such statements to be received as evidence against third parties. The introduction in evidence of the declaration of homestead alone served the purpose of showing a compliance with the law which demands the filing for record of a declaration containing certain recitals. The truth of these recitals must be proven aliunde whenever the validity of the homestead is attacked. The rights of the homestead claimant are created by the filing of a declaration of homestead in the form specified by the statute, coupled with the actual present existence of the facts recited in the declaration. The existence of these facts at the time the declaration was filed was not attempted to be proved by defendant, and unless the stipulation, heretofore quoted, fills the breach in the evidence created by such failure of proof, the evidence is fatally weak. This stipulation is totally inadequate to meet the demands made upon it. The stipulation is to the effect that "a homestead was filed on the premises by Mrs. Marguerite Belard for the benefit of herself and husband." This language can only mean that a declaration of homestead was filed, for nothing else can be filed. Giving the stipulation a broad interpretation, it can only mean that a valid declaration of homestead was filed. A valid homestead and a valid declaration of homestead are widely different. We conclude the evidence fails to support the finding of fact as to the existence of a homestead upon the premises. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. STREUBER. (Cr. 416.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1898.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS—FAILURE OF ACCUSED TO TESTIFY.

1. A court is not, on any state of the facts, authorized to instruct the jury that a defendant's innocence conclusively appears.

2. It is not necessary or incumbent on a defendant to explain suspicious or incriminating circumstances, and no presumption can be indulged against him for failure to do so.

3. On a trial of accused for allowing and permitting his wife to remain in a house of prostitution, a refusal to charge that there must be a union of act and intent is harmless error in view of a charge given which defined the legal significance of the words "allow" and "permit."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Ludwig A. Streuber was convicted of a felony, and from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial he appealed. Reversed.

F. W. Fry, for appellant. Attorney General Fitzgerald, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant has been convicted of a felony, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. By the appeal he attacks the law given and refused by the trial court.

Complaint is first made because the court refused to instruct the jury to the effect that in a case otherwise doubtful upon the evidence, evidence of good character was conclusive of defendant's innocence. This instruction was properly refused, one reason justifying this refusal being that upon no conceivable state of facts is the court authorized to instruct a jury that the defendant's innocence conclusively appears. Other good reasons are plentiful to support the action of the court.

The court gave to the jury the following instruction: "It is not incumbent upon the defendant to prove his innocence, nor is it incumbent on him to explain suspicious circumstances unless they shall tend in some degree to establish his guilt." This instruction does not contain a satisfactory statement of the law. We believe it may be said that in no case, except in those cases where the burden of proof shifts to the defendant, is it necessary or even incumbent on the defendant to explain anything. He has the right to stand mute, and demand that the people make the case against him beyond a reasonable doubt. However strongly incriminating circumstances of his guilt may come from the mouths of witnesses when testifying upon the witness stand, it is a mere matter of choice upon his part, either to attempt an explanation of those circumstances or remain silent. No presumption against him is raised by the law if he does not make the attempt to explain, and remains silent. It is elementary law that the defendant is not required to take the witness stand, and that no presumption can be indulged in against him by reason of his failure to testify in the case.

The defendant was charged and convicted of a felony which consisted in allowing and permitting his wife to remain in a house of prostitution. It is now claimed that a substantial error was committed by the trial court in refusing to give an instruction to the effect that in every crime there must be a union of act and intent. This instruction could well have been given. But, in view of the fact that the court gave to the jury the signification of the words "permit" and "allow," as used in the statute, no substantial grounds of complaint are found in this contention. The information states an offense. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY—CONVEYANCES FOR PASSENGERS—OCCUPATION.

1. A provision of an accident insurance policy that the insurer shall not be liable for injuries or death caused while the insured is trying to "enter or leave a moving conveyance using steam as a motive power, [or is] in or on any such conveyance not provided for transportation of passengers," does not defeat recovery for death from an injury received while riding by invitation in a locomotive drawing a passenger train, the locomotive and train together constituting a "conveyance" for transportation of passengers.

2. A proviso of an accident insurance policy that the insurer shall not be liable "if the insured is injured in any occupation or exposure classed by this company as more hazardous than that here given" refers to classes of occupation, and not to particular acts not embraced in the occupation given, and hence does not defeat recovery for the accidental death of one insured as a mining expert while casually riding on a locomotive.

3. Under a clause of an accident insurance policy providing for payment of double the specified benefit should the insured be injured or killed "while riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using steam * * * as a motive power," the beneficiary may recover for the death of insured, who, on invitation of the railroad superintendent, left a railway passenger coach in which he was a passenger, and rode on the engine, and, while so riding, was injured, and died; since he did not thereby lose the character of a passenger.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Mary I. Berliner against the Travelers' Insurance Company. From a judgment entered on a nonsuit, plaintiff appealed. Reversed.

Daniel Titus, for appellant. Olney & Olney, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action upon a policy insuring George Berliner, the husband of plaintiff, against death caused by accident. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, defendant moved for a nonsuit. The motion was granted, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the plaintiff appeals.

Said policy insured said Berliner against loss of time resulting from bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means, and classifies the injuries and the compensation for loss of time. It then provides: "(e) Or if death results from such injuries alone within ninety days, will pay ten thousand dollars to Mary I. Berliner, his wife, if surviving; in event of her prior death, to the legal representatives or assigns of insured. (f) If such injuries are sustained while riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using steam, cable, or electricity as a motive power, the amount to be paid shall be double the sum above specified; provided, if insured is injured in any occupation or exposure classed by this company as more hazardous than that here given [that of mining expert], his insurance shall be only for such sums as the premium paid by him will purchase at the rates fixed for such increased hazard." The policy then proceeds to qualify its liability by specifying what is not covered by it, as follows: "This insurance does not cover disappearance * * * nor accident nor death * * * resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from any of the following causes, or while so engaged or affected: Disease or bodily infirmity; * * * violating law; voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger; * * * entering or trying to enter or leave a moving conveyance using steam as a motive power (except cable and electric street cars), being in or on any such conveyance not provided for transportation of passengers, or on a railway bridge or roadbed (railway employes excepted)." The insured received injuries in a railway accident in Mexico, from which he died four days afterwards. The only evidence as to the circumstances connected with the accident was the testimony of S. W. Ferguson, who accompanied Mr. Berliner to Mexico, and was traveling with him at the time of the accident. The witness and Mr. Berliner were invited by the superintendent of the railroad to go from the City of Mexico to Pueblo, and return. Mr. Cokefield, superintendent of motive power on that road, an old acquaintance of Mr. Berliner, was with the party. On the return trip the train consisted of a locomotive, a baggage car, and three or four passenger cars, and the superintendent's car, which was at the rear end of the train. While at a station, Mr. Cokefield invited Mr. Berliner to go with him to the engine, that he might better see the country, and they started towards the engine, and the witness returned to the superintendent's car. In going down the grade, the train acquired a great velocity, and, leaving the track, was wrecked. The engineer, fireman, and conductor were killed, and, he thought, about a half dozen of the passengers. He found Mr. Berliner in the wreck of the engine, near the fire box, and burned by escaping steam, and believed Berliner was on the engine at the time of the accident. On cross-examination he testified that he advised Mr. Berliner not to go on the engine, that he would get his clothes dirty, that he could see as well from the car, and that he thought it was not a safe place, but that he might or might not have used the word "safe," that the conversation was jocular, but he desired to detain him. The foregoing is the substance of the testimony relating to the accident.

The ground of the motion for a nonsuit was "that the contract itself did not provide for the death of a party by an accident while riding upon a locomotive, but only in a conveyance intended for passengers." Assuming that Mr. Berliner was upon the engine at the time of the accident,—and we think the court might properly find that he was,—defendant's contention is that Mr. Berliner was at the time of the accident on "a conveyance not provided for the transportation of passengers," and that, therefore, the defendant is not liable, while appellant contends that the train on which the insured was riding was a regular passenger train composed of a locomotive and cars, and formed a conveyance for the transportation of passengers, and that the policy did not exclude him from any part of it. It is well settled that policies of insurance should be liberally construed in favor of the insured; that, where its terms permit of more than one construction, that will be adopted which supports its validity. In Insurance Co. v. Osborne, 90 Ala. 201, 207, 9 South. 869, 870, it was said: "Exceptions of this kind are construed most strongly against the insurer, and liberally in favor of the insured. This is now the settled rule for construing all kinds of insurance policies, rendered necessary, especially in modern times, to circumvent the ingenuity of insurance companies in so framing contracts of this kind as to make the exceptions unfairly devour the whole policy." In Insurance Co. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527, 7 Sup. Ct. 685, it was held that "a policy of insurance against 'bodily injuries, effected through external, accidental, and violent means,' and occasioning death or complete disability to do business, and providing that 'this insurance shall not extend to death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease, or by suicide, or self-inflicted injuries,' covers a death by hanging one's self while insane." It was there said that "the insane suicide no more dies by his own hand than the suicide by mistake or accident," and that the words "bodily infirmities or disease" do not include insanity, and that it is "the fundamental rule of interpretation that policies of insurance are to be construed most strongly against the insurers who frame them." To this we may add that the general rule is that exceptions and conditions are to be construed strictly against the party in whose favor they are made. In a New York case it was said: "It has become a rule of law that if it be left in doubt whether words of the contract were used in an enlarged or restricted sense, other things being equal, the construction will be adopted which is most beneficial to the promisee." Darrow v. Society, 116 N. Y. 537, 22 N. E. 1093. In Healey v. Association, 133 Ill. 556, 25 N. E. 52, it was held that a death caused by accidentally taking and drinking poison is a death produced by bodily injuries received through external, violent, and accidental means. Many other cases might be cited illustrating and applying the rule of construction above stated, but the rule is so well settled that we deem it unnecessary.

The policy here in question, though of a preferred class, was not special, covering only accidents to the insured while engaged in a designated employment, pursuit, occupation, or situation, but covered any possible accident which might happen to any one under any or all circumstances, provided it did not fall within an exception expressed in the policy. The term "conveyance" applies as well to the means of transporting freight as of passengers, and in the clause exempting the insurance company from liability for accidents occurring in "entering or trying to enter or leave a moving conveyance using steam as a motive power" is so applied; while the clause here under consideration distinguishes a "conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers" from those used for the transportation of freight. Neither clause specifies railroad trains, and each includes as clearly vessels propelled by steam. If the insured had met with an accident upon a passenger steamer instead of a railroad train, upon what part of the vessel must he have been at the time of the accident to be within the protection of his policy? Must he be seated in the cabin, or occupy a state room? The policy does not say so. It restricts him to no part of the vessel, and therefore, if the insurance company sought to escape liability by showing that at the time of the accident he was not in the cabin or a state room, it must import into the contract a qualification or provision which is not expressed or even implied. That the locomotive is part of the "conveyance" provided for the transportation of passengers upon a railroad is not disputed. If the deceased had been killed in trying to enter or leave the engine of a freight train, the defendant here would hardly concede its liability upon the ground that it was no part of "a moving conveyance," and therefore not within the clause exempting it from liability. Upon the theory that the engine is not part of the conveyance, it would follow that, if A. were killed in attempting to get on a car of a moving passenger train, the insurance company would not be liable, while, if B. were killed in attempting to get upon the engine of the same train at the same moment, the insurer would be liable. If it had been intended to restrict the insured to any particular part of the conveyance, apt words to express such intention could have been readily found and used; as, for example, in Hull v. Association, 41 Minn. 232, 42 N. W. 936, the policy contained the following provision: "Standing, being, or riding upon the platform of moving railway coaches (other than street cars), or riding in any other place not provided for the transportation of passengers, * * * are hazards not contemplated or covered by this certificate." The same provision is found in the policy considered in Anthony v. Association, 162 Mass. 354, 38 N. E. 973; and a similar provision is found in a policy issued by still another company. See Sawtelle v. Assurance Co., 15 Blatchf. 216, Fed. Cas. No. 12,392. That "a conveyance using steam as a motive power" includes railroad trains cannot be controverted. If, then, we insert "railroad trains" for or instead of "conveyance," the meaning becomes clear. Thus: "Entering or trying to enter or leave a moving railroad train (except cable and electric street cars), being in or on any such moving railroad train not provided for transportation of passengers, or on a railroad bridge or road-bed (railway employes excepted)." Thus paraphrased, the only distinction made is in the character of the trains, and not as to different parts of a train. In the first clause in regard to entering or leaving trains, all trains are included; while, under the second clause, passenger trains are distinguished from freight, repair, wrecking, and other trains "not provided for the transportation of passengers." These exceptions, therefore, literally interpreted, have no application or reference to passengers or passenger trains except as to entering or trying to enter or leave, any train, whatever its character, while in motion; and therefore some term or condition not expressed in the policy must be imported into it to work a forfeiture and relieve the defendant from liability, and that is not permissible.

It follows from this conclusion that plaintiff's right to recover under clause (e) or (f) of the policy is clear, unless such right is barred by No. 1 of the provisos. That proviso is as follows: "If insured is injured in any occupation or exposure classed by this company as more hazardous than that here given, his insurance shall be only for such sums as the premiums paid by him will purchase at the rates fixed for such increased hazard." In Stone's Adm'r's v. Casualty Co., 34 N. J. Law, 375, a similar provision in an accident policy was considered. It was there said: "The injuries excluded from the compensation of the policy are described as those that are 'received in any employment, or by any exposure either more hazardous in itself, or classified by the company as more hazardous.' These terms, literally rendered, require that the assured, to come within their effect, must, at the time of the injury, be in an employment more dangerous than his own. The language has reference to employments, and not to individual acts. It is true that a certain degree of ambiguity is introduced by the expression 'other exposure'; but, looking at the body of the policy, we find these terms used in the sense of the risks arising from a business or occupation. By adhering to the literal signification of the terms employed, these indorsements prefixed to the several classes of employments lose all force as independent stipulations, and serve the simple purpose of graduating such employments for the service of that provision of the policy which prohibits the assured from passing, at his own option, from one business to another. Understood in this view, they are properly a part of the classifications; but, if they are to be received as containing new terms of the contract, they are entirely out of place. If the company intended to say to the assured that if he did any act which did not strictly belong to his own occupation, but was embraced more properly in some other business, and if thereby any harm to him accidentally resulted, that in such event he could claim nothing under his policy, it was easy for them to do so in plain language. * * * A qualification so restrictive of the rights of the assured ought not to be admitted unless the terms of the indorsement will bear no other rational interpretation." In that case the occupation of the insured was stated to be that of a teacher. While unemployed, he was superintending the erection of a building for himself, and fell from the building by the breaking of a joist, and was killed, and the judgment against the company was affirmed. In the case at bar the policy did not provide that it covered only those accidents which might occur to the insured while actually engaged in the direct duties of a mining expert, but covered all accidents not excluded by the terms of the policy, the occupation being inserted only to show that it was within a specified class of risks. See, upon this point, and supporting the case last above cited, Insurance Co. v. Fennell, 49 Ill. 180, and Insurance Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. St. 43.

Under the evidence contained in the record, I think it perfectly clear that the plaintiff was at least entitled to judgment for $10,000 under clause (e) of the policy, and the only remaining question is whether she was entitled to judgment for $20,000 under clause (f), which provides: "If such injuries are sustained while riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using steam, cable, or electricity as a motive power, the amount shall be double the amount above specified." If Mr. Berliner had been riding on the train in any other capacity than that of a passenger,—that is, as an employe of the railroad company, or an express or mail agent, or a tramp stealing a ride upon a brakebeam,—the defendant would not be liable under clause (f). But he occupied no such relation to the railroad company or the train. Though upon the engine, he was a passenger. That he did not lose his character as a passenger by going upon the engine at the request of an officer of the road, see Railroad Co. v. Brown, 123 Ill. 186, 14 N. E. 197; McGee v. Railway Co., 92 Mo. 216, 4 S. W. 789; and Railroad Co. v. Erwin, 3 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 465. These were cases that involved the liability of the railroad company for injury to its passengers while rightfully upon the engine, and were not cases of accident insurance; but the word "passenger," as here used, is evidently intended to designate the character or relation the insured sustained to the proprietor of the conveyance, and are therefore in point. That the defendant cannot import into this clause of the policy conditions as to the part of the conveyance in which the insured must be, and thus, by construction, work a forfeiture, need not be further discussed. All that is required is that the insured shall be "riding as a passenger" in any passenger conveyance using steam, cable, or electricity as a motive power. That portion of the judgment from which the present appeal is taken should be reversed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, that portion of the judgment from which the present appeal is taken is reversed.

BERLINER v. TRAVELERS' INS. CO. (S. F. 1,146.)<sup>1</sup>

(Supreme Court of California. July 18, 1898.)

INSURANCE — PREMIUMS — WAIVER — PLEADING — ANSWER — EVIDENCE — CONCLUSIONS — WITNESSES — CREDIBILITY — OBJECTIONS — INSTRUCTIONS — PROVINCE OF JURY — HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where plaintiff makes out a prima facie case, the question whether defendant's testimony overcomes it is for the jury.

2. A policy and the application therefor required payment of the first premium while assured was in good health. It was delivered without payment of the premium, insured informing insurer's agent at the time that he was unable to pay. No demand for the premium was ever made, and, a month and a half after issuance, insured informed the agent that he intended traveling in a foreign country, and asked if the policy would be vitiated thereby. The agent said, "No." Held, that the condition as to payment of the premium had been waived.

3. Where relevant, though incompetent, testimony is objected to as being irrelevant alone, it is not error to receive it.

4. Declarations by insured as to his opinion that the premium had been paid are incompetent to prove a waiver of payment of the premium.

5. The repetition of erroneous testimony already in the case is not reversible error.

6. Under a complaint alleging payment of insurance premiums and compliance with the conditions of the policy, a waiver of the premiums may be proved.

7. An answer which denies a waiver of a condition in an insurance policy declared on treats the complaint as if it pleaded a waiver.

8. Where a complaint sets out the policy, it is not necessary to set out the application, that containing no conditions precedent not in the policy.

9. On an issue as to waiver of an insurance premium, testimony that insurer's agent had excused insured from paying it is a conclusion, and inadmissible.

10. It is error to charge that there is only one circumstance tending to prove a certain fact, when such fact may be inferred from several circumstances in the case.

11. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, prohibiting a party from impeaching the credibility of his own witness, but permitting him to contradict his evidence, one does not vouch for the truthfulness of a witness produced by him.

12. An instruction that there is no evidence impeaching a certain witness is erroneous.

13. The question as to what weight is to be given to particular evidence is for the jury.

14. It is not error to refuse to repeat an instruction already given.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county.

Action by Mary I. Berliner against the Travelers' Insurance Company to recover on two policies. Plaintiff was nonsuited on one policy, and had a verdict and judgment on the other, and both parties appealed. Heard on defendant's appeal from the judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Daniel Titus, for appellant. Olney & Olney, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant to recover upon two policies of insurance, the first cause of action being upon an accident policy, and the second upon a life policy, each issued to George Berliner, and each policy being payable to the plaintiff (then the wife, now the widow, of the insured) in case of his death. Upon the trial the plaintiff was nonsuited upon the first cause of action, and had a verdict and judgment upon the second cause of action based upon the life policy. The plaintiff appealed from the judgment of nonsuit upon the first cause of action (S. F. 1048, 53 Pac. 918); and the defendant takes this appeal from the judgment against it on the life policy, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. These appeals are separate, and are separately considered.

The defendant is a corporation having its principal or home office at Hartford, Conn. W. W. Haskell is and was its general agent at San Francisco. Mr. Berliner made his application for insurance to Mr. Haskell, who forwarded it to the home office, and the policy was there made and sent to Mr. Haskell. It bore date at Hartford, June 25, 1895, and was received by Mr. Haskell, July 1st. Among other things, the policy contained this provision: "This policy shall not take effect unless the first premium is paid while the insured is in good health;" and the application for the policy, signed by Berliner, contained the following: "That the policy applied for shall not take effect unless the advance premium is paid while I am in good health." Mr. Berliner and Mr. Haskell had adjacent offices in the Mills Building, and were personal friends. Berliner was a mining expert, and the general manager of the International Gold Syndicate, in which Mr. Haskell was a stockholder. About August 20, 1895, Mr. Berliner and S. W. Ferguson left San Francisco, and went to Mexico, where Mr. Berliner died, on September 17, 1895, from injuries received in a railroad accident. The defense to the action is that the premium on said policy was never paid, that its payment was not waived, that the policy was never delivered, and for these reasons never took effect as a contract between the parties; and it is contended that the verdict of the jury, which necessarily includes a finding that the policy was a valid and subsisting contract of insurance at the time of Mr. Berliner's death, is not justified by the evidence.

That the general agent of defendant could

waive the payment, deliver the policy, and thereby make it a valid and subsisting contract of insurance, notwithstanding the provision that it should "not take effect unless the first premium is paid while the insured is in good health," is well settled, and is not disputed. Griffith v. Insurance Co., 101 Cal. 627, 36 Pac. 113; Farnum v. Insurance Co., 83 Cal. 246, 23 Pac. 869. Nor is it questioned that possession of the policy by the insured or by the beneficiary is prima facie evidence of its delivery as such valid and subsisting contract. The policy was produced by the plaintiff, and put in evidence; and there being no controversy as to the death of the insured, or as to the identity of the plaintiff as the beneficiary named in the policy, a prima facie case was made, and the defendant's motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. At this stage of the case, if the defendant had refused to introduce any evidence, a verdict for the plaintiff could have been properly directed, and, if so, it cannot be said that the verdict afterwards rendered is without evidence to support it. The burden of overcoming the prima facie case made by the plaintiff rested upon the defendant, and whether defendant's evidence, afterwards introduced, did or did not overcome plaintiff's prima facie case, was for the jury to determine. A prima facie case may, of course, be overcome by evidence of so clear and convincing a character as to require the trial court, in the proper exercise of its discretion, to set the verdict aside, and grant a new trial. A new trial was denied by the court below in this case, and we think the court did not err, so far, at least, as that ground of the motion is concerned. It is true, Mr. Haskell testified that the premium was not paid; that no arrangement had been made for credit; that payment had not been waived; and that the delivery of the policy was for the purpose of examination, and not as an absolute or unconditional delivery. The policy, however, was received by Mr. Haskell about July 1st, and the plaintiff testified that she received it about eight or nine days after that date. The policy was not reported to the home office until after Mr. Berliner's death, either as a paid or unpaid policy. Mr. Berliner and Mr. Ferguson left San Francisco for Mexico about August 20th, and a day or two before their departure both inquired of Mr. Haskell whether traveling in Mexico would make their policies void, and were told that it would not. Upon this point Mr. Haskell testified explicitly: "Q. In that conversation, did Mr. Berliner ask you concerning this policy, if he traveled in a foreign country, it would void it? A. I remember of his talking with me about traveling in Mexico, and I told him if he resided in Mexico he would have to have a permit from any life company, as well as mine; but, to travel through there, the life policy would cover there as well as any place." This inquiry of Mr. Berliner plainly implied an understanding or belief on his part that the policy was delivered to him, and was in force, and that his doubt only related to the effect that traveling in Mexico might have upon it, and must have been so understood by Mr. Haskell. It is therefore incredible, if the premium had not been paid, or credit given by some understanding or agreement, express or implied, that instead of informing him that his policy was not in force, and that he was laboring under a misapprehension, he permitted him to go upon his journey with the assurance of its validity. There can be no mistake or failure of memory on the part of Mr. Haskell as to this conversation, as it is testified to by Mr. Ferguson and Dr. Bird, who were both present. Without laying too much stress upon the corroborating circumstances that Mr. Haskell and Mr. Berliner were intimate and confidential friends, that from as early as July 10th until after Mr. Berliner's death, more than two months thereafter, no inquiry was made about the policy by Mr. Haskell, or any request for its return, the evidence is ample to sustain the verdict, notwithstanding the testimony of Mr. Haskell that the delivery of the policy was only for the purpose of examination, and that the premium was not paid nor its payment waived. The waiver of payment was a purely personal matter with Mr. Haskell. When policies were prepared at the home office, the first premiums were charged to Mr. Haskell, and these charges could only be canceled by payment or by the return of the policy. The premium on this policy was payable quarterly (amounting to $47.48); and Mr. Haskell was informed by Mr. Berliner, at the time the policy was handed to him, that he could not pay for it then, and Mr. Haskell testified that he knew he could not; and there was no evidence that payment was afterwards requested. These facts, taken in connection with Mr. Berliner's inquiry as to the effect his traveling in Mexico might have upon the policy, and Mr. Haskell's reply thereto, constitute evidence of a waiver of payment that could not be well made more conclusive save by an express admission of the fact.

It is also contended that the court erred in the admission of certain testimony, and in its subsequent refusal to strike it out. Mr. Haskell, having been called by the defendant, was asked by the plaintiff upon cross-examination what conversation he had with Mr. Ferguson on the occasion of his application to him, after his return from Mexico, to get the policy in question; but Mr. Haskell did not seem to remember more than that he asked Mr. Ferguson if he had access to Mr. Berliner's safe, and expressed his desire to get the policy. Mr. Ferguson was afterwards called in rebuttal, and, being asked to state what conversation he had with Mr. Haskell on the occasion referred to, testified that Mr. Haskell said he "would like to get that life policy because he did not pay the premium on it"; that he replied, "Mr. Haskell, whatever papers Mr. Berliner left will be turned over to Mrs. Berliner, and you will have to consult her about it, because I could not think of delivering any papers; and, besides, it is a great surprise to me that the premium is not paid, because the plaintiff thought it was, and so expressed himself in his dying conversation." The witness was then asked: "Did you repeat to Mr. Haskell the conversation you had with Mr. Berliner? A. I think I told him, substantially, that Mr. Berliner thought the policy was in force, and so told me. I told him that Mr. Berliner died thinking the policy was in force. Q. What did you communicate to Mr. Haskell as coming from Mr. Berliner?" Counsel for defendant objected to the question as "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and also objected to the testimony of the witness relating to his conversation with Mr. Haskell being received in evidence, because it was intended for the purpose of impeaching Mr. Haskell's statement, and therefore cannot be admitted, for the reason that Mr. Haskell was examined—First by the plaintiff as her own witness; and, second, because the statement he made was on cross-examination, and was in regard to collateral matters, and his testimony is binding and conclusive; and also that Mr. Haskell's attention was not called to any such conversation, and he was not asked about it when he was upon the stand." There was no ruling upon this objection, and the question was not answered. The plaintiff then withdrew Mr. Ferguson, and recalled Mr. Haskell for plaintiff in rebuttal, and, having answered that he heard the statement of Mr. Ferguson, he was asked: "Did Mr. Ferguson state to you in that conversation what Mr. Berliner had said to him, when he was dying in Mexico, about this life policy? Thereupon counsel for the defendant objected to the question, on the ground that it was irrelevant; that it relates to matters having no bearing upon the question whether or not this policy has been paid for." The objection was overruled, and the defendant excepted. The witness then testified: "I think he made the statement as he made it on the stand here," and repeated substantially the language of Mr. Ferguson. "Q. That is what Mr. Ferguson said to you? A. Yes, sir. Q. As a statement made to him by Mr. Berliner? A. Yes, sir; I remember that is what he said to me." "Thereupon the counsel for the defendant moved to have the foregoing questions and answers stricken out as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent." The motion was denied, and defendant excepted.

Only the two rulings made by the court need be considered, the first question to which objection was made not having been ruled upon or answered. The first question objected to upon which a ruling was made did not call for a statement of what Mr. Berliner said to Mr. Ferguson in Mexico about the policy. It was: "Did Mr. Ferguson state to you in that conversation what Mr. Berliner had said to him, when he was dying in Mexico, about this life policy?" This question was preliminary, should have been answered "Yes" or "No," and did not call for the conversation. But, assuming that it called for the statements made by Mr. Berliner, it was not irrelevant, though it was incompetent. A mere waiver of payment operates as an estoppel,—that is, that the defendant by its agent so acted as to induce Mr. Berliner to believe that the policy was valid and in force, and hence it was relevant to the issue to show that he so believed; but his statement of his belief made to a third party was hearsay, and not competent to prove the relevant fact of his belief. The circumstance of Mr. Berliner going to Mr. Haskell, and inquiring whether his going to Mexico would vitiate his policy, and Mr. Haskell's reply that it would not, was competent and sufficient for that purpose. The court therefore correctly ruled upon that question. The motion to strike out the "foregoing questions and answers" can only be construed to extend to the examination of Mr. Haskell, as that covered all that had been received against defendant's objection. Whether this motion should have been granted, in view of the prior objection and ruling, need not be considered, as all the facts here sought to be stricken out were, in substance, received without objection, and were not embraced in the motion to strike out. Under these circumstances, the defendant was not prejudiced by the rulings complained of. The mere repetition of improper testimony already before the jury is not a sufficient ground for reversal.

It is also contended that evidence of a waiver of payment was not admissible under the complaint; that payment of the premium is alleged; and that, if the policy was delivered without payment, the facts showing that defendant was estopped from relying upon the failure to pay should have been alleged. It is true that payment is alleged, but it is also alleged that the insured performed all the conditions on his part, and defendant accepted performance thereof, and delivered the policy. This was certainly sufficient as a pleading, and, the policy having been delivered, it is immaterial, so far as plaintiff's right to recover is concerned, whether the premium was paid or a credit given, the delivery of the policy as an executed contract being all that it was essential to allege or prove. In Richards v. Insurance Co., 89 Cal. 170, 26 Pac. 762, it was objected that the complaint did not aver notice and proofs of death as required by the policy; but this court held that the averment that "plaintiffs have duly complied with all the terms and conditions of said policy and renewal by them, or either of them, to be kept or performed," was a sufficient pleading of conditions precedent. And in May on Insurance (section 589) it is said: "The weight of authority seems to be that, under an allegation of the performance of a condition, proof of a waiver is admissible without alleging the waiver." Besides, the answer denied a waiver, and therefore treated it as though alleged.

The defendant objected to the sufficiency of the complaint, upon the ground that it set out the policy, but did not set out the application upon which it was issued, and also objected to the admission in evidence of the policy and application upon the same ground. As the application contained no condition precedent which it was necessary for the plaintiff to aver or prove, except that in relation to the payment of the premium, which condition was also stated in the policy which was set out in full, and proper allegations made thereon and denied in the answer, defendant's objections were properly overruled. This conclusion is not inconsistent with the case of Gilmore v. Insurance Co., 55 Cal. 123, cited by appellant. In that case the application contained promises as to future acts and conduct of the insured, and the only authority cited was Bobbitt v. Insurance Co., 66 N. C. 70, where the application contained a promise as to future acts. Such promises constitute an agreement on the part of the assured to be performed in the future, and are conditions precedent, the performance of which must be alleged by the plaintiff, either specifically or by the general allegation that he has performed all the conditions on his part. But this question we regard as settled by the case of Cowan v. Insurance Co., 78 Cal. 181, 20 Pac. 408, where the court, speaking of warranties in præsentia,—that is, of past or existing facts,—said (at page 185, 78 Cal., and page 410, 20 Pac.): "Where there is nothing in the representation or statement to be performed by the plaintiff, there is no necessity of setting forth such representation or statement. Whereas, in the case of a promissory warranty, the assured has warranted that he will do something during the existence of the risk, the requisition of averment of such stipulation and of its performance is required." See, also, Herron v. Insurance Co., 28 Ill. 238.

The question put to Mr. Haskell by defendant, "Did you ever, in any way, excuse Mr. Berliner from making payment of the first premium upon the life policy?" clearly called for the conclusion of the witness, and was properly excluded.

The remaining questions relate to instructions to the jury, given and refused.

The instruction to find a verdict in favor of defendant, as requested, was properly refused, as we have determined that the evidence supports the verdict for the plaintiff.

The defendant also requested an instruction that "there is no evidence that the first premium was paid, except the fact that the plaintiff is in possession of the policy." This would have taken from the jury the consideration of the relations of the parties, the circumstances connected with the transaction, including the conversation as to the effect upon the validity of the policy Mr. Berliner's visit to Mexico might have, and, if given, would have been error.

Defendant also asked to have the jury instructed as follows: "It is your duty to decide this case upon the evidence produced. The plaintiff has introduced Mr. Haskell as her witness. By so doing, she vouches for his truthfulness as a witness." This instruction was properly refused. Section 2049, Code Civ. Proc., states the rule thus: "The party producing a witness is not allowed to impeach his credit by evidence of bad character, but he may contradict him by other evidence, and may also show that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony, as provided in section 2052." This rule was not violated upon the trial, while the instruction requested would necessarily have influenced the jury in determining the credibility of the witness by establishing a test that is inconsistent with that prescribed by the Code.

Defendant's proposed instruction "that there has been no testimony in any way impeaching or discrediting Mr. Haskell" was a request for an instruction upon a question of fact, and as to the credibility of a witness, and was properly refused.

The modification of the requested instruction beginning at folio 225 was proper. The part stricken out was an instruction upon the weight which should be given to certain evidence, and also contained an express instruction that it had "been proven that the premium was not paid," notwithstanding there was at least prima facie evidence that it had been paid.

The court properly refused to instruct the jury as requested at folios 229 and 230, to the effect that the only evidence which the jury were entitled to take into consideration was the fact that the policy was found among the papers of the deceased, and that the evidence was clear and positive that the premium was not paid. That such instruction would have been erroneous does not require argument. The further words, "Upon that proposition [the payment of the premium] the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff," stated a correct proposition of law, and had been given to the jury. It was not error to refuse to repeat it.

The objections made by defendant to the fourth and sixth instructions given at the request of the plaintiff cannot be sustained. These instructions related to the waiver of payment of the premium, and the objection is not that they do not state the law correctly, but that the evidence did not justify the court in giving them. This point is fully covered by what has been said touching the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and need not be further noticed. We find no error which would justify a reversal of the judgment and order appealed from, and advise that they be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

RUSSELL v. AGAR. (S. F. 991.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 7, 1898.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—INDEFINITE AGREEMENT.

Under Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6, providing that no agreement may be enforced, the terms of which are not sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable, an agreement to continue in testator's employ in consideration of his promise to make good to the employé, by testamentary provision, such amount as the employé would lose by declining an offer of a partner's interest in a competing firm, is not specifically enforceable against testator's executors.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Coleridge Russell against one Agar, executor. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

E. L. Campbell and J. S. Spillman, for appellant. Freeman & Bates, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought his action against defendant, Agar, as executor of the estate of Joseph McDonough, deceased, and for cause of action averred the following facts: For several years prior to the 14th day of September, 1894, he had been in the employ of Joseph McDonough in the capacity of salesman and collector. McDonough's business was that of a wholesale and retail dealer in coal in the city and county of San Francisco. By reason of his experience, extended acquaintance, and personal influence, plaintiff had created and controlled a large amount of McDonough's business. A short time prior to the 14th day of September, 1894, plaintiff was offered a fifth interest as partner in the business, good will, property, and profits to accrue in a firm engaged in the business of dealing in coal in said city and county. Plaintiff was not required by the firm to contribute any money or other property to the partnership, but was offered the one-fifth partnership interest in consideration of his devoting his time and attention to the business, and of giving to the firm the advantage of his experience, extended acquaintance, and control over a large amount of coal trade in the city. Plaintiff believed that it would be to his interest to accept the offer, and explained it and its circumstances to his employer, McDonough, to prevent plaintiff's acceptance of the proposition, on the 14th day of September, 1894, entered into a contract with him as follows: "Plaintiff promised and agreed to and with said Joseph McDonough that he, said plaintiff, would reject the offer of the aforesaid firm, and would remain with and well and truly and faithfully serve the said Joseph McDonough in his said business as wholesale and retail dealer in coal for such length of time as he, said Joseph McDonough, should continue to carry on said business, in consideration whereof the said Joseph McDonough promised and agreed to and with plaintiff that he, the said Joseph McDonough, would by his last will and testament leave and bequeath unto plaintiff such a sum of money as would make good to plaintiff any and all loss he might at the time of said Joseph McDonough's discontinuance in said business have sustained by reason of rejecting the offer of said firm, and remaining with and serving said Joseph McDonough; said bequest by last will to be in addition to, and independent of, the salary to be paid to plaintiff for his services." Plaintiff further averred the fulfillment upon his part of all the terms and conditions of his contract, the discontinuance of McDonough in business by reason of his death, and his failure to make any bequest to plaintiff in his will. He further averred "that the said firm hereinbefore referred to established a successful business, and that the value of the assets, good will, and business of the firm was, at the time of the death of said Joseph McDonough and his discontinuance of said business, of great value, to wit, of the value of $60,000." It is next averred that the loss sustained by plaintiff is the sum of $12,000. The prayer of the complaint is for a decree compelling the executor of the estate of Joseph McDonough specifically to perform his testator's contract. The demurrer was both general and special. It was sustained, and from the judgment entered in defendant's favor plaintiff appealed.

Many propositions are urged in argument against this complaint,—propositions presented under special demurrers for uncertainty and ambiguity. A point of some importance is made upon a variance between the contract set forth in the claim presented to the executor and the contract pleaded in the complaint. Upon none of these questions do we deem it important to touch, for the reason that the contract is not one for a breach of which a recovery may be had at law, nor one which may be enforced in equity, as is here sought to be done, and therefore the general demurrer was properly sustained. There is no question but that a man may make a valid agreement binding himself to dispose of his property by last will and testament in a particular way, and a court of equity will, under certain circumstances, enforce such an agreement. That question has recently been considered at some length by this court, and it is not necessary to do more than refer to the case of Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, 45 Pac. 710. No agreement may be enforced, the terms of which are not sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable. Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6. Before any such contract as this will be entertained by a court of equity, its terms must not only be fair, but free from doubt. Here it may not be determined what the liability of McDonough was; assuming, as of course we do, the truth of all issuable matters which are well pleaded. If plaintiff had represented to McDonough that he intended to commence business for himself, and McDonough had answered, "You remain with me, and I will make good to you whatever you may lose by not leaving me," no one would doubt that McDonough's offer was one which could not be measured or enforced. It could not be told whether the prospective business would or would not prove successful. The actual case here presented is not essentially different. McDonough was to make good all loss which plaintiff might sustain by not entering the firm. How can that be measured, determined, or ascertained? Partnership dissensions might have arisen the next day, and a dissolution might have followed. Plaintiff, as a partner, might have increased the volume and value of the business enormously, or by some unfortunate venture he might have wrecked it. The fact that the partners succeeded in establishing a successful business does not lead to any logical conclusion that the same result would have followed had another member been admitted to the firm. Appellant relies upon the case of Bayliss v. Prieture's Estate, 24 Wis. 651, but the differences between that and the case at bar are too radical to make it of assistance to him. There plaintiff sued for the reasonable value of his services under an agreement with his employer by which he was to be compensated in part by a testamentary bequest. The court took evidence, fixed the value of the services, and rendered judgment for the difference between what they were worth and what plaintiff had received. In this no doubt or uncertainty existed. But here plaintiff is not suing for the value of his services, but to enforce a contract whereby he was to be paid some undetermined and undeterminable sum of money. The same reasons of uncertainty and doubt which prevent equitable relief forbid the recovery of damages at law. Since plaintiff can never show how much he lost, or that he lost anything, he never can show that he has been damaged. The case is more like that of Graham v. Graham's Ex'rs, 34 Pa. St. 475, where the parol agreement was to give to plaintiff, for services to be rendered, "as much as to any relative on earth." The court asks: "How much did decedent promise to give? The amount is uncertain, and, from the nature of the arrangement, is incapable of being rendered certain." The judgment is affirmed.

BARBOUR v. FLICK. (L. A. 580.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1898.)

APPEAL—BRIEFS—TIME FOR FILING.

Where, by stipulation, cross appeals were to be heard on the same transcript, which was prepared and filed by defendant, who also filed his opening brief in 30 days, and plaintiff filed no brief within that time, thinking that the stipulation provided that he could print his opening brief on his cross appeal under the same cover with his answer to defendant's opening brief, which he did, and no delay or inconvenience was occasioned, the rule dismissing the appeal for failure to file a printed brief within 30 days will not be enforced.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by one Barbour against one Flick. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from a part of which he appeals, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss plaintiff's cross appeal. Denied.

Patterson Sprig and McDonald & McDonald, for Barbour. Puterbaugh & Puterbaugh, for Flick.

PER CURIAM. There are cross appeals in this case,—by the plaintiff from a part of the judgment, and by the defendant from an order denying his motion for a new trial. By stipulation, both appeals were to be heard on the same transcript, and defendant's attorneys prepared and filed it. They also filed their opening brief within 30 days after filing the record here, but plaintiff did not within that time file any brief in support of his cross appeal; and defendant has moved, under the rule, to dismiss it. Plaintiff excuses his failure to comply with the rule by showing that he was under the mistaken belief that the stipulation as to the single record for both appeals also provided that he should print the opening brief on his appeal under the same cover with his answer to defendant's opening brief, which he has done since notice of the motion to dismiss was served. Defendant's attorneys admit that this method of presenting the cross appeal is convenient, and that they would very willingly have consented to it if they had been requested. They also admit that no delay in the hearing of the appeal has been or will be occasioned. Under the circumstances, we think it would be too severe a penalty to enforce the rule by dismissing the appeal. Motion denied.

In re TYLER'S ESTATE. (Sac. 304.)

WILLS—EXECUTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence as to the execution of a will proved the signature of testatrix, the signatures of the subscribing witnesses, and the fact that they signed it in her presence and in the presence of each other. No evidence impeaching the execution of the will in any respect was offered. One of the attesting witnesses was dead, however. The other did not remember whether testatrix signed the instrument or acknowledged her signature to it in his presence, or whether she declared it to be her will in the presence of the attesting witnesses, or whether she requested him to sign as an attesting witness, but he did not testify that these things did not take place. Held, that there was sufficient proof of the execution.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

F. D. Ryan and Jas. B. Devine, for appellants. C. W. Baker and Albert M. Johnson, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is a contest of the will of Anna Tyler, deceased, instituted by certain of her heirs. The court below held the will good, and the contestants appeal.

The appellants make no contention that the testatrix, at the time the will was made, was of unsound mind, or under undue influence, or that she did not knowingly sign it, or that it does not clearly express her evident intentions as to the disposition of her property, or that the will is not properly attested, or that on its face it does not comply with all the statutory provisions touching the making of wills. The sole contention of appellants is that the execution of the will was not sufficiently proved. And as to this point appellants did not themselves introduce any evidence to show that the will was not duly executed. They rely entirely upon the asserted insufficiency of the evidence of respondent. Indeed, the appellants offered no evidence at all on any material issue in the contest. They rest solely upon the proposition that the respondent did not prove enough. The closing part of the will is all that need be quoted here, and it is as follows: "In witness hereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal in the presence of John Heard and —, who I request to sign their names hereto as subscribing witnesses. [Signed] Anna Foster. [Seal.] [Signed] John Heard. Fred B. Berger." The objections made by appellants to the sufficiency of the evidence are that it does not sufficiently show that the testatrix signed the will in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, or acknowledged her signature in their presence, or that she declared to them that the instrument was her will, or that she requested the subscribing witness Berger to sign his name as a witness. The evidence and the facts proved were substantially as follows: The signature of the testatrix was proved. The attesting witness Heard was dead, and his signature was proved. The other subscribing witness, Berger, did not live in the county; and, if he had not been called as a witness at all, proof of his signature to the will, together with proof of the signature of Heard and of the testatrix, would clearly have made a prima facie case of its due execution. Code Civ. Proc. § 1315. But respondent (unfortunately, it seems) brought him from another county to testify at the trial; and it turned out that, although he remembered signing the will, and swore to his signature, he had no definite recollection of certain things which occurred at the time he attested the will. He could not remember whether the testatrix actually signed the instrument or verbally acknowledged her signature to it in his presence, or whether she declared the document to be her will in the presence of the attesting witnesses, or whether she requested him to sign as an attesting witness. He did not testify, however, that these things were not done; nor was there any evidence to impeach the execution of the will, or to throw upon it the shadow of any kind of suspicion. Appellants contend that the will must fall merely because the memory of the witness failed. The court held that as one attesting witness was dead, and the other unable to recollect, as above stated, and as there was no evidence tending in any way to invalidate the will, proof of the signatures of the testatrix and the attesting witnesses was, under the circumstances described, sufficient to establish the due execution of the instrument. We see no valid reason for disturbing this conclusion.

The witness Berger gave his testimony a dozen years after the making of the will; and as he went hurriedly from his business to be an attesting witness, and stayed only a short time at the place where the will was signed, it is not surprising that he had forgotten some of the things that happened on that occasion. He had not, however, forgotten all that occurred. He remembered that he was called as an attesting witness; that he went to a room in a certain house; that there were present there the testatrix, the other attesting witness (Heard), Mr. Tyler (husband of the testatrix), and a little girl (the beneficiary in the will), then too young to remember what occurred; that the testatrix, whom he well knew, was in her usual health; that he heard part of the will read; that Heard and the witness Berger signed the will as witnesses, and that when they did so the testatrix was there present; that witness then partook of some refreshments at the invitation of the testatrix, and immediately afterwards left; and that the testatrix and Heard were both there all the time that witness was present, —to all of which he testified. He testified, therefore, to at least some material things, —particularly that the attesting witnesses signed the will, and that they both signed it in the presence of the testatrix and of each other. We state that he remembered and testified to these things merely because it brings the case more nearly within the facts of some of the cases cited below, where an attesting witness had recollected some of the occurrences attendant upon the making of a will, but had forgotten others. Such facts strengthen the finding of a court that the will was duly executed.

It is our view, both upon reason and authority, that the finding of the trial court that the will was duly executed is beyond disturbance here. While the Code provides that certain things are necessary to the making of a valid will, it does not prescribe how those things shall be proved. It leaves that to the general rules of evidence. There is provision, it is true, that if the attesting witnesses are alive, and present in the county, they must, in the event of a contest, be called. This is a very natural and just provision, for in such case the failure of the proponent of a will to call his attesting witnesses would be a very suspicious circumstance. But there is no statutory declaration, and no principle of law, to the effect that a will executed in due form shall go for naught unless an attesting witness, after the lapse of many years, shall continue to recollect everything material that occurred at the time he subscribed his name to it. Such a rule would make the validity of the will dependent, not upon the disposing mind of the testator, nor his freedom from duress, undue influence, or fraud, nor upon his clear expression of his intention in the body of the instrument, nor upon its execution in conformity to the form and ceremony prescribed by the statute, but upon the fullness, accuracy, and persistency of the recollection of one of the persons who signed it as a witness. Such a rule cannot be maintained either upon principle or precedent. What constitutes a sufficient execution of a will is prescribed by the statute. What constitutes sufficient proof of such execution is not so prescribed, and is a different question,—a question to be solved by the general principles of evidence. In the case at bar there was no person other than Berger present at the making of the will who was capable of testifying at the time of the trial to its execution. The husband of the testatrix, and the other witness, Heard, were dead, and the little girl was too young at the time of the making of the will to know anything about it. The fact that the instrument was signed by the testatrix and the attesting witnesses was proved. There was no evidence tending to disprove the proper execution of the will, or to impeach it in any way. These are the facts of the case, and it is not necessary for the purposes of this decision to go beyond them. We are satisfied that upon these facts the court was warranted in holding the will duly executed. Where an attesting witness has no recollection as to certain matters connected with the making of the will, the case is, upon principle, in the same condition as where he is dead, insane, or absent; and in such case "proof of the handwriting of the testator and of the subscribing witnesses, or any of them, may be admitted as evidence of the execution." Code Civ. Proc. § 1315. And such evidence is sufficient, in the absence of any counter showing, to prove the execution.

Authorities supporting the above conclusion are numerous. We will refer to some of them: In 1 Greenl. Ev. par. 38a, we find the following: "Execution of Instruments—Regularity of Acts. Of a similar character is the presumption in favor of the due execution of solemn instruments. Thus, if the subscribing witnesses to a will are dead, or if, being present, they are forgetful of all the facts, or of any fact material to its due execution, the law will in such cases supply the defect of proof by presuming that the requisites of the statute were duly observed." Authorities are cited sustaining the text. In Beach on the Law of Wills the author, in paragraph 39, says: "On the death of the witnesses, or on the failure of their memory, the proof of the fact of execution begets the presumption that all the details of the statutory requirements were complied with, whether so stated in the attestation clause or not, unless the contrary be proven." In 1 Jones, Ev. § 44, it is said as follows: "If a will purports to have been duly signed, attested, and witnessed, on proof of execution the court will presume, in the case of the death of the witnesses, or in case they do not remember the facts connected with its execution, that the law was complied with; and the details of the statutory requirements will be presumed, whether it is so stated in the attestation clause or not, unless the contrary is proven." Other text-books state the same rule. There are innumerable judicial decisions to the same point. It is sufficient to cite the following: Burgoyne v. Showler, 1 Rob. Ecc. 10; In re Leach, 12 Jur. 381; Fatheree v. Lawrence, 33 Miss. 622, and cases there cited; Deupree v. Deupree, 45 Ga. 415; Ela v. Edwards, 13 Gray, 91; Eliot v. Eliot, 10 Allen, 357; Clarke v. Dunnivant, 10 Leigh, 13; Kirk v. Carr, 54 Pa. St. 285; McKee v. White, 50 Pa. St. 354. See, also, cases cited in the notes to the sections of the text-books above quoted.

As the question here involved is one of considerable importance, we will notice a few of the expressions by which the principle is declared in the cases above cited. In Burgoyne v. Showler it is said: "I think I should be establishing a very dangerous precedent if I were to pronounce against this will. I think the principle on which Sir H. J. Fust has acted in these cases is this: That, in the absence of the recollection of the witnesses, he will presume the will to be duly executed." In Re Leach each of the witnesses "remembered that he signed his name as a witness to the will in the testator's presence, but neither of them could recollect whether the testator signed his name in their presence, nor whether his signature was already set to the will when they signed, or whether the other witness was present"; and upon this testimony it was held that "the presumption is in favor of the due execution, according to the principle laid down by the learned judge who sat for me in the case of Burgoyne v. Showler, and I therefore decree probate to pass as prayed." In Kirk v. Carr the court says: "Want of memory will no more destroy the attestation than insanity, absence, or death." In Clarke v. Dunnivant, Tucker, J., in his concurring opinion, says, having alluded to a case where the attesting witness to a will had sworn affirmatively that the statute had not been complied with in making it: "How is it where, as in this case, they do not negative a compliance with the statute, but merely have forgotten the circumstances? It seems to me that, upon fair analogy, the question should be decided as it would be if the witness were dead, and his handwriting proved. And so, accordingly, I think, are the authorities to be understood." After referring to the case of Jackson v. Le Grange, 19 Johns. 386, approvingly, he says: "Where the memory of the witness fails, the proof of his signature will justify an inference that all the requisites of the law have been complied with." Further on he says: "From the whole of these cases, then, I deduce that on a question of probate the defect of memory of the witnesses will not be permitted to defeat the will, but that the court may, from circumstances, presume that the requisitions of the statute have been observed, and that they ought so to presume from the fact of attestation, unless the inferences from the fact are rebutted by satisfactory evidence." Having alluded to suggestions of mischief which might follow the decision, he says: "Far greater mischiefs would arise from a contrary decision, which should make the rights of every devisee and legatee depend, not only upon the honesty, but also upon the slippery memory of witnesses. Under such a decision no man could be sure of dying testate, since the forgetfulness of a witness would frustrate all his precaution; and a question of title by will, which, in the spirit of the statute of frauds, the legislature designed to rest upon written evidence alone, would, after all, depend upon the integrity and the memory of those who were called on to attest the instrument. The consequence would be that I may have a good will by me to-day, but, if I live five years, it may become a void instrument, because one of the witnesses to it cannot recall some ceremony of its execution. Such a consequence I would not aid in bringing about. It would tend, I have no doubt, to multiply the attempts, already too common, to set aside wills, since the chances of success must be very much increased if the frailty of human memory is to be called in to the aid of the discontented heir." In the leading opinion by Parker, J., the same views are expressed, and he says: "Few persons witnessing a paper would, after eight or nine years, be able to recall every fact that might be necessary to give it legal validity; and if their defect of memory is, without other impeachment, to prejudice the rights of parties claiming under it, the mischief would be greater than any that can result from this decision." In Ela v. Edwards the court says: "The obvious policy of the law, as heretofore declared in this commonwealth, has been that no man's will should be defeated through the want of memory on the part of the attesting witnesses to the facts essential to a good attestation." In Deupree v. Deupree the court below had charged the jury that, in case of the defective memory of an attesting witness, proof of his signature would be sufficient, provided there was an attestation clause which recited the things which the witness had forgotten, but that there would be no presumption of due execution in the absence of an attestation clause; and the appellate court held this to be error. The court says: "There is no question as to the general rule that on the death of the witnesses, or on the failure of their memory, the proof of the fact of execution begets a presumption that all the details of the fact were such as the law requires." After citing a number of cases the court says: "These cases establish, also, that this presumption does not depend on the recitals in the attestation clause." Further on the court says: "As a matter of course, the presumption is stronger or weaker, according to any material facts connected with the case; and, if it was recited, this would strengthen it. But it is a wise rule of law that such a presumption should exist. How many wills do not come up for probate until many years after the execution of them! Sometimes the witnesses can only recognize their own handwriting. Sometimes they only remember the fact that the testator signed, and perhaps only that they signed. Who was present, and all the other details, have passed from memory. To say that under such circumstances the will is not to be probated would be a death blow to wills." The statutes of Georgia on the subject are substantially like ours; and there is nothing in our Code which prescribes any form for the attestation of a subscribing witness, or that there shall be any recitals in such attestation.

The authorities cited by appellants are not in point, unless it be that of Luper v. Werts, 19 Or. 132, 23 Pac. 850. In Walker's Estate, 110 Cal. 397, 42 Pac. 815, the court was not dealing with the general question of the sufficiency of proof of the execution of a will. The facts there were undisputed, and the only question was whether or not one of the alleged attesting witnesses had subscribed his name to the document. The other cases cited do not deal with the question of the sufficiency of the proof of execution. In Luper v. Werts there are some expressions in the opinion of a majority of the court tending to support appellants' contention. The case was decided by a divided court, and the decision could have well been placed upon the fact that the testimony of Peyser, one of the subscribing witnesses, showed affirmatively that the will had not been properly executed. The case illustrates the danger of upsetting a will, even upon the adverse testimony of a subscribing witness, unless the attendant circumstances strengthen his testimony; for it seems to have been admitted there that, as said by Lord, J., in his dissenting opinion, "Peyser is an unwilling witness, of an unreliable character, whose testimony, as disclosed by the record, indicates a purpose to defeat the will." The testimony of a witness who had solemnly subscribed to a will as an attesting witness, and afterwards endeavored to overthrow it, should be closely scrutinized; and, no doubt, the court below in that case sustained the will because there were circumstances which caused it to disbelieve the testimony of Peyser. What was said in the opinion of the court as to the question here involved was mostly dictum; and, if anything can be there found not in accordance with the views herein expressed, we think, notwithstanding our high opinion of that court, it was contrary to the great volume and weight of authority. The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

HART v. KETCHUM. (Sac. 448.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1898.)

GIFT CAUSA MORTIS—VALIDITY.

On March 19, 1897, a decedent, during his last illness, placed in defendant's hands two savings bank books, saying he wanted him to draw the money, and pay his creditors and funeral expenses, and then select some charitable institution, and give it $100. He said nothing about any balance, did not specify any institution, but told defendant to select it. The orders for the money were prepared, and signed by decedent, and defendant then said that, if decedent got well, he would keep the money safely for him. The orders were sent to the banks, and the money received by the defendant. Decedent died on March 22d. Prior and subsequent to decedent's giving the bank books to defendant, he stated to others that he wished defendant to have the balance. Held insufficient to show a gift causa mortis, either to defendant or any charitable institution.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Amos Hart, administrator, etc., against Platt Ketchum. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Walling, for appellant. Frank R. Wehe, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff seeks by this action to recover from the defendant certain moneys claimed to belong to the estate of James Preston, of which he is the administrator. The defendant claims a right to the money by virtue of a gift causa mortis from the intestate. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

On the 19th day of March, 1897, James Preston, being ill, and expecting to die from his illness, placed in the hands of the defendant two savings bank books, saying: "I want you to draw this money, and pay it out as I wish to have it done, to different parties. I want you to draw the money, and pay Damas Sirard $1,000; pay John Sherman, in North San Juan, for one week's board,—about six dollars, I suppose; and pay to A. J. Grimes ten dollars." Then he said, "You select some charitable institution, and give or send to them one hundred dollars from this money." That was the talk right then. He said nothing to me about any balance, if any should remain. He did not specify any charitable institution, but told me to select one, and I asked him what one, and he said he did not know; that I should select one, and suit myself." He also said that he wanted the defendant to pay his funeral expenses. "He wanted me to pay all—to pay these parties certain amounts, and pay all his little bills that he might be owing, and all expenses and everything of that kind." Orders upon the banks for the money were then prepared by the defendant, and signed by Preston, and the defendant said to Preston: "Now, Jim, if you get well, I will keep this money safely for you, and you shall have every nickel of it back. You need not be afraid of losing any of it through me." The orders were sent to the banks at San Francisco and Sacramento, and subsequently the money represented by them was received by the defendant. Preston died on the 22d of March. The court found that in the making of said orders and delivery of said bank books the deceased did not intend to make a gift of his property to any one, or to transfer the title to said property to any one, but intended to retain his right and dominion over it during his lifetime; "that in the delivery of said bank books and making of said orders it was intended by said Preston to constitute said Ketchum his agent for the purposes above set forth, and it was intended by said Preston that such disposal of his said property should only take effect at the time of his death"; and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

Money deposited in a savings bank may be the subject of a gift causa mortis if it appears from the transaction that the donor intended thereby to confer upon the donee a present right to the money, and at the same time clothed him with the means of obtaining it. The delivery, however, must be as a gift in presenti, and not for the purpose of making a future disposal of it under the directions of the donor. If the donee is merely empowered to draw the money, and is thereafter to dispose of it in accordance with instructions from the donor, he is only an agent of the donor, and his agency terminates with the death of the donor. It is essential to a gift causa mortis that the donor shall confer upon the donee, at the time of the gift, a present title and property in the thing given; and, if the thing given is capable of corporeal delivery, there must be an actual or symbolical delivery of it, or if it is not so capable, the means of obtaining control and possession of the thing must be then given. Civ. Code, § 1147. Unless the property in the thing given vests in the donee, it remains in the donor, and there is only a purpose or intention on his part to make a gift. Such purpose or intention is incapable of enforcement. The delivery must accompany the gift, and must be made at the same time. It is the delivery by the donor, and not the possession by the donee, that makes the gift effective. Cutting v. Gilman, 41 N. H. 147; Miller v. Jeffress, 4 Grat. 472. The law requires a gift causa mortis to be absolute at the time it is given, but adds to it the condition that it may be revoked at the will of the donor, and that it is revoked by his recovery; but if, by the terms of the gift, it is not to take effect until after the death of the donor, the disposal is testamentary, and not a gift. Such limitation is a condition precedent by which the gift is prevented from becoming absolute in the lifetime of the donor, and the thing given is, therefore, a portion of his estate at the time of his death. Daniel v. Smith, 64 Cal. 346, 30 Pac. 575; Id., 75 Cal. 548, 17 Pac. 683; Walter v. Ford, 74 Mo. 196; Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 2 Sup. Ct. 415. At the time that Preston handed the bank books to the defendant he said nothing that in terms indicated his intention to make a present gift of the money. His remark, "I want you to draw this money, and pay it out as I wish to have it done, to different parties," and the subsequent designation of the persons to whom the money was to be paid, merely indicated the disposition which he wished made of his money after his death, and his selection of the defendant as his agent for that purpose. Certain directions for the payment of a portion of the money were then given, but at the time of giving them Preston said nothing indicating an intention to give any money to the defendant, or of the disposal to be made of what might remain after making the payments which he then directed. The language used by him indicated that the defendant was to pay out whatever money he might draw as Preston should direct. The statement by Preston to Hourcade, prior to his giving the bank books to the defendant, of what he intended to do, and his subsequent statement to Wayman, in the absence of the defendant, that he wished the defendant to have the balance, might be corroborative of any statement of the defendant as to what transpired between him and Preston, but it is not available to make the terms of the gift different from what the defendant stated them to be, or to establish a gift to the defendant at the time he received the books. The defendant said that he had no other conversation with Preston, and that he said nothing to him about any balance, if it should remain. That it was not the intention of Preston to direct the defendant to make an immediate payment to the persons designated, and that the defendant was not authorized to make such payment is shown by the defendant's statement that at the time he received the bank books he told Preston that he would keep the money safely for him, and that he should have it all back if he recovered. It is also to be noted that, with the exception of the $100 which was to be given to some charitable institution to be afterwards selected by the defendant, Preston was under some obligation to each of the persons to whom he directed the defendant to pay the money; and, while the use of the word "pay" might be consistent with an intention to make a gift, it is inconsistent with such intention when used with reference to the discharge of an obligation. It cannot be held that there was a gift by Preston to any charitable institution, since the defendant was to select the institution to which the money was to be given. The judgment and order are affirmed.

FOX v. GRAYSON. (S. F. 1,447.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 14, 1898.)

APPEAL—REVERSAL—INJUNCTION—DISSOLUTION—DISMISSAL.

When it is not clear that a reversal of an order dissolving a temporary injunction would have no legal effect, a motion to dismiss an appeal therefrom on that ground will not be sustained.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action of one Fox against one Grayson. From an order dissolving a temporary injunction, plaintiff appealed, and defendant moves to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

W. T. Baggett, for appellant. Deal, Tanszky & Wells, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss the plaintiff's appeal from an order dissolving a temporary injunction, upon the ground that a reversal of the order would have no legal effect, and consequently that the questions raised by the appeal have become mere abstractions. It is not clear that a reversal of the order would have no legal effect. Motion denied.

MARCH v. BARNET et al. (S. F. 704.)

SUBROGATION—SURETIES—BILLS AND NOTES.

In a suit on a note against the indorser, the maker's property was attached, and he caused it to be released by giving the statutory bond. Judgment was entered on the note against maker and indorser, and the attachment surety paid it, and took an assignment of it to himself. His obligation on the bond was only as surety for the maker. Held, that the surety or his assignees having notice could not enforce the judgment against the indorser.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

Action by William F. March against S. Barnet and others to recover for the wrongful taking of personal property. Judgment for plaintiff against defendant Jacob Steen and for defendants Barnet, Isaac Blum, Joseph Blum, and J. H. Jacobs. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

For decision in department, see 46 Pac. 152.

W. D. Story, for appellant. Z. N. Goldsby, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. When this cause was in department, an opinion was rendered affirming the judgment (51 Pac. 20), but subsequently the judgment of this court was set aside, and the cause ordered to a hearing in bank. The action is to recover $1,400 and interest, for the alleged wrongful taking of certain personal property of the plaintiff. The material facts, as stated in the complaint and found by the court, were these: In October, 1890, O. M. Button brought an action against Jacob Steen and John Ross and W. F. March, the plaintiff herein, on a promissory note made by said Steen, payable to John Ross, or order, and by him indorsed to plaintiff, March, who in turn, before maturity, indorsed the same to Button. A writ of attachment issued in said cause, which was levied upon the property of defendant Jacob Steen. Thereupon S. Barnet and one G. Bowman entered into an undertaking for the release of said attached property as prescribed by section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereby they undertook and agreed to pay any judgment plaintiff in that action might obtain against the defendant Steen, whereupon the attachment was released. Button obtained judgment in that action against Steen as maker of said note and March as indorser thereof for $625.97 and costs,—the suit having been dismissed as to defendant Ross; the findings upon which the judgment was based expressly disclosing the fact that Steen was the maker and March an indorser of the note. On April 18, 1892, Barnet paid that judgment to Button, and took an assignment of it. On May 17, 1892, defendant Barnet assigned the judgment to defendant Isaac Blum, who, on May 31, 1892, assigned it to Joseph Blum, having first taken out an execution, and placed it in the hands of the sheriff of San Francisco, instructing him to seize and sell the interest of March in the schooner Ingalls, which, under the further direction of Joseph Blum, the sheriff proceeded to do, selling said property to said Joseph Blum on May 28, 1892, for $770, which interest was then and there of the value of $1,000. Before making the sale, the sheriff demanded an indemnifying bond, which was given by defendants Isaac Blum, Joseph Blum, and J. H. Jacobs. Joseph Blum transferred his purchase to J. H. Jacobs on the day of the sale, and Jacobs at once took possession of the same, and held it at the commencement of the action. At all these times, from the payment of the Button judgment by Barnet until the sale and transfer of March's interest in the schooner, each of the defendants S. Barnet, Isaac Blum, Joseph Blum, and J. H. Jacobs had full notice of the relation sustained by said S. Barnet to that judgment, as surety for Steen; and said transfers from Barnet to Isaac Blum, from Isaac Blum to Joseph Blum, and from Joseph Blum to Jacobs, were made with the intention on the part of each of them "to have said property of plaintiff seized under said execution and sold, so as to protect said Steen against said judgment, and to reimburse said S. Barnet for the amount paid by him to said O. M. Button when he took said assignment." Upon these findings the court below gave plaintiff a judgment as against defendant Steen for $943.41 and costs, but denied him any relief as against defendants S. Barnet, Isaac Blum, Joseph Blum, and J. H. Jacobs; the action having been theretofore dismissed as to defendant Laumeister. Plaintiff appeals from so much of the judgment as is in favor of the defendants Barnet, the Blums, and Jacobs, the appeal being upon the judgment roll, without a bill of exceptions.

In the department opinion it was assumed that by his undertaking to release the attachment in Button against Steen et al. Barnet obligated himself on behalf of both Steen and March to meet any liability which should be cast upon them, or either of them, by the judgment in that case; and this assumption of fact dominated the conclusion there reached. Were such the case, the reasoning of that opinion—that upon paying the judgment in that case Barnet became subrogated to the rights of Button, the judgment creditor, as against both Steen and March, and entitled to enforce it indifferently against either—would be logical, and the conclusion reached obvious. But it is quite apparent that the assumed existence of the fact upon which that theory of the case rests is based upon a misapprehension of the findings. The findings do not show that Barnet became obligated upon behalf of both Steen and March; to the contrary, they show very clearly that the undertaking given by Barnet was given solely at the request and for the benefit of Steen, and to release his property, and that the obligation Barnet assumed thereby was only that in case the plaintiff in the action, Button, "recovered judgment therein against said Jacob Steen," he would on demand pay, etc. There was nothing in the terms of the undertaking or the relation of the parties which, either as a matter of fact or matter of law, made Barnet responsible for any obligation of March, or which in any way made March a party to Barnet's undertaking. The undertaking made Barnet the surety of Steen, but it created no obligation or privity between Barnet and March. And while, in becoming Steen's surety, Barnet thereby made himself a party to the judgment, and became bound to pay it upon Steen's default (Brandt, Sur. § 408; Freem. Judgm. § 180; Black, Judgm. 587; Riddle v. Baker, 13 Cal. 296, 306), as between himself and March he remained a stranger to the judgment. When, therefore, Barnet paid the judgment, he was performing solely the obligation of his principal, Steen, and his right to subrogation was confined to the rights of the judgment creditor as against Steen, and he was entitled to look for reimbursement only to the latter; in other words, as put in the books, he "stood in the shoes" of his principal, and he had precisely the same rights which the latter would have had, and none other. Civ. Code, § 2847; Freem. Judgm. §§ 470, 471; Brandt, Sur. §§ 242, 260, 270; Fitch v. Hammer (Colo. Sup.) 31 Pac. 336. It is obvious that, had Steen himself paid the judgment, he could not have looked to March for reimbursement. While as to Button they were equally liable, as between themselves, Steen, as maker of the note, was ultimately responsible to March. March v. Barnet, 114 Cal. 375, 46 Pac. 152. Since, therefore, Steen would have had no right to enforce the judgment against the plaintiff, March, neither had Barnet such right. Brandt, Sur. § 227; and authorities above cited. Consequently, when the property of plaintiff was seized and sold in pretended satisfaction of such judgment for the reimbursement of Barnet, the taking was clearly unlawful, and constituted a naked trespass in those participating therein, for which they were jointly and severally liable to plaintiff in the full value of the property taken. Lewis v. Johns, 34 Cal. 629; Weber v. Ferris, 37

How. Prac. 102; Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. 1; Davis v. Newkirk, 5 Denio, 92. As the findings show that all of the respondents participated in said taking, the plaintiff was clearly entitled, under the facts found, to a judgment against them for the value of the property, with interest from the date of the taking. In fact, had he asked it, plaintiff would have been entitled to a judgment for punitive damages, since respondents are found to have had full knowledge of the relation of Barnet to the judgment which they procured to be enforced, and were also charged with notice of plaintiff's rights in the premises. The taking was, therefore, to be regarded as malicious.

Respondents make the point that on a former appeal in this case (March v. Barnet, 114 Cal. 375, 46 Pac. 152) this court construed the action as being merely one for contribution by March, a surety, against Steen, the principal, in which it was held that March was entitled to recover against Steen only to the extent that the proceeds of his property had been applied towards the satisfaction of the judgment against Steen; and, say the respondents, the construction given to the complaint on that appeal is the law of the case, and, the action having been held to be one of the character indicated, no recovery can be had herein against these respondents. But there was nothing decided on that appeal which in any way conflicts with or militates against the conclusion that we reach on this, and the doctrine of the law of the case may not be invoked. That was an appeal by Steen from the judgment which was rendered against him as above stated, and all that this court was then dealing with was the rights as between the plaintiff here and Steen. What was there held as to the liability of Steen was clearly proper, since the findings do not show that he participated in the unlawful taking of plaintiff's property, and he was, therefore, not answerable in tort. The question as to the sufficiency of the pleadings or findings to authorize a judgment against these respondents was not before the court on that appeal, and was in no way considered; nor did the court pretend to fix the character of the action as against these respondents.

There was no objection taken by the demurrer of a misjoinder of causes of action, and the respondents have not pressed their demurrer on the ground of misjoinder of parties defendant. Their entire argument in support of their demurrer is that "the demurrer should have been sustained as to these respondents." We construe this as an attack only upon the general ground of a want of facts; and, manifestly, the demurrer was properly overruled upon that ground.

The other points made by respondents are sufficiently answered by what is said above in the discussion of the merits. The judgment in favor of respondents is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for plaintiff upon the findings against said respondents for $1,000, found to be the value of the property, together with legal interest from the date of the taking, and for costs of the action and of this appeal.

BANTA v. SILLER et al. (Sac. 297).<sup>1</sup>

(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1898.)

JUDGMENTS—VACATION—REVIEW ON APPEAL—NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING—INCONSISTENT DEFENSES.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing a court to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, such release is largely within discretion of the court; and, in the absence of gross abuse thereof, the court's ruling granting relief against an order refusing to settle a statement of a case which was not presented within the prescribed time, and reopening the case for settlement, will not be disturbed.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 441, providing that defendant may set forth as many defenses as he may have, which must be separately stated, he may allege in one count of a verified answer that a horse and wagon causing an injury were not under his control or driven by his servants, but had been furnished to a third person, and in another that the horse and wagon were being driven by defendant, and that plaintiff's injury was caused by his own negligence.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action by James F. Banta against J. L. Siller and L. G. Siller. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Albert M. Johnson, for appellants. A. L. Hart, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The motion for a new trial was made upon a statement of the case; and respondent objects to the consideration of the statement, on the ground that the proposed statement and amendments thereto were not presented to the judge for settlement, or left with the clerk for the judge, within the time prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure. The statement was prepared in proper time, and amendments duly proposed, and appellants gave notice to respondent that they would present the statement, with the amendments, to the judge for settlement on the 27th day of February, 1896, which was within the 10 days prescribed by the Code (section 472). It appears that they were not presented to the judge on that day, but were left with the clerk for the judge two days afterwards.

Afterwards, on March 16th, the proposed statement and amendments came up for settlement, and upon objection of respondent the court refused to settle the same. On the same day, appellants served notice of a motion to be relieved from the order refusing to settle the statement, on the ground of their inadvertence, excusable neglect, etc. The court granted the motion, and thereafter, against plaintiff's objections, settled the statement as it is here presented. There is no doubt that the court had power to do this. As was held in Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 Pac. 332, the settlement of a statement is a "proceeding," within section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, under that section, the release of a party from a proceeding taken against him through mistake, inadvertence, etc., is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court. An order granting such release will not be disturbed here, unless it clearly appears that the court or judge was guilty of gross abuse of discretion in making it. Indeed, it has been frequently said here that in cases of doubt the court ought to resolve the doubt in favor of the application, so that the full merits of the litigation might be presented. Buell v. Emerich, 85 Cal. 116, 24 Pac. 644; Wolff v. Railway Co., 89 Cal. 332, 26 Pac. 825; Grady v. Donahoo, 108 Cal. 211, 41 Pac. 41; Harbaugh v. Water Co., 109 Cal. 70, 41 Pac. 792. In the case at bar the evidence upon the point clearly warranted the court in setting aside its order and settling the statement; and in doing so the court certainly did not abuse its discretion.

The respondent, while riding a bicycle, came into contact with a horse and wagon belonging to the appellants, and was injured thereby; and this suit is brought to recover damages for the alleged injury. In their answer, the appellants, in addition to denials, set up two separate and distinct defenses, to wit: (1) That at the time of the collision the horse and wagon were not under the control of the appellants, or either of them, and were not being driven by any of defendants' servants, but were in the possession and control of one Axel Telstrom, to whom they had furnished the same for the purpose of carrying out a certain independent contract made by said Telstrom; and (2) that the horse and wagon were at the time owned by appellants, and were being driven by them along the highway, and that the accident occurred through the negligence, etc., of the respondent, and not through any fault of defendants, or any of their servants or employés. The complaint and answer were both verified. The court tried the case upon the theory that, where an answer is verified, there cannot be set up in it two inconsistent and contradictory averments. This point arose upon the refusal of the court to stop counsel for respondent, in his argument to the jury, from contending that appellants had committed perjury in their answer; upon an instrucdion to the jury that Telstrom must be held to have been the servant of the appellants; and upon an instruction that "a defendant may plead as many separate defenses as he has, but a sworn answer must not deny a fact in one part which is averred to be true in another part." In these rulings the court erred; and, for the errors thus committed, the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

There is some language in the opinion of the court in the case of Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 678, which, if considered by itself, and disconnected from the rest of the opinion and from the facts in the case, gives some support to the views of the court below on this point. Section 441 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "the defendant may set forth, by answer, as many defenses and counter-claims as he may have," and that "they must be separately stated"; and in Bell v. Brown the court, referring to section 441, says: "It does not attempt to make any distinction between the two [verified and unverified pleadings], or to make any rule which does not apply equally to both. The right to set up numerous defenses in a suit is equally as important to the defendant in the one case as in the other. It is an absolute right given him by law, and the principle is as old as the common law itself.

* * * In many cases it would be an absolute denial of justice if a defendant should be shut out from setting up several defenses." The language in Bell v. Brown, relied on by respondent, is correct when applied to the averments of any single separate defense, but is not applicable to the whole of an answer which contains different distinct and separate defenses. This distinction was pointed out in subsequent cases. In Buhne v. Corbett, 43 Cal. 264, the court say: "A party defendant in pleading may plead as many defenses as he may have. If a plea or defense separately pleaded in an answer contain several matters, these should not be repugnant or inconsistent in themselves. But the plea regarded as an entirety, if it be otherwise sufficient in form and substance, is not to be defeated or disregarded merely because it is inconsistent with some other plea or defense pleaded. And there is no distinction in this respect between pleadings verified and unverified." See, also, Billings v. Drew, 52 Cal. 565; Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 332, 7 Pac. 753; McDonald v. Railway Co., 101 Cal. 206, 35 Pac. 643, 646.

The court properly held that an offer to prove a certain compromise was not admissible, after it had already admitted some evidence on the subject; but whether or not the appellants were prejudiced by the admission of such evidence, notwithstanding the fact that it was afterwards stricken out, will not arise on another trial, and need not be now considered. We see no other point in the case necessary to be discussed. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

TEMPLE, J. I concur, but desire to state that I concur in the conclusion on the point discussed solely because it was so held in Stonesifer v. Kilburn. I think, however, that case was wrongly decided. Section 473 authorizes the court to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him. In that case no default or other order had been taken against the moving party when the affidavits were made and the notice given by the moving parties of their application to be relieved. No objection had been made to their right to have the bill of exceptions settled, other than that the service of the notice to settle was accepted subject to objections. There was then nothing to be relieved from, and section 473 could not apply. The decision of this court was a direction to the trial court to settle the statement notwithstanding the lapse of the statutory time, because a reasonable excuse for the delay was shown, and was in conflict with numerous decisions of this court. Wunderlin v. Cadogan, 75 Cal. 617, 17 Pac. 713; Carpenter v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. 596, 19 Pac. 174; Hodgdon v. Railway Co., 75 Cal. 650, 21 Pac. 372; Bunnell v. Stockton, 83 Cal. 320, 23 Pac. 301; Jue Fook Sam v. Lord, 83 Cal. 162, 23 Pac. 225. In fact, the application in the Stonesifer Case was simply to prevent the party opposing the motion from successfully urging the objection that he had lost his right by failing to move in time. Previously, this court had held that, if the time was allowed to lapse, the court could not then grant further time, and could not settle the statement. The Stonesifer Case simply reverses these rulings, and holds that under such circumstances the court can, and, if the delay is excused, will, settle the statement.

CURTIS v. DEVOE. (Sac. 387.)

GUARDIANS—LIABILITIES—RIGHTS OF WARD—PRESUMPTIONS—ACCOUNTING—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1754, providing that a guardian shall give a bond conditioned that he will render an account at such times as the court directs, and section 1774, providing that he must present his account to the court at the end of one year from his appointment, and as often thereafter as may be required, do not require annual reports of guardians.

2. The failure of a guardian to render accounts regularly and promptly does not impose punitive responsibility on him, but the question of his liability for loss depends on the circumstances under which the loss occurred.

3. In the absence of evidence, and of probative facts necessarily inconsistent therewith, it will be presumed that a finding of good faith and prudence on the part of a guardian in making a loan was justified.

4. The fact of a guardian's proceeding with a foreclosure and compromising a deficiency judgment after his ward arrives at majority does not raise the presumption that he continued to act with the consent and approval of the ward.

5. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1753, providing that every guardian shall have the care and management of his ward's estate until he attains his majority or the guardian is legally discharged, and section 1754, subd. 3, requiring the guardian, at the expiration of his trust, to settle his accounts with the court or his ward, the guardian has no control over his ward's estate after he arrives at majority, except for the purpose of accounting as to transactions during the minority; and where he proceeds with the foreclosure of securities of the ward, and bids in the property at the sale for more than it is worth, he is liable on his bond for the difference in value, or the ward may repudiate the sale, and look to him for the full amount of the secured debt.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; William W. Cross, Judge.

Final accounting of Chris. W. Devoe, guardian of Robert B. Curtis, a minor. There was a decree of accounting, and the ward appeals. Modified.

Bradley & Farnsworth, for appellant. W. B. Wallace, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Settlement of final account of guardian. The appeal is by the ward upon the judgment roll alone. The court found that the guardian was appointed October 20, 1887, and was the acting guardian until March 4, 1894, when the ward came of age; that on May 29, 1896, the guardian filed his final account and report of his transactions as such guardian to March 4, 1894, the date of the ward's majority. The account as filed showed that the estate received by the guardian was money. Upon the hearing some items were disallowed and some were added, which, together with certain compensation allowed the guardian, left a balance due the estate of $2.21, omitting a certain transaction relating to the loan of $1,500, now made the subject of this appeal. The court found that on November 16, 1888, the guardian loaned to one Edward E. Bush and one J. J. Harlow, jointly, $1,500, taking their note, payable one year after date, to the guardian, bearing interest at 1 per cent. per month, secured by mortgage on certain 160 acres of land in Tulare county, to which Bush and Harlow had at the time a perfect title free from all liens, and then of the market value of $2,600, "when times were more prosperous and prices were generally higher than now, and which lasted until about the beginning of 1893"; that in making said loan the guardian acted without order of court, but he was not negligent in any way, but acted with ordinary care and prudence, and the land was ample security for said loan at said time; that interest was fully paid on said loan up to November 18, 1891, but no further payments were made thereon; that on October 31, 1893, the guardian commenced suit to foreclose said mortgage, and obtained judgment October 21, 1894, for $2,- 098, and $244 costs; that "on October 29, 1894, the said land was offered for sale at public auction, and, there being no other bidders, said guardian bid in said land in the name of his said ward for $1,500, and upon the return of sale a deficiency judgment was entered in said action against said Bush and Harlow in the sum of $888.50, and a certificate of sale of said land was issued in the name of said Robert B. Curtis (the ward), and thereafter a deed to said land was executed by the commissioner making said sale to said Curtis, which was forwarded to the attorney of said Curtis at New York City; that said guardian could not, after due diligence, collect said deficiency judgment, and said Harlow having died insolvent, and said Bush being in imminent danger of insolvency, said guardian accepted in satisfaction of said deficiency judgment lots 26 and 27, block 184, and lots 4, 5, and 6, block 185, in the city of Hanford, Kings county, taking a conveyance of the same directly to himself, and he now holds a perfect legal title to said lots, free from any liens, * * * in trust for said Curtis." The court found that the ward never authorized or ratified said satisfaction of said deficiency judgment, but expressly refused to do so; and, although aware of the foreclosure sale and the purchase of the mortgaged premises in his name, the ward refused to confirm or ratify the sale, and refused to accept the certificate of sale or the deed, or to accept the land in settlement of his account. He did not, up to the time of the trial, offer to convey the land to the guardian, though requested so to do, and "refused to do anything to enable said guardian to sell it, claiming that to accept said deed or to reconvey said property might be considered as a ratification of the act of said guardian," but at the trial "the said ward offered to execute a deed of said land to said Devoe, so as to divest said ward of whatever title stood in his name." It was further found that said mortgaged land had greatly depreciated in value, "and is not now of a value exceeding $320, as the evidence shows that there is not now any market value for such lands, and said land was worth a little more in October, 1894, than it is now, but there was no evidence of what its value was at that time." Finding 9 is "that in all said transactions said guardian acted in perfect good faith with his said ward, and with ordinary care and prudence; that the only account or report rendered or filed by said guardian since February 25, 1888, is his final account and report." The court found as conclusion of law: "That the account of said ward should be settled by said guardian taking the said land purchased on said foreclosure sale, and paying the said ward in lieu thereof $320, the value thereof; also that he pay said ward said balance of $2.21,—making in all $322.21, which the court finds to be due said ward, with legal interest from the 19th day of September, 1896, all of which shall be paid within twenty days from the date hereof; and that said ward take the said town lots in Hanford; * * * that said guardian, within twenty days from the date hereto, execute and deliver to said ward a proper deed conveying to him the legal title of said lots, free from incumbrance; * * * and that said ward, within twenty days from the date hereof, execute and deliver to said Devoe a proper deed conveying to him the legal title to said land foreclosed, free from any incumbrance imposed by said ward;" and judgment was accordingly entered.

Appellant contends that the court should have settled the guardian's account by directing the guardian to pay his ward $2.21, and the further sum of $1,500, with legal interest from November 16, 1891, computed with annual rests, and that the guardian should be compelled to take the 160 acres of land purchased at the foreclosure sale, and also the lots in Hanford.

1. It is claimed by appellant that the guardian did not conduct his trust as required by law, nor manage the estate with ordinary care and prudence, because (1) he did not render accounts and reports to the court as required by law, citing sections 1754, 1774, Code Civ. Proc., and In re Allgier, 65 Cal. 229, 3 Pac. 849; (2) he did not manage his ward's estate with ordinary care and prudence, citing section 249, Civ. Code, and sections 1754-1792, Code Civ. Proc.

There is no disagreement between respective counsel as to the duties, generally, of the guardian. As to these it may be said that the guardian should follow the directions of the statute, and make the accounts and reports therein required of him. His own safety, the requirements of business prudence, and the welfare of the ward and his estate demand this. The statute does not require annual accounts of guardians, but it would be better for all concerned if so made. At the same time, we cannot say that a failure to strictly comply with the statute, or neglect to render accounts with some regularity and promptness, necessarily imposes punitive responsibility upon the guardian. If there be loss to the estate, the question of the guardian's liability therefor depends much upon the circumstances under which the loss occurred. Wheeler v. Bolton, 92 Cal. 159, 28 Pac. 558; In re Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 441, 44 Pac. 182.

In the present case the failure to render annual accounts, or to take the order of the court for the loan to Bush and Harlow at the time it was made, do not appear to have caused loss or to show want of prudence. The land was found to be ample security, and so remained up to "about the beginning of the year 1893." Interest was promptly paid to November, 1891. No explanation is given in the findings why the guardian delayed foreclosure after November, 1891, until October, 1893, when action was commenced; but the court found, after setting forth the various acts of the guardian from the commencement of his trust to and including his acts relating to the foreclosure and sale, "that in all said transactions said guardian acted in perfect good faith with his said ward, and with ordinary care and prudence"; and as to making the loan to Bush and Harlow, and accepting the mortgage, the court found that "said guardian * * * was not negligent in any way, but acted with ordinary care and prudence, and said land was ample security for said loan at said time." We must assume, in the absence of the evidence, and in the absence of any findings of probative facts which are necessarily inconsistent with this finding of good faith and prudence, that it was justified. We think it must be held that up to March 4, 1894, when the ward came of age, and to which time the account was brought, the findings justify the conclusion that the guardian had acted in good faith and with ordinary prudence; and had he promptly filed his account, asking its settlement and his discharge from his trust, we think the finding would have justified a settlement by turning over the estate to the ward in its then condition,—with the foreclosure suit then pending,—and adjusting the several items of the account, as was done by the court. Placing out of view the Bush and Harlow loan, the account as settled showed receipts $2,856.99, and disbursements $2,854.78, leaving a balance due the ward of $2.21. There is no explanation given in the finding of the delay in rendering the account after March 4, 1894, until May 29, 1896. No objection was made to the account because of its being delayed so long, and no injury is found to have accrued to the ward by this delay. The court made findings as to all the contested items of the account, and as to all others it found the account to be correct. There may have been evidence at the hearing explanatory of this delay. The finding that in all the guardian's transactions he acted in good faith, and with ordinary prudence and care, seems to cover the rendering of his final account, and we cannot say that the mere fact of the delay in making it is sufficient to warrant us in holding that the finding is not sustained in this particular.

2. It is claimed by appellant, and it was found by the court, that the proceedings on foreclosure, after the ward came of age, were without his authority or ratification, both in the matter of bidding in the property at the sale in the name of the ward, and in settling the matter of deficiency judgment by compromise with Harlow, and taking the deed to the Hanford lots. There is nothing in the findings to show by what authority the guardian assumed to act after March 3, 1894. We do not think any presumption arises, as claimed by respondent, that Devoe continued to act as guardian by consent and with the approval of the ward. The findings seem to show the contrary, for the ward refused to consent to or ratify the acts of Devoe.

Section 1753, Code Civ. Proc., provides as follows: "Every guardian appointed shall have the custody and care of the education of the minor, and the care and management of his estate until such minor arrives at the age of majority or marries, or until the guardian is legally discharged." The guardian's power, when appointed by the court, is suspended by the majority of the ward. Civ. Code, § 254. By section 1754, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc., he is required, "at the expiration of his trust, to settle his accounts with the court, or with the ward, if he be of full age, or his legal representatives, and to pay over and deliver all the estate, moneys and effects remaining in his hands, or due from him on such settlement, to the person who is lawfully entitled thereto."

It was said in Re Allgier, supra: "When a ward attains the age of majority the office of guardian comes to an end, and it is then the duty of the guardian, and one of the obligations of his bond, to exhibit a final account of his guardianship to the probate court, make a settlement with the probate judge or with the ward, and deliver all the property in his hands to the ward. Code Civ. Proc. § 1754. Failure to do this constitutes a breach of his bond, for which he and his sureties are liable after settlement of the guardianship." Action must be brought on the bond within three years from the discharge of the guardian. Id. § 1805. Jurisdiction remains in the probate court, after the minor's majority, over the estate in the hands of the guardian for the purposes of an accounting as to transactions during the minority of the ward, but not as to any occurring after the ward has attained majority. It was so held in the case just cited, and it was said, as to the effect of the ward's having attained majority: "When that event happens, the ward is sui juris, and the legal liability which attaches to him for any services rendered to him by his guardian arises, not out of the relation of former guardian and ward, but out of the contractual relation established by the transactions between them as contracting parties. Such a liability is not enforceable within the jurisdiction of a probate court; the remedy upon it lies, not in a probate proceeding, but in an action at law." And this seems to be in accord with the general rule. Woerner, Guardianship, §§ 94, 101.

Respondent cites, as holding otherwise, Seaman v. Duryea, 11 N. Y. 324, and Pyatt v. Pyatt, 46 N. J. Eq. 285, 18 Atl. 1048, and claims that the remarks of the court in Re Allgier were dicta. In the New Jersey case it was said: "It would be a narrow, not a liberal, construction of the statutory terms which authorize this court to compel guardians 'to account for the estate in their hands,' to say that it can compel such an account only up to the time when the ward becomes of age, and that guardians must 'account for the estates in their hands,' so far as their subsequent dealings with such estates are concerned, in some other tribunal." Of this doctrine Mr. Woerner remarks (note 1, § 340) that it rests upon cases holding that the probate court was, under the statute, vested with full chancery powers. Under our statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1753), the guardian has the custody and care of the minor's person and property "until such minor arrives at the age of majority or marries." We do not think that the clause, "or until the guardian is legally discharged," was intended to prolong his control of the person and estate of the minor; for, if it did, he would have control for one year after the majority of the ward (Civ. Code, § 257), and this would be in conflict with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra. Upon the minor's attaining majority, the guardian must then make a settlement either with the court or the ward, and pay over and deliver to the ward all the estate in his hands, "or due from him on such settlement." In point of fact, the account here does not include any items after March 4, 1894, and it is to that date that the court settled it. The court found that the guardian was indebted to the ward in the sum of $2.21, disregarding the loan to Bush and Harlow. It found that that loan was properly made, and that there was no lack of care and prudence in what the guardian did concerning this loan and its enforcement up to March 4, 1894. We are unable to see upon what principle or theory the court, as conclusion of law, decided that the guardian should convey the Hanford lots to the ward, and pay the ward $320 and this small balance of $2.21, and that the ward should convey the Bush and Harlow lands to the guardian. This adjustment related to transactions occurring after the ward's majority, which were wholly unauthorized by the ward.

The guardian took credit in his account for the Bush and Harlow loan of $1,500, and this the court found to be proper, but he had in his control when the ward came of age the note and mortgage given by Bush and Harlow, the subject of the foreclosure suit. The cause had not been tried, and was not tried and judgment entered until October 2, 1894. He also had in his possession at that time other property of the ward, to wit, a horse and cart. He should have turned over to the ward the note and mortgage and the chose in action and the horse and cart. The latter he still holds, and can and should deliver to the ward, but the note and mortgage he cannot deliver; neither can he deliver the then pending action thereon, for it was carried to decree, and a sale of the mortgaged property was subsequently made, and the ascertained deficiency was compromised; and all this was without any authority whatever, either as guardian, or as agent or trustee, of the ward.

While it is true that the settlement of a guardian's account, as we have seen, cannot ordinarily include transactions occurring after the ward has attained his majority, it appears that the guardian, while still in possession of the estate, assumed, without any authority, to conduct the foreclosure proceeding to final judgment, and he bid in the mortgaged premises at $1,500. In doing this he must be held to have determined the value to be that sum. The sale was at auction, and there may have been other bidders. We must assume that the guardian bid the fair cash value at that time, and he cannot be heard to say that it was in fact less than he bid, nor should he be allowed to avail himself of any subsequent depreciation in its value. He chose to convert the note and mortgage and judgment thereon into property of the value of $1,500. Indeed, it was, in legal effect, a conversion to his own use of the ward's property of that value while yet in his possession; and we can see no violation of the general rule as laid down in Re Allgier, supra, in authorizing the court to charge the guardian with that amount in his account.

As to the compromise relating to the deficiency judgment, it was equally without authority; but, as the ward does not appear to have suffered loss thereby, his rights may be fully protected by giving him the option of taking the deed to the Hanford lots or taking the deficiency judgment, in which latter case the title should be restored to Bush, who conveyed the lots to the guardian.

The decree should be modified so as to settle the account as rendered, requiring the guardian to pay over the ascertained money balance of $2.21, and also the further sum of $1,500, with interest from October 29, 1894, at 7 per cent. per annum, and to deliver the horse and cart. The decree should require the guardian to execute a deed of the Hanford lots to the ward, if he should elect to take them; otherwise to convey the same to Bush, and the ward to look alone to the deficiency judgment. The decree should also require the ward to convey to the guardian whatever interest or title there may be in him to the property purchased by the guardian at the foreclosure sale. Thus modified, the decree settling the final account should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the decree settling the final account be modified in accordance with said opinion, and when so modified it shall stand affirmed.

STANSBURY v. WHITE et al. (L. A. 416, 417.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1898.)

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS—SPECIFICATIONS—AUTHORITY OF STREET SUPERINTENDENT.

A city council has no power in its specifications for bids for the improvement of a street to delegate to a street superintendent the authority to determine the amount of work to be done by the successful bidder, what materials shall be used in certain events, and whether the right quality and quantity of material have been used, and an assessment for improvements based on such specifications is invalid.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Two actions, by C. V. Stansbury and H. I. Moore, partners, against J. O. White and others, were tried together. There were judgments for plaintiffs. On the death of Moore, after the judgments were rendered, and before appeals were taken, Stansbury was substituted as sole plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

C. W. Chase, for appellants. Chas. McFarland, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. Two actions were commenced by C. V. Stansbury and H. I. Moore, co-partners, doing business under the firm name of Stansbury & Moore, against the defendants, J. O. White, E. B. White, his wife, and Delia W. Chase, to foreclose the liens of a street assessment for improvements made on Gallardo street, in the city of Los Angeles. The assessment involved in one of the cases was on the north 17 feet of lot 21 in the Villa Tract in said city, for $40.49; and that involved in the other case was on the south 16 feet of lot 22 in the same tract, for $38.12. The defendants filed a general demurrer to each complaint, which was overruled, and then answered. The cases were tried together, and judgments were entered awarding the plaintiffs the relief demanded, with costs and attorneys' fees. From these judgments the defendants have appealed, the appeals being respectively designated as Nos. 416 and 417. The cases, as shown by the records and briefs filed, are in all respects identically the same, except as to the lots assessed and the amounts of the assessments, and they may therefore be considered together. After the judgments were rendered, and before the appeals were taken, Moore died; and, by an order of court, Stansbury, the surviving member of the firm, was substituted as sole plaintiff.

It is alleged in the complaints that on August 28, 1895, the city council of the city of Los Angeles passed a resolution of intention to have Gallardo street, between certain designated terminals, graded, graveled, and guttered in accordance with specifications No. 5 on file in the offices of the city engineer and city clerk of said city, and to have constructed along each side of the street, between the said terminals, a cement curb and a cement sidewalk, five feet wide, in accordance with the amended specifications No. 12 on file in the offices of said city engineer and clerk. At the trial it was stipulated that the work was done under said specifications, which were fully set out. Specifications No. 5 contained, among others, the following provisions: "The contractor shall not use any material in filling the subgrade that is of a spongy nature, and should the street, or any portion thereof, be found to contain material unsuited for foundation purposes, the contractor shall remove such material at his own expense, and replace it with good earth or gravel. * * * An allowance for settling, to be determined by the street superintendent, shall be made when finishing fill. * * * Unless otherwise directed by the street superintendent, the crown of the street shall be made to conform with the cross section on file with the city clerk. * * * The crown and sidewalks shall be made to conform to the above-mentioned cross section. Should the street superintendent deem it necessary to change the above-described form of cross section of street at any place thereof, the contractor shall comply to such change without receiving extra pay therefor. * * * The contractor shall provide for drainage under all banks that it may be necessary for him to make across ravines or drainage channels, and put in such culverts as the street superintendent may direct, and at his own cost. * * * In all fills the earth shall be made to assume its natural slope, or shall be made of such slope as may be indicated by stakes set by the city engineer. * * * Doubts as to the true meaning and intent of these specifications will be solved by the street superintendent." And specifications No. 12 contain, among others, the following provisions: "Sidewalks shall be three and one-half inches thick, built on a foundation constructed as follows: All soft or spongy material is to be removed and replaced with sand gravel of a quality and quantity acceptable to the street superintendent, and then tamped, etc. * * * The material to be supplied in case of fill must be satisfactory to the street superintendent. * * * The finishing coat shall be mixed with lamp black or any durable coloring matter that shall give a dark slate color, the same to be of a shade that will be satisfactory to the street superintendent."

The street improvement act of 1885 (St. 1885, p. 147) provides, in section 6: "The work provided for in section two of this act must, in all cases, be done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, and the materials used shall comply with the specifications and be to the satisfaction of said superintendent of streets. * * * The city council may, by ordinance, prescribe general rules directing the superintendent of streets and the contractor as to the materials to be used, and the mode of executing the work, under all contracts thereafter made." And the same act, as amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 196), provides, in section 3: "Before ordering any work done or improvement made, which is authorized by section two of this act, the city council shall pass a resolution of intention so to do, and describing the work.

* * * Before passing any resolution for the construction of said improvements plans and specifications and careful estimates of the costs and expenses thereof shall be furnished to said city council, if required by it, by the city engineer of said city." And in section 5 it is provided that, before the awarding of any contract, a notice, "with specifications," shall be given, inviting sealed proposals or bids for doing the work ordered.

It will be observed that, while it is alleged that the work was to be done in accordance with specifications No. 5 and No. 12, it in no way appears from the complaints what those specifications contained, as they are not set out in hæc verba, or even in substance. It is impossible, therefore, to ascertain from the complaints what work was intended or was ordered to be done, or what the contract for the work was, except that it was for grading, graveling, and guttering the street, and constructing cement curbs and cement sidewalks along the sides thereof. But if we assume that the reference to the specifications as on file in the offices of the city clerk and engineer was sufficient to make them a part of the complaint, and in that respect to constitute a good pleading, still, under the law as declared in Bolton v. Gilleran, 105 Cal. 244, 38 Pac. 881, they seem to be subject to objections similar to those held fatal to the assessment involved in that case. The specifications clearly delegate to the superintendent authority to determine whether more or less work shall be done by the contractor, what materials shall be used in certain events, and whether or not the right quality and quantity of material has been used, and, if he decides against the contractor, the latter must do the work all over again. For example, the superintendent may decide, in case he wishes to favor a contractor, that the subgrade contains no "material unsuited for foundation purposes" which need be removed; that a small "allowance for settling" is enough; that the crown of the street as constructed conforms "with the cross section on file," and no change is necessary; that no "culverts" are needed; that the shade of the sidewalk as laid is satisfactory, and may solve all doubts in favor of the contractor. On the other hand, he may decide, in case he is not friendly to the contractor, that the subgrade contains material unsuited for foundation purposes, and require the same to be removed to such depth as he may name; and he may be very particular as to the character of the material used for the "filling," and as to the "allowance for settling," and may require a large amount of "good earth or gravel" to be used. He may change the "crown of the street," so that the expense will be very much increased. He may decide that many "culverts" are necessary, and that those put in shall be of stone or brick or iron instead of wood, and thus add largely to the expense. He may solve all "doubts" against the contractors, and so make him do over again work already once done. After the sidewalk is laid, he may decide that the "shade" of the same is not satisfactory to him, and that the contractor must relay the walk, and put in different "coloring matter." Under such specifications, it is evident that no one could intelligently bid for the contract, as he could not tell in advance what would be the exact character or extent of the work to be done, or the necessary expense of doing it. Any bidder would therefore hesitate to take such a contract to do the work, unless his bid was placed at a high figure, or he felt sure he would be favored by the superintendent. In the case above cited, it is said: "The legislative department of the city has no power to delegate to any other officer or body the authority to determine upon the necessity of making such improvement, or the character or extent of any improvement which it may itself direct to be made. In the language of Mr. Dillon (Mun. Corp. § 96): 'It is not competent for the council to pass an ordinance delegating or leaving to any officer or committee of the corporation the power to determine the mode, manner, or plan of the improvement.'" The court then cites several cases in which it has been held that no valid assessment upon property can be made under an order directing the improvement, and, among others, one where the work was to be done "in such manner as the city superintendent shall direct." The court further said: "A contract in terms like the present gives to the superintendent of streets the opportunity to make the cost of the improvement greater or less, according to his desire to favor or injure the contractor, vests him with an illegal discretion, tends to prepare the way for an unfair assessment, and opens wide the door to fraud or favoritism." See, also, Warren v. Chandos, 115 Cal. 382, 47 Pac. 132, and Perine Contracting & Paving Co. v. City of Pasadena, 116 Cal. 6, 47 Pac. 777. In the first of these cases it is said, on page 386, 115 Cal., and page 133, 47 Pac.: "In Bolton v. Gilleran, supra, it was held that a contract which gave to the superintendent of streets the power to increase or diminish the cost of the improvement, after the contract had been entered into, by requiring a greater or less amount of material for its completion as he should determine, rendered the assessment invalid."

Several other points are made by appellants, but, in view of what has been said, they need not be considered. Under the authorities above cited, we conclude that the demurrers should have been sustained, and advise that the judgments appealed from be reversed, and the causes remanded.

I concur: SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgments appealed from are reversed, and the causes remanded.

STUDER v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (Sac. 289.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 9, 1898.)

INJURY TO BOY CLIMBING BETWEEN CARS—PROXIMATE CAUSE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff's evidence showed that defendant's freight train had stood across a public street at a way station for seven or eight minutes when plaintiff's 12 year old son, of ordinary intelligence, passed along the street, and, after waiting two or three minutes for the train to move on, attempted to cross between the cars, and while climbing over the couplings the train started backwards without giving notice by bell or whistle, and he was crushed between the cars. Held, that the evidence clearly showed that the proximate cause of the injury was due to the boy's negligence, and that a nonsuit was justifiable.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by one Studer against the Southern Pacific Company. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph Craig and R. J. Hudson, for appellant. Geo. A. Lamont, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the death of his son, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony the court granted a nonsuit, and from the judgment thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

The facts shown at the trial are as follows: On the 22d of July, 1895, the defendant was moving a freight train of about 15 cars loaded with basalt blocks, and on arriving at Cordelia station the train stopped. The track of the defendant at this station runs parallel with Main street, and directly south of it. Near the station there is another street which intersects Main street at right angles, and when the train was stopped it stood directly across this intersecting street,—the locomotive and two or three cars being to the east of it,—and the travel into it from Main street was thereby obstructed. After the train had stood in this position eight or ten minutes, the deceased, a child between 12 and 13 years old, came along Main street from the west, as far as the intersection of the other street, and, after waiting there two or three minutes, attempted to cross the train between two of the cars, and while in the act of climbing over the couplings the train started backwards without giving any notice by bell or whistle, and he was injured by being crushed between the cars, and subsequently died from the injuries so received. Whether the court properly granted the nonsuit depends upon whether it appeared from the testimony on the part of the plaintiff that the deceased was guilty of negligence. The place where the injury was received was a public highway, and the deceased is not to be regarded as a trespasser by reason of his attempt to cross the street while it was obstructed by the defendant's cars. Nor was a temporary obstruction of the street, by stopping the train, in violation of any right of the deceased, since the defendant was also entitled to use the crossing as a part of its right of way. Each was required to exercise his right with a proper reference to the rights of the other, but an interference by one with the other in the exercise of his right did not confer upon the other the right to disregard the proper mode of using the street. The right to do an act does not authorize a person to do it carelessly. If the defendant improperly blocked the street, or allowed its train to remain upon the crossing for an unreasonable length of time, the deceased was not for that reason authorized to incur unnecessary risk, or to act negligently in seeking to cross the street, but was still required to exercise such prudence as would ordinarily be required of one seeking to pass between the cars of a standing train, which was liable to move at any moment. An attempt to pass between the cars of a train that is liable to move at any instant, without taking any precaution to avoid danger, is itself an act of negligence, when decided by the standard of common prudence, and has been so held by courts whenever the occasion has been presented; and the act is equally negligent whether it is done at a street crossing or elsewhere. "The fact that a train of cars is unlawfully blocking a crossing is no reason why a person should throw himself under the wheels, or recklessly expose himself to danger. He is bound, notwithstanding such acts of negligence, to exercise proper care and prudence; and, if he fails to do so, he cannot hold another responsible for an injury which may be fairly traced to his own negligence." Lewis v. Railroad Co., 38 Md. 588. In Railroad Co. v. Copeland, 61 Ala. 376, under a state of facts greatly resembling those in the present case, the court said: "The attempt thus to pass between the cars of a train, which he must have known was liable to be moved, cannot be classed as less than negligence. It borders on recklessness." In Hudson v. Railway Co., 123 Mo. 445, 27 S. W. 717, the plaintiff attempted to climb over and between two flat cars which had obstructed the crossing of a public street for a longer time than was permitted by the municipal ordinance on the subject, and was injured by the sudden moving of the train without any warning or signal. The court said: "In climbing over the cars, he put his feet in such a position that they were bound to be caught if the cars moved. He knew at the time that the cars had been standing there longer than was permitted by the ordinance. They were likely to move at any time, and should have moved before that time. In getting over the cars in the way plaintiff attempted to do, he must be held to have taken the obvious risks involved in that act." In Railroad Co. v. Finchin, 112

Ind. 592, 13 N. E. 677, the plaintiff was injured while passing between two cars forming a part of a freight train standing across a public street. The court said: "A person who has knowledge that a train of cars is stopping temporarily at a way station on its way to its destination has no right to assume the risk of passing between the cars. It is a danger so immediate and so great that he must not incur it. * * * In this case the risk of passing between a train of cars, likely to get under way at any moment, was such as no one could assume without being guilty of negligence. This is one of the cases where it must be declared, as matter of law, that the risk is so great that no one who has a knowledge of the danger has a right to assume it." The same principle is sustained in Andrews v. Railroad Co., 86 Ga. 192, 12 S. E. 213; Pannell v. Railroad Co., 97 Ala. 298, 12 South. 236; Magoon v. Railroad Co., 67 Vt. 177, 31 Atl. 156; Corcoran v. Railway Co., 105 Mo. 399, 16 S. W. 411; Wallace v. Railroad Co., 165 Mass. 236, 42 N. E. 1125; O'Mara v. Canal Co., 18 Hun, 192; Howard v. Railroad Co., 41 Kan. 403, 21 Pac. 267.

The fact that the deceased was only about 12 years of age did not require the court to submit to the jury whether his attempt to cross the street between the cars constituted negligence. Negligence is the want of such care as a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under the circumstances of the case. When the facts are clear and undisputed, and when no other inference than that of negligence can be drawn from them, the court is not required to submit the question to the jury, but may itself make the inference. Nagle v. Railroad Co., 88 Cal. 86, 25 Pac. 1106. The court may also determine whether an act is such as would be performed by a person of ordinary prudence, or whether, in the common judgment of mankind, it would be deemed dangerous or attended with peril. The same act which would be negligence in an adult may not be such if done by a child, but a child is required to exercise the same degree of care that would be expected from children of his age, or which children of his age ordinarily exercise (State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 24 Md. 84; Collins v. Railroad Co., 142 Mass. 301, 7 N. E. 856); and the court is as fully authorized as a jury to determine what this degree of care is. Children, as well as adults, should use the prudence and discretion which persons of their years ordinarily have, and they cannot be permitted with impunity to indulge in conduct which they know, or ought to know, to be careless. "The law imposes upon minors the duty of giving such attention to their surroundings, and care to avoid danger, as may fairly and reasonably be expected from persons of their age and capacity." Merryman v. Railroad Co., 85 Iowa, 635, 52 N. W. 545. In the present case the capacity and intelligence of the child are not controverted, and he must be presumed to have had all the qualities ordinarily belonging to a person of his age.

The failure of the defendant to give notice that the train was about to start is not available to the plaintiff. This was not the proximate cause of the injury, as might have been the case had the deceased sought to cross the street directly in front of the locomotive, or at the rear of the train. As was said in O'Mara v. Canal Co., supra: "The injury could not have occurred except for plaintiff's act in undertaking to climb over the train between the cars. It was for the court to determine whether that was negligence which contributed to the injury; and, as other courts have said, no one could doubt it was. Nor is it of importance that defendant was guilty of wrong or negligence in blocking up the way, or in starting its train suddenly and without notice. The defendant is not liable for the injury sustained by plaintiff unless it occurred solely by its fault and negligence, and not in any degree through the fault or negligence of the plaintiff." See, also, Railroad Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 697; Railroad Co. v. Copeland, 61 Ala. 376. The judgment is affirmed.

MOODY v. NEWMARK et al. (L. A. 328.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1898.)

PLEDGES—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF PLEDGEE—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY—PARTNERSHIP—DRAFTS —PLEADING—FINDINGS—INCONSISTENCY.

1. The buyer of property having pledged it, an agreement of the pledgee with the seller that he would not redeliver the property until the balance of the price should be paid was void, as an agreement not to perform the obligation due the pledgor, of delivering up the property on payment of the charge against it.

2. A complaint on a draft payable out of a special fund, which failed to show the existence of such fund, was insufficient.

3. A complaint on a draft payable out of a certain fund averred that the fund was $8,521; that, after payment of a prior claim of $8,000, one-third of the surplus was applicable to plaintiff's demand; and that such surplus amounted to $1,900. The court found the amounts as alleged, and that plaintiff had been paid $183. Held, that the findings were inconsistent, and would not support a judgment for plaintiff.

4. A sale of partnership property was made by one of three partners nominally in his own right. The buyer pledged it. The selling partner drew an order on the pledgee, directing him to pay a second partner one-third of the amount collectible on the price, less the amount of the loan. This order was accepted. The pledgor became insolvent, and the property deteriorated in value so that it was worth no more than the charge against it, and the pledgee redelivered it to the buyer on repayment of the loan. Held, that he was not liable on the draft.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by A. S. Moody against Newmark & Edwards and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff against defendants Newmark & Edwards, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, they appeal. Reversed. For commissioners' decision, see 50 Pac. 758.

J. T. Hout, for appellants. E. Edgar Galbreth, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to recover from Newmark & Edwards, as partners, money alleged to be due upon a certain order drawn upon the firm by one J. S. Robinson. It is alleged that on the 24th day of September, 1894, J. S. Robinson was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $543.09, and on that day drew and delivered to plaintiff his written order or draft, reading as follows: "Los Angeles, Cal., Sept. 24, 1894. To Newmark & Edwards, Los Angeles—Gents: Please pay to A. S. Moody, or order, the sum of five hundred and forty-three & <sup>09</sup>/<sub>100</sub> dollars—to be paid as equity is collected from wheat now in Puente warehouse sold last May 19th to J. V. Suman, Colton, viz., after the amount borrowed on wheat has been paid, the amount collected over & above such loan, you to pay Mr. A. S. Moody (<sup>1</sup>/<sub>3</sub>) one-third of all such amounts until said amount of five hundred and forty-three & <sup>09</sup>/<sub>100</sub> dollars is fully paid. Amount of wheat on hand this day 6,348 sax, 831,325 lbs. J. S. Robinson." The order was on the same day accepted by Newmark & Edwards. Before suit was brought there had been paid on the order $183.25. At that time there was stored in a certain warehouse a quantity of wheat which had been sold by Robinson to one Suman for $8,521.08; and Newmark & Edwards were authorized and empowered by said Robinson, and undertook, to collect from Suman the price of said wheat. It is charged that, subsequent to the acceptance of the order, Newmark & Edwards permitted Suman to remove all of the wheat, and "received, or should have received, payment in full of the said purchase price for the same at or before said removal of said wheat, which said purchase price amounted to more than $2,000, as equity, as mentioned in said order or draft, after the amount borrowed on said wheat had been fully paid." "And it was understood between plaintiff and defendants that the defendants were not to authorize, suffer, nor permit said Suman to remove said wheat, or any part or portion thereof, unless the purchase price was paid by said Suman at or before the time of such removal." The "equity" which was to be collected is not explained, except in the recital above quoted, as "equity" after the amount borrowed had been repaid. There is no allegation that any amount had been borrowed, or that the wheat had been pledged as security for any sum whatever. Of course, it is absurd to speak of collecting an equity, and in legal phraseology no meaning appropriate to anything involved in this case can be given to the term. No equity is averred, and there probably was none to aver. But doubtless the parties had reference to some surplus which might remain after some charge upon the wheat had been satisfied. But there is not shown that there was any such charge. Much less is it shown that there was or would be a possible surplus after the charge hinted at had been paid. Nor does it appear what Robinson or plaintiff had to do with the wheat after it had been sold and delivered to Suman. It is not shown that anything remained due Robinson on account of the wheat, and certainly not that Robinson retained a lien upon it, or any right to demand payment to him of any money as a condition of its being delivered to Suman by the pledgee. Suman was plainly entitled to have all the wheat delivered to him as soon as he paid the charge upon it, and an agreement on the part of Newmark & Edwards with either Robinson or plaintiff not to do so was void as against public policy. It was an agreement not to perform their obligation to Suman. Newmark & Edwards undertook to pay the order out of a special fund. It is not otherwise shown, than by a conclusion of law which is based upon no facts stated, that such a fund ever existed. If the allegation can be regarded as of a fact, it must be held to mean that Newmark & Edwards delivered the wheat to Suman without collecting the price. That there was a price to be collected, as I have already stated, is not averred, but may be implied from this allegation now under consideration. Such a mode of pleading cannot stand before a special demurrer, and such a demurrer was interposed in this case. But, had all these allegations been found in the complaint, still it does not appear that Newmark & Edwards are answerable for the fact that no such fund was created. Under the allegations, they were bound to deliver the wheat when the charge upon it was paid, and it does not appear that Robinson or plaintiff had any claim upon it. They cannot be held responsible for not doing what they were under no legal obligations to do. The demurrer should have been sustained. In the complaint it is averred that the price of the wheat amounted to $8,521.08. That is, in effect, also the statement in the order sued upon. Such is also the finding; and it is also found that the wheat was pledged to Newmark & Edwards to secure the sum of $8,000 loaned by them to Suman, together with interest, charges, and costs. The interest, charges, and costs cannot be made out from the record; but, if there were none, there could have been only $521.08 collected as "equity," had the whole price been collected. By the terms of the order, Newmark & Edwards were required to pay one-third of this to plaintiff. It affirmatively appears, therefore, from the complaint, that the entire fund which could have existed, applicable to his debt, has been paid to him; and it is also found that defendants have paid to plaintiff one-third of the money received in excess of their loan to Suman. In another finding it is found that said defendants delivered the wheat to Suman, and should have received the full price, "and which purchase price amounted to $1,900 more than $2,000 as equity mentioned in said order or draft." Supposing this to mean that the price, if received, would have amounted to $1,900 more than the debt to defendants, it is still utterly irreconcilable with the allegations of the complaint and with the other findings. No one can discover from the record how such a finding can be true. The amount of the wheat and its price are twice stated in the complaint. These correspond with each other, and with the other findings upon the subject. There is no controversy whatever as to the amount of the debt. But, where two findings upon an essential fact are so opposed to each other, the findings cannot support the judgment.

But suppose we overlook the manifold defects in the complaint, and assume that the finding is that there would have been a surplus of $1,900 if the full price had been collected, and, further (as is neither alleged nor found), that the wheat was held also to secure a balance of the price due Robinson; still plaintiff cannot recover. A brief summary of the facts found may be thus stated: The wheat in question was raised by defendant Robinson and another as partners. May 19, 1894, Robinson, with the knowledge and consent of the other joint owners, sold and delivered the wheat to Suman at the price of $1.025 per cental. Suman then borrowed upon the wheat, which was in a warehouse, $8,000, payable, with interest, costs, and charges within 90 days. The terms of the chattel mortgage provided that, if the wheat deteriorated in quality or depreciated in price, Suman would correspondingly reduce the debt or increase the security, and in case Suman failed to do so the note should become immediately due; and Newmark & Edwards were authorized to sell or buy or dispose of the wheat without previous notice to Suman. It is found that the wheat did depreciate in value and in quality, and then, with the knowledge and consent of Robinson, from whom Suman had purchased, an arrangement was made by which defendant took a portion of the wheat in payment. It is distinctly found that at the time the wheat was not worth more than sufficient to pay the loan made by defendants, and has not been of any greater value since. Since the wheat had ceased to furnish security, defendants had a right to sell it for their debt, and with the consent of Robinson, which they had, could surrender the wheat to Suman upon receiving payment or other security. It further appears from the findings that the turning over of the wheat to defendants, and the loan made on it, was a partnership affair, and the order sued upon was given merely to show that plaintiff should receive one-third of any amount would be coming to the partnership. Naturally the partnership should lose, and not these defendants, if Suman became insolvent, and the wheat deteriorated to such an extent that it would not pay. It was through an arrangement with the partnership, and not primarily with appellants, that Suman was permitted to hold the wheat until required in his mill. They received the $8,000 loaned, and it is found that it was worth no more. Neither the law nor equity required that the defendants should make up to them their losses. The judgment and order are reversed.

SEYMOUR v. McAVOY et al. (S. F. 546.)<sup>1</sup>
(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1898.)

CREDITORS' SUITS—PARTIES—TRUSTS—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS OF BENEFICIARY—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—CONCLUSIVENESS.

1. Where a judgment creditor sues to subject equitable assets to his judgment, defendants cannot require other judgment creditors to be brought in as parties, inasmuch as a creditor commencing such action acquires an equitable lien on such assets, and a priority over other judgment creditors who have not previously commenced any such suit.

2. The author of a trust to pay to another the income of property may at common law provide that the interest of the beneficiary shall not be subject to the claims of his creditors, and such provision need not be express, but may be implied from the terms of the trust in the light of all the circumstances.

3. Testator devised his entire property in trust—First, to provide out of one-half of the income for the support and maintenance of the widow, and out of the other half the support and education of two daughters; second, to accumulate the surplus income; third, to transfer to each of his daughters on her marriage one-fourth of the estate, with one-fourth of the accumulations of the income; and, fourth, on the death of the widow, to transfer to each of the daughters, or her children in case of her decease, one-fourth of the trust property, with one-fourth the accumulations of the income. Held, that no creditor of the widow or of an unmarried daughter could subject her interest in the property, the income, or the surplus thereof to his judgment.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1666, providing that a decree of distribution is conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees; and section 1908, providing that a judgment in the probate of a will or the administration of a decedent's estate is conclusive on the will or the administration,—the invalidity of a trust provision in a will cannot be urged by a creditor of the beneficiary after decree of distribution.

Temple, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Helena Seymour against Margaret McAvoy and others to subject the interest of certain defendants in certain trust property to the satisfaction of a judgment held by her against them. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appealed. Reversed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellants. Wickliffe Matthews and D. E. Alexander, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. On the 1st day of January, 1869, William McAvoy died, leaving, surviving him, his widow, the defendant Margaret, and two minor children, the defendants Emma and Della. He left a will, which was admitted to probate on the 22d day of January, 1869, by the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, of which the material portions are as follows: "Item. I give, devise, and bequeath all my property, of every name, nature, and kind, to my executors aforesaid, in trust to manage and control the same, and to keep the same invested for the following purposes: (1) To provide out of the income thereof for the comfortable support and maintenance of my beloved wife (it being my desire and wish that she shall convey and release to said executors all her interest in my estate and in the community property, and, upon her doing so, she is to be provided with such support and maintenance) as one-half of such income will provide. (2) To provide out of said income for the support and education of my two daughters. * * * (4) To accumulate such income until the death of my beloved wife, or until one or both of my said daughters shall marry. Upon the marriage of either daughter, to make over to her, as her separate estate, one-fourth of the estate then in the hands of said trustees; and, upon the marriage of the other daughter, to make over a like proportion; and, upon the death of my beloved wife, to transfer and make over a like residue of the estate to my said daughters, share and share alike, or the children of the one which may die before her said mother's death." On January 11, 1869, the defendant Margaret, in pursuance of the request expressed in the will, conveyed to the executors all her interest in the property in trust to carry out the provisions of said will. The court found, however, that William McAvoy died seised in fee of the property in question; and it follows that the defendant Margaret had no interest in the property except such, if any, as she may have derived under the will. On July 21, 1876, a decree of final distribution was entered, by which the property was distributed to the trustees named in the will (of whom the defendant Byrne is now the sole survivor), to have, hold, and dispose of in accordance with the terms and provisions of said will. On April 27, 1887, the defendant Della married; and the trustee thereupon conveyed to her one undivided fourth of said property, in accordance with the terms of the will. Both of said daughters were of full age at the time of the recovery of plaintiff's judgment, hereinafter mentioned, and their education had been completed. On September 27, 1893, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendants Margaret and

Emma for upward of $3,000, on which an execution was issued, and returned wholly unsatisfied. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action against the trustee and the beneficiaries under the will, to subject the interest of the defendants Margaret and Emma in the trust property to the satisfaction of her judgment. The court found that the sum of $100 per month was sufficient for the support and maintenance of each of the defendants Margaret and Emma, and gave judgment directing the trustee to pay to each of said defendants, out of three-fourths of the net income of the property, the sum of $100 per month, and to pay the whole of the residue of said three-fourths to the plaintiff in satisfaction of her judgment. On the trial it was shown that certain third persons were creditors of said defendants Margaret and Emma, and that some of them had reduced their debts to judgment; and the defendant Byrne moved to have said persons brought in as parties to this action, which motion was denied by the court.

1. A judgment creditor, by filing a bill in equity to subject equitable assets to the payment of his judgment, acquires an equitable lien on such assets and a priority over any other creditor who has not already filed such a bill. Other judgment creditors who have not filed such a bill are therefore not necessary parties to the action, and their presence is not necessary for the protection of the defendants. The court therefore did not err in refusing to bring in as parties other judgment creditors who had not themselves commenced any such suit.

2. The only question of importance in the case is whether the defendants Margaret and Emma have any interest in the property or income in question, which can be subjected to the claims of their creditors. We think it clear that they have no such interest. It must be noticed at the outset that the provisions of the Civil Code cannot affect this case. The estate of the trustee and the rights of the beneficiaries vested on the death of the testator in 1869, and the Code is not and could not constitutionally be retroactive, so as to divest any of their rights. As there was not at the testator's death any statute in force in this state on the subject, this case must be decided in accordance with the rules of the common law; and, in ascertaining those rules, we may look as well to the decisions in other states of this Union possessing the common law, as to those of the English courts. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 384, 385, 10 Pac. 674.

By the great weight of authority in America, it is settled that the author of a trust to pay to or apply for the benefit of another the income of property, or a portion of such income, may lawfully provide that the interest of the beneficiary shall not be assignable, or shall not be subject to the claims of his creditors. Out of the many decisions to this effect, we may refer to Nichols v. Eaton, 91

U. S. 716, 725; Stelb v. Whitehead, 111 Ill. 247; Bank v. Adams, 133 Mass. 170; Roberts v. Stevens, 84 Me. 325, 331, 24 Atl. 873; Lampert v. Laydel, 96 Mo. 439, 446, 9 S. W. 780; Jourolmon v. Massengill, 86 Tenn. 81, 100, 5 S. W. 719; Garland v. Garland, 87 Va. 758, 13 S. E. 478; Ooerman's Appeal, 88 Pa. St. 276, 284; Grange Agency v. Lee, 72 Md. 161, 19 Atl. 648; Wallace v. Campbell, 53 Tex. 229; Wales' Adm'r v. Bowdish's Ex'r, 61 Vt. 27, 17 Atl. 1000. It is also well settled in the jurisdictions where this doctrine prevails that such provision need not be express, but may be implied from the general intention of the donor, to be gathered from the terms of the trust, in the light of all the circumstances. Baker v. Brown, 146 Mass. 369, 15 N. E. 783; Pope's Ex'rs v. Elliott, 8 B. Mon. 56; and Roberts v. Stevens, and Wales' Adm'r v. Bowdish's Ex'r, supra. The decisions in England and in some of the American states limit this doctrine to cases where there is an express provision for a cesser or limitation of the estate upon any alienation, or upon bankruptcy, levy of execution, or the like. But we think that the rule established by the decisions we have cited is more consonant with the rules of law and with the principles of reason. Alienability is not an essential attribute of an equitable life estate in property; and there is nothing in the policy of the law prohibiting a donor from providing that his bounty shall be enjoyed only by those to whom he intends to extend it, and that property devoted by him to a trust otherwise valid shall not be diverted from its appointed destination.

The will in question does not, in terms, provide that the interest of the beneficiaries shall not be subject to the claims of their creditors, but its provisions lead to that result by an implication equally strong. By the legal effect of this instrument the entire property is devised to the executors in trust—First, to provide out of one-half of the income thereof for the comfortable support and maintenance of the testator's widow, and to provide out of said income for the support and education of his two daughters; second, to accumulate the surplus of one-half of said income after providing for the support and maintenance of the widow until her death, and to accumulate the remaining half thereof after providing for the support and education of the daughters (one-half of said half until one of the daughters should marry, and the other half of said half until the other daughter should marry); third, to transfer to each of the daughters, upon her marriage, one-fourth of the trust property, with one-half of the accumulations of one-half of the income; and, fourth, upon the death of the widow to transfer to each of the daughters, or to the children of either of them deceased at that time, one-fourth of the trust property, with one-half of the accumulations of the other half of the income. Under these provisions the only right of the widow is to have the trustee support her during her life out of one-half of the income; and the only right of the defendant Emma, until her marriage, is to have a like support out of one-fourth of the income. No sums whatever are directed to be paid to either of them during those periods, but the trustee is himself to expend the money for their support. Of course, therefore, no creditor could take any part of the income so appropriated for their support without entirely defeating the provision for that purpose. It is plain, therefore, that under no circumstances can any creditor of the defendant Margaret take any portion of this property; for she has no interest in it, present or prospective, except the right to be supported during her life, which right could not be reached by a creditor without defeating the trust. Johnston v. Zane's Trustees, 11 Grat. 552, 569. Nor does the creditor of defendant Emma stand in any better position. Besides her right to a support, which, for the reasons shown, cannot be impaired, the only interests she has are a right to one-fourth of the property contingent upon her marriage, and a right to another fourth thereof contingent upon her surviving her mother. Until those events occur the trustee must continue to accumulate the surplus income, for neither of them may ever occur; and, if they do not occur, the accumulation, as well as the corresponding share of the corpus of the property, will belong to some other person. No part of this surplus can therefore be taken by a creditor without defeating the trust for accumulation. An express provision in the will restraining alienation, voluntary or involuntary, would therefore have been no stronger than the necessary implication derived from the purposes to which the property is directed to be applied.

We have not been referred to any rule of law as it stood before the enactment of the Code which is contravened by any provision in this will, and we cannot see any infirmity in any of those provisions. They would be valid even under the English rule (Chambers v. Smith, 3 App. Cas. 795); and, even if they had been for any reason invalid, such invalidity could not now defeat the will, for the decree of distribution is conclusive of the validity of all of its provisions. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1666, 1908; William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 48 Pac. 323; Greenwood v. Murray, 26 Minn. 259, 2 N. W. 945. It follows that the plaintiff is not entitled to subject the property in question to her judgment.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the other questions argued, and, as the facts appear on the face of the findings, no new trial will be required. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to set aside its conclusions of law, and to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of the defendants.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; McFARLAND, J.

TEMPLE, J. I dissent. If it be held that the case is not governed by the code provision, then the rule of the common law must prevail. At common law these so-called "spendthrift trusts" were held invalid; the rule being, as was expressed in Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. 429: "Certainly no man shall have an estate to live on, but not an estate to pay his debts with. Certainly property available for the purposes of pleasure or profit shall be also amenable to the demands of justice." It is said that the American rule of decision is in favor of the validity of such trusts. I doubt this. Certainly in many states the English rule has been approved. In some the matter is controlled by statute. See, 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 10. In Nichol v. Levy, 5 Wall. 441, it is said: "It is a settled rule of law that the beneficial interest of the cestui que trust, whatever it may be, is liable for the payment of his debts. It cannot be so fenced about by inhibitions and restrictions as to secure it the inconsistent characteristics of right and enjoyment to the beneficiary, and immunity from his creditors," etc. Such estates are contrary to the policy of our laws, which provide means of subjecting the property of all to the satisfaction of their obligations. Such trusts enable one by his own act to make property exempt from execution, and violate our ideas of equality and fair play. If there is a conflict in the authorities, and we are free to choose, I think the English rule by far most conformable to justice and good policy. I think, also, that the opinion is at variance with the very recent decision in Re Cavarlay's Estate (Cal.) 51 Pac. 629.

CLAIM AND DELIVERY—COMPLAINT.

A complaint in an action in claim and delivery, alleging plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of goods on November 14, 1895, and that on June 2, 1896, plaintiff demanded possession of defendant, is insufficient; plaintiff's ownership or right to possession subsequent to said November 14th not being alleged, though it is alleged that "defendant still unlawfully withholds and detains" them.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by Augusta Truman against John W. Young. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank P. Flint, Wm. P. Jones, and Flint & Barber, for appellant. A. B. Hotchkiss, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action in claim and delivery, for the recovery of a certain diamond. Findings and judgment were for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state sufficient facts. The court overruled the demurrer. It should have been sustained. The complaint alleges "that on the 14th day of November, 1895, said plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the following goods and chattels" (describing them); that their value is $350; "that the defendant, without the consent of the plaintiff, now detains said goods and chattels from the possession of said plaintiff"; that on June 2, 1896, plaintiff demanded possession, and that defendant refused to deliver them; "that said defendant still unlawfully withholds and detains said goods and chattels from the possession of the plaintiff, to her damage," etc. The complaint was filed June 5, 1896. There is no allegation that the plaintiff was the owner at any time after November 14, 1895, or of any fact showing that she was entitled to the possession after that date. The defendant might detain the property without her consent, though she had no right whatever to its possession; and so the fact that a demand was made does not show either a general or special ownership, or any right to the possession. Respondent contends, however, that there was an allegation of ownership on November 14, 1895, and that the allegation that "defendant still unlawfully withholds and detains said goods and chattels" implies a continued ownership, and cites Williams v. Ashe, 111 Cal. 188, 43 Pac. 595. In that case the allegation was that "on and after" a certain day he was the owner and in possession, etc., and this, it was said, implied a continued ownership or right of action. The complaint in this case is not distinguishable from the complaint in Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 659, 33 Pac. 750, in which, also, there was the allegation here made, that "defendant still unlawfully withholds possession," etc. See, also, Affierbach v. McGovern, 79 Cal. 268, 21 Pac. 837; and Holly v. Heiskell, 112 Cal. 174, 44 Pac. 466. The judgment must therefore be reversed. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to examine the question made by the motion for nonsuit, or as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings. The judgment and order should be reversed, with leave to the plaintiff to amend her complaint.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, with leave to the plaintiff to amend her complaint.

PRICE v. SPENCER. (S. F. 1,068.)*LAYSON v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1898.)

DECEIT—EVIDENCE—VALUE OF STOCK.

Evidence of the intrinsic value of stock is not admissible in an action for false representations as to value thereof; it having a well-known and fixed market value, and the inquiry having been as to this.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; Stanton L. Carter, Judge.

Two actions against L. A. Spencer,—one by Fannie Price, and the other by M. A. Layson. From adverse judgments, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Layson, for appellants. F. H. Short, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. An appeal was taken in both of the above-entitled causes upon the same record, and it is stipulated, in substance, that they embody the same pleadings, facts, and questions of law, and that "the judgment or order of the supreme court in said case of Price v. Spencer shall be the judgment and order made in the case of Layson v. Spencer," etc. Under this stipulation, we shall omit all further mention herein of the case of Layson v. Spencer, and confine ourselves to the case of Fannie Price v. L. A. Spencer, subject only to a final disposition of the two cases. The complaint charges in substance:

(1) That in April and May, 1893, defendant undertook, as the agent of plaintiff, to purchase for her some shares of the capital stock of the Fresno Loan & Savings Bank, a corporation. (2) Defendant was an officer, to wit, teller, in said bank, and well knew the value of the stock thereof, but the value thereof was unknown to plaintiff. (3) To induce plaintiff to purchase said stock, defendant falsely represented to plaintiff that the stock was worth from $129 to $130 per share, and was paying, and would pay, semiannual dividends of $6 per share. That defendant professed to know an old man in San Francisco who would sell a few shares of the stock at $112 per share, which he said was very cheap. That plaintiff, relying upon these representations, requested defendant to purchase for her five shares at $112, and forwarded to him $560 therefor. That defendant retained the money, and fraudulently transferred to her, on the books of the corporation, five shares of the capital stock belonging to himself, all of which he concealed from plaintiff. (4) Since January, 1893, the bank has paid no dividends. When the stock was transferred to plaintiff, it was, as defendant well knew, worth no more than $65 per share. (5) Plaintiff did not know until November, 1894, that the stock was the property of defendant; and she immediately gave notice of the rescission of the contract, offered to return the stock, and demanded a return of her money, all of which was refused by defendant. (6) All of defendant's representations were false, and made to deceive, and did deceive, plaintiff.

There is another cause of action, stated in like words, showing that plaintiff, under like circumstances, purchased three other shares of the same capital stock at the same price.

Plaintiff prays for a decree adjudging the sale to be rescinded; that defendant holds in trust for plaintiff $896; that he pay the same over, with interest; and for costs.

The answer denies that the defendant undertook, as agent or otherwise, to purchase for plaintiff any shares of the capital stock of the Fresno Loan & Savings Bank; avers that he did, at the request of W. H. Layson, the attorney of plaintiff, procure from one Harvey Phinney five shares of said stock, and caused them to be transferred to plaintiff, for which she paid $112 per share. He denies that he was ever the owner of the stock, or had any interest therein, except that he purchased the same for $110 per share only when he found a purchaser therefor at $112 per share, and that the stock was thereupon transferred from Harvey Phinney directly to plaintiff, and that the interest of the defendant therein was but the $2 per share which he retained. Without further particularity, it may be said the answer denies all the allegations of fraud, and the facts upon which the same are predicated. The answer to the second cause of action proceeds upon the same lines as that to the first. The findings of the court negatived all the charges of false or fraudulent representations by defendant, alleged to have induced the purchase of the stock by the plaintiff; found that the defendant was not the owner of the stock purchased by plaintiff, but that he purchased the same, as the agent of plaintiff, at $110 per share, and charged her $112 per share, retaining to his own use the difference of $2 per share, amounting in the case of plaintiff to $16, which sum defendant held in trust for the plaintiff; and the latter had judgment for said sum of $16, and for her costs of suit.

The testimony in the case was sharply contradictory upon most of the issues, and, by all the precedents, the findings of the court below in such a case are conclusive here. Counsel for the appellant argues his case mainly from the standpoint of plaintiff's testimony, rather than from a review of the whole case as made. Assuming his alleged facts as established, little difficulty would be experienced in reaching his conclusions. This we may not do, in the face of the record. Defendant admits in his answer, substantially, that he did, at the request of plaintiff, receive from one Harvey Phinney the stock in question, for which the plaintiff paid, and that he retained to himself $2 per share. This constituted him, pro tanto, the agent of the plaintiff. According to the findings of the court, this retention of $2 per share constituted the whole of defendant's offending. Appellant, however, contends that the evidence shows that defendant was the owner of the stock, and sold the same to plaintiff, concealing the fact of such ownership, etc. It is true that there was some evidence tending to show, if taken by itself, that defendant owned the stock. But, in the interpretation which appellant places upon it, it proves too much for her case. The agent of plaintiff was W. H. Layson, her brother. In the spring of 1893 he visited Fresno, in quest of an opportunity to invest some money for his two sisters, the plaintiffs in the two cases; called upon defendant, the teller of the bank aforementioned, with whom he had a conversation in reference to the bank and its stock; learned from defendant that a man had some of the stock for sale. Layson, on the 7th of May, wrote defendant, asking: "Is the stock you spoke to me about still for sale, or part thereof? What a price? I have forgotten." On the 8th day of May, defendant answered in part, as follows: "I have still twenty-seven shares on hand. * * * Can sell at same price as offered you ($112 per share) if sold at once." Later in May, Layson wrote the Fresno Savings Bank as follows: "Inclosed find draft for $896. Buy L. A. Spencer eight shares of Fresno Savings & Loan Bank stock,—five shares for Fannie Price, three shares for M. A. Layson,—not exceeding $112 per share. What does stock sell for in the market? [Signed] Layson." The draft was payable to the bank. On receipt by the bank of this letter and draft, defendant went to Harvey Phinney, who had previously offered to sell stock at $110, took him to the bank, where eight shares were transferred from Phinney to Fannie Price and M. A. Layson, as directed by their agent, W. H. Layson, and the certificates forwarded to their agent, W. H. Layson, in the name of the bank; the actions, however, being formulated in the name of the bank by its teller, the defendant. On the 17th of June the bank received a like order from Layson for three shares, which were procured by the defendant from Phinney, through his agent, one Frank Laning, and transferred directly to plaintiff herein, as in the former case. In 1894 plaintiff ascertained that defendant had purchased the stock at $110 per share, and demanded of him the $2 per share which he had overcharged them. In response, defendant replied that: "I sold the stock to you fairly. Now, after I tell you that, practically, and, I believe, legally and morally, I owned the stock that I sold to you," etc. We have said that, if this evidence proves that defendant was the owner of the stock, it also proves too much. On their theory, they were informed by him before the purchase that he had the stock for sale, and if they knew this, and ordered it purchased from him, it is not perceived that there was any agency on his part, or that, in the absence of fraud, they had any cause for complaint. On this theory, there is no estoppel that can be urged against defendant. The case of Bank v. Hiatt, 58 Cal. 234, simply holds that a purchaser has a right to rely upon representations of the seller as to facts not within the purchaser's knowledge, and the fact that the purchaser might by inquiry have obtained knowledge of the facts will not relieve the seller from responsibility. In the present case, if the seller was the owner of the stock, his first act in the premises was to inform the plaintiff of that fact. But we need not pursue this inquiry further. The court found that defendant purchased the stock as the agent of plaintiff, and that he was never the owner thereof. This finding is amply supported by the evidence. As before stated, the seller took or caused his stock to be taken to the bank, where it was indorsed and transferred by the bank to the plaintiff; and, as the bank held plaintiff's checks for the purchase price, we may reasonably infer that it paid the sellers. The defendant was the medium through which the transaction was consummated, and the fact that the seller did not know the purchaser is, upon the showing made, a circumstance of little importance. The whole pith of the transaction may be embodied in few words: The bank in question was, as a going concern, a prosperous institution, paying large dividends. Its stock had a well-defined market value at from $110 to $115 per share, and had been much higher. Soon after plaintiff's purchase, there was a bank panic, under the pressure of which it closed its doors for a few days; then opened again, and struggled along until 1895, when, its securities and assets having shrunk greatly, it went into liquidation, and its stock fell to, say, one-half its former price.

Certain testimony was received at the trial in reference to the value of the property belonging to the bank in question, which was afterwards stricken out. This ruling is assigned as error. The only object of such testimony was to show the intrinsic value of the stock. Under some circumstances, such testimony would doubtless be proper. Here, however, the stock was shown to have had a well-known and fixed, though variable, market value. It was as to this market value that plaintiff inquired from defendant and others before making her purchase. It afforded a fixed and certain standard of value, and was the proper criterion of such value. It was not, therefore, error to confine the evidence to such standard.

Numerous other errors in rulings made upon the trial are specified by appellant, most of which we think not well taken, and, as to all others, that a different ruling would not have affected any finding of fact, or justified a different result. I advise that the judgment and order appealed from in each of the above-entitled cases be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from in each of the above-entitled cases are affirmed.

COOLEY v. CALAVERAS COUNTY. (Sac. 458.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1898.)
FEES OF OFFICER—SETTLEMENT—SPLITTING CLAIM —UNCONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

A justice of the peace having presented his claim against the county for fees as per the statute, and had them so allowed and paid, cannot, on the statute being subsequently declared unconstitutional, recover balance of what he would have been entitled to but for the law.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; C. V. Gottschalk, Judge.

Action by John Cooley against the county of Calaveras. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kettle & Hawley, for appellant. John J. Snyder, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Action brought to recover from the county of Calaveras the sum of $561.80, a balance claimed to be due the plaintiff as fees and compensation for services as justice of the peace in and for Angels township, in said county. The defendant had judgment for costs. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and the cause comes up on the judgment roll. The cause was submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of facts. This agreed statement is not set out in the record; hence the facts as found by the court are conclusive. The facts so found are, so far as necessary to the questions involved, as follows: (1) Plaintiff was a justice of the peace in and for the township of Angels, county of Calaveras. (2) As such justice of the peace plaintiff, between April 2, 1895, and December 28, 1896, in pursuance of his judicial duties, heard and determined 155 criminal actions or proceedings on examination or trial properly before him. (3) That as such justice of the peace plaintiff was entitled to receive of and from the defendant county, in each of the said actions or proceedings, the sum of $3, aggregating in all the amount of $465. (4) That prior to the 25th day of February, 1897, and prior to the commencement of this action, plaintiff presented to the board of supervisors of the defendant county his claims in due form, and properly verified by his oath as to their correctness, for each and every of said 155 criminal actions or proceedings tried or examined by him as aforesaid, aggregating in all the sum of $465. (5) The board of supervisors duly passed upon and allowed each and every of said claims for the full amount of fees demanded by plaintiff, to wit, the sum of $3 in each of said actions or proceedings tried, etc., as aforesaid. (6) Each and every of said claims so presented and allowed as aforesaid were by the county treasurer of the defendant county duly paid to plaintiff, and "that a complete settlement between plaintiff and defendant county was had thereon." (7) On the 25th day of February, 1897, the plaintiff, as such justice, filed additional claims in all of said 155 cases, etc., for which he had presented his claims as aforesaid, and which had been allowed and paid as aforesaid, in which he claimed in the same cases as follows: For complaint, $2; issuing warrant, $2; trial of each case, $3; aggregating in each case, $7. In each case plaintiff credited the county with the $3 previously paid him thereon as aforesaid. (8) The board of supervisors rejected said claims. (9) The defendant county is not indebted to defendant in any sum.

Upon the foregoing facts the case may be succinctly stated thus: Under the act of March 28, 1895, entitled "An act to establish the fees of county, township and other officers," etc. (St. 1895, p. 267), it is provided by section 1 that justices of the peace may, for their own use, collect the following fees and no others: "For all services in a criminal action or proceeding, whether on examination or trial, three (3) dollars."

The plaintiff, having performed services in criminal cases subsequent to the passage of this act, presented his claim therefor as therein provided, which was allowed and paid in full as presented. Thereafter, and in January, 1897, this court in Dwyer v. Parker, 115 Cal. 544, 47 Pac. 372, the clause above quoted from the act of 1895 was held unconstitutional for the reasons assigned therein. Subsequent to that decision plaintiff prepared and presented his claim for fees in the same cases as per the fee bill. Subdivision 13, § 200, County Government Act 1893 (St. 1893, p. 491). In this last claim he credited the county defendant with the several amounts previously received in the same cases. The question is, can the plaintiff recover such balance?

The contention of appellant is that the fact that plaintiff claimed and received three dollars in each case from defendant, believing that he was not entitled to receive more, does not preclude him from recovering the balance due him under the county government act of 1893, which authorizes him to demand and receive seven dollars in each case heard and determined by him; that, being entitled to payment from the defendant in full, he is not precluded from enforcing such payment by his mistake in supposing he was only entitled under the act of 1895 to receive three dollars in each case, since the act of 1895 has been declared invalid by this court.

For the purposes of this case we shall assume that plaintiff was originally entitled to the fees as provided by the county government act. Assuming this, however, we still think the question of plaintiff's right to recover on the facts of the present case must be answered in the negative.

1. It is a familiar principle of law that a party having an entire demand cannot split it up into separate causes of action, and this rule applies to claims against counties equally with those against individuals. Zirker v. Hughes, 77 Cal. 235, 19 Pac. 423.

2. There was no mistake as to the fees plaintiff should receive when his services were rendered. The statute of 1895 fixed their amount, and plaintiff settled upon that basis, and no subsequent decision of a court can create a mistake and annul a previous contract which was legal and valid when made. The case of Bank v. Daniels, 12 Pet. 32, illustrates the principle. There a bill in equity was filed to recover money paid as damages for the nonpayment of a bill of exchange, as provided for in a statute of the state of Kentucky. This statute had not, at the date of payment, received a judicial construction. It was subsequently held in other cases that, the bill being payable without the state of Kentucky, the statute did not apply. In discussing the case the supreme court says: "The question is not what the courts have since decided, but whether the parties mistook the law when they believed this bill bore damages. It would be as mischievous as an ex post facto law to permit a subsequent decision to overturn the fair compromises and contracts of individuals made under a different and correct view of the law. But we do not consider this a case of ordinary mistake of a point of law. The agreement was in exact accordance with the general understanding of the law at the time it was made. Two years afterwards the court of appeals, in another case, gave a different construction. The community would be in a miserable condition if at every change of opinion upon questions of law all their previous contracts and settlements were to be overturned. Men could never know the end of their controversies were such a rule to prevail." The court also quoted with approval from the opinion of Chancellor Kent, in Lyon v. Richmond, 2 Johns. Ch. 51, the following: "A subsequent decision of a higher court, in a different case, giving a different exposition to a point of law from the one declared and known when a settlement between parties takes place, cannot have a retrospective effect and overturn such settlement. The courts do not undertake to relieve parties from their acts and deeds fairly done on a full knowledge of facts, though under a mistake of law. Every man is to be charged at his peril with a knowledge of the law. There is no other principle which is safe and practicable in the common intercourse of mankind. And to permit a subsequent judicial decision in any one case on a point of law to open and annul everything that has been done in other cases of a like kind for years before, under a different understanding of the law, would lead to the most mischievous consequences. Fortunately for the peace and happiness of mankind, no such pernicious precedent is to be found. The case is therefore to be decided according to the existing state of things when the settlement in question took place." The understanding of the law prevailing at the time of the settlement of a contract, although erroneous, will govern, and the subsequent settlement of a question of law by judicial decision does not create such a mistake of law as courts will rectify. We recommend that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SAME v. MORE et al. (S. F. 1,104.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1898.)

TIME FOR APPEAL — INTERVENTION — JUDGMENT AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR AFTER REMOVAL.

1. Time for appeal by interveners commences to run from time complaint in intervention is stricken out for want of interest, not from time of judgment between original parties.

2. Judgment against one as administrator is invalid, he having been removed after submission of the cause, but before judgment, notwithstanding pendency of his appeal from order of removal. It may, however, be entered against him nunc pro tunc, as of the date of submission.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by H. Clifford More, administrator of Lawrence W. More, deceased, against John F. More, administrator of Alexander P. More, deceased. Eliza M. Miller, afterwards made special administratrix of Alexander P. More, deceased, and C. A. Baldwin, intervened.

From order dismissing complaint in intervention, and from judgment for plaintiff against original defendant, interveners appeal. From order vacating said judgment, plaintiff appeals. Interveners' appeal dismissed. Order affirmed on plaintiff's appeal.

Whitcomb & Boyle, for plaintiff. Thos. McNulta, A. G. Eells, and J. B. Mhoon, for interveners.

BELCHER, C. H. Clifford More, as administrator of the estate of Lawrence W. More, deceased, duly presented to John F. More, as administrator of the estate of Alexander P. More, deceased, a claim for allowance, amounting to the sum of $13,670.14. The claim was at first allowed in part by the administrator and the probate judge, but thereafter the allowance was revoked and recalled by both the administrator and the judge, and the claim entirely rejected. Thereupon this action was brought to establish the claim, as provided in section 1498 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant administrator answered the complaint, and within proper time Eliza M. Miller and C. A. Baldwin, by leave of the court, filed a complaint in intervention, alleging that Alexander P. More died intestate on October 21, 1893, leaving an estate, consisting principally of land, of the value of more than $500,000; that the interveners were sisters of the decedent and his heirs at law, and upon his death became, and ever since had been, seised in fee and possessed of the said landed estate; and denying that any sum of money whatever was due or owing from the said estate to the plaintiff. Subsequently, on motion of the attorney for the plaintiff, the court made an order "that the order made herein allowing said Baldwin and Miller to file their complaint in intervention be, and hereby is, vacated and set aside, and that said complaint be, and hereby is, stricken out and dismissed." This order was based upon the ground that it did not appear that the interveners had any interest in the matter in litigation in said action, or in the success of either of the parties thereto, or an interest against both. It was dated October 31, 1895, and a copy thereof was served on the attorney for the interveners on November 5, 1895. The case was afterwards tried, and on May 29, 1896, submitted for decision. On December 16, 1896, findings were filed, and on January 15, 1897, judgment thereon was entered that the plaintiff "do have and recover from said John F. More, as the administrator of the estate of Alexander P. More, deceased, or his successor as administrator of said estate," the sum set forth in his rejected claim and demanded in his complaint, with interest and costs of suit. From this judgment and the order dismissing their complaint in intervention the interveners served and filed notice of appeal on February 15, 1897, being the appeal designated No. 897. Thereafter, on April 2, 1897, the attorneys for John F. More, as administrator, and for Eliza M. Miller, as special administratrix, of the estate of A. P. More, deceased, after due notice, moved the court to vacate and set aside the said decision and judgment upon the ground that both said decision and judgment were inadvertently and improvidently made by the court, in that they were made and entered against said John F. More, as administrator of the estate of Alexander P. More, deceased, payable in due course of administration, whereas at the time and times when each and both were so made and entered as aforesaid the said John F. More had ceased to be such administrator, his letters of administration having been revoked and annulled by an order of said court duly given and made in the matter of the estate of Alexander P. More on the 21st day of September, 1896. At the hearing of the motion, by agreement by and between the attorneys for the moving parties and the plaintiff, entered upon the minutes of the court, it was admitted "that upon proceedings duly had and taken in the said superior court * * * in the matter of the estate of Alexander P. More, deceased, * * * then and now pending in said superior court, and by orders duly given and made by said court in said matter, the powers of the said administrator of said estate, John F. More, defendant herein, were on the 1st day of June, 1896, suspended until the further order of the said court; that said Eliza M. Miller was on the 4th day of June, 1896, appointed special administratrix of the said estate; and that by an order of the said superior court in said matter, made and dated on the 21st day of September, 1896, it was ordered that the letters of administration issued to the said John F. More by said court, and dated February 12, 1894, be revoked and annulled, and that the said John F. More be restrained from further exercising any of the rights or duties as such administrator; and that said John F. More, as such administrator and individually, thereafter, on the 20th day of November, 1896, duly and regularly took and perfected appeals to the supreme court of the state of California from said order, and from the whole thereof, and that said appeals are now pending and undecided in said supreme court." After the hearing the court, on April 13, 1897, granted the motion, and ordered the said decision and judgment vacated, annulled, and set aside. From this order the plaintiff appealed, the appeal being designated No. 1,104.

1. The only question involved in the first appeal (No. 897), which it is necessary to consider is, was the appeal taken in proper time? As the law stood at that time, an appeal from an appealable order or judgment was required to be taken within one year after the order is made or the judgment entered. Code Civ. Proc. § 939. "Upon an appeal from a judgment the court may review the verdict or decision, and any intermediate order or decision excepted to, which involves the merits or necessarily affects the judgment, except a decision or order from which an appeal might have been taken." Id. § 956. Here the appeal was taken more than a year and three months after the order was made striking out and dismissing the complaint in intervention. That order disposed of the interveners' rights as parties to the suit, and had the force and effect of a judgment against them, and was, in our opinion, appealable. In Stich v. Dickinson, 38 Cal. 608, the appellant filed a complaint in intervention, to which the defendants demurred on the ground that it did not state facts which entitled the intervenor to intervene, inasmuch as it did not show that the intervenor had any interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either of the parties, or against both or all of them. The demurrer was sustained, and a judgment was thereupon entered against the intervenor, from which he appealed. It was claimed by the respondents that the appeal was prematurely taken, there having been no final judgment in the action as between the original parties to it. But it was held that the judgment against the intervenor was final, and that the appeal was properly taken. The judgment was accordingly reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the intervention. And in People v. Pfeiffer, 59 Cal. 89, which was a proceeding for the condemnation of land, the appellant made application for leave to intervene in the proceeding. "The court made an ex parte order permitting him to present and file a complaint in intervention, but subsequently, after filing the complaint, set aside the order, refused to allow him to intervene, and dismissed his complaint. From the judgment of dismissal the appellant took no appeal, as he might have done,"—citing Stich v. Dickinson, supra. After a judgment of condemnation was entered, the appellant appealed from that judgment, but it was held that he was not a party to the action, because his suit to be made a party was rejected, and his appeal was dismissed. The cases cited by appellants, as declaring a different rule, are not in point. They are cases where a pleading, or part of a pleading, of one of the parties to the action had been stricken out on motion; and it was held that the order of the court, not being itself appealable, might be reviewed on appeal from the final judgment. The cases above cited seem to be decisive of the question in hand, and it must, therefore, be held that the appeal from the order striking out the complaint in intervention was not taken within the time allowed for that purpose, and hence cannot be considered on its merits.

2. The question involved in the second appeal (No. 1,104) is, was the judgment rendered against "John F. More, as the administrator of the estate of Alexander P. More, deceased," invalid, he having been removed from his trust, and having ceased to be administrator of the estate some months before the judgment was entered? If it was, there was clearly no error in setting the judgment aside on motion. It has been held in this state that a judgment rendered in favor of or against a party to the action after his death is a nullity, and, although it is not void on its face, it may be set aside on motion. Ewald v. Corbett, 32 Cal. 493; McCreery v. Everding, 44 Cal. 284; Elliott v. Paterson, 65 Cal. 109, 3 Pac. 493. It has also been held in other jurisdictions that where an executor or administrator is removed from his trust he ceases to have any connection with the estate, and no judgment relating to its affairs can be rendered against him. In Wiggin v. Plumer, 31 N. H. 251, it is said, on page 266: "He ceases to be a party to the action on removal from his trust as absolutely as if he were dead, and the action must either be prosecuted against the new representative of the estate or it will be discontinued. * * * When the administrator is displaced, he ceases to have either interest in or power over that estate, and a judgment to reach the estate must be rendered against the party entitled to represent it. The judgment also must be for a sum to be levied of the goods and estate of the deceased in the hands of the defendant administrator, to be administered. Such a judgment cannot be rendered against one who appears by the record not to be administrator." In Bank v. Stanton, 116 Mass. 435, it is said: "Upon her removal from the office of executrix, her liability to and right to defend against this action ceased. It follows that no judgment therein can be rendered against her." In Re Dunham's Estate, 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 162, it is said: "We are of the opinion that the judgment, having been rendered after the cessation of the powers of Mrs. Dunham as executrix, was wholly void as evidencing the existence of a claim against the estate." And in Taylor v. Savage, 1 How. 282, it is said by the supreme court of the United States, Taney, C. J., delivering the opinion: "By his removal from the office of executor he was as completely separated from the business of the estate as if he had been dead, and had no right to appear in or be a party in this or any other court to a suit which the law confined to the representative of the deceased."

It is objected, however, for the appellant that the effect of the order removing More from his trust as administrator was suspended by his appeal therefrom until the final determination of the appeal, and that meantime he continued to be the administrator of the estate; citing In re Moore's Estate, 86 Cal. 72, 24 Pac. 846. That case simply holds that pending an appeal from an order removing an administrator of an estate he is suspended from office, and it is within the power of the court to appoint a special administrator to act during the period of suspension, but not to appoint a general administrator until such order or removal becomes final. It is true that pending the appeal from the order removing More he was only suspended from the office of administrator. But after the removal he ceased to be practically and in effect the administrator of the estate. He could exercise no powers and perform no duties as such. "He was as completely separated from the business of the estate as if he had been dead." The appeal did not revive or in any way restore his powers. "The effect of an appeal from an order setting aside a judgment is not to revive the judgment. The judgment no longer exists, so far as the assertion of any rights under it is concerned, until it shall be brought into force again by a reversal of the order setting it aside. * * * The Code does not provide that an order appealed from shall cease to exist,—be annulled,—but that it cannot be further enforced by a proceeding upon it. Here the revocation of probate and the surcease of appellant's functions as executor became complete eo instanti the order of revocation was entered." In re Crozier's Estate, 65 Cal. 332, 4 Pac. 109. We conclude, therefore, in view of the well-settled rules of law, that after More was removed from his office as administrator no judgment could properly be entered against him as such administrator, and that there was no error in setting the judgment in question aside.

Undoubtedly the judgment might have been, and we think should have been, entered against the defendant nunc pro tunc, as of the date of the submission of the cause for decision; and it may be so entered now, on the going down of the remittitur on this appeal. Fox v. Mining Co., 108 Cal. 478, 41 Pac. 328. We advise that appeal No. 897 be dismissed, and that the order involved in appeal No. 1,104 be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal No. 897 is dismissed, and the order involved in appeal No. 1,104 is affirmed.

PACKWOOD v. BROWNELL. (Sac. 359.)

ELECTIONS—RECEIPT OF VOTES.

1. Receipt of votes during the absence of some of the members of the board of judges does not vitiate the election, the law not requiring all the members to be present during all the time voting is in progress.

2. A statement of contest of election should show how the poll may be purged of illegal votes, the mere fact of receipt thereof being no ground for rejection of the whole vote.

3. The mere fact that the polls are not opened at sunrise, as required by Pol. Code, § 1160, does not invalidate the election, but a delay preventing a full and fair vote must be shown.

Harris and Temple, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. T. Masten, Judge.

Shinn & Shinn, for appellant. N. J. Barry, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. When this case was in department the opinion hereto attached was prepared by Mr. Commissioner BRITT, and after further consideration we are satisfied with the conclusion therein reached. For the reasons given in that opinion the judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to dismiss the proceeding.

"The parties here were opposing candidates for the office of supervisor of supervisor district No. 4, in Lassen county, at the election held November 3, 1896. In the total poll Brownell had 2 votes more than his opponent, and received a certificate of election accordingly. In Pitt River precinct of said district 32 votes were cast for said office, those for Brownell exceeding those for Packwood by 6; so that if the return from this precinct were thrown out Packwood would be elected. The latter instituted the present proceeding to contest the election, alleging in his written statement, filed as required by section 1115, Code Civ. Proc., malconduct on the part of the board of judges of election at Pitt River precinct. The contestee moved the court below, under section 1122 of the Code, to dismiss the proceeding on the ground of insufficiency of the causes of contest set out in said statement, and that it showed no ground for rejecting the returns from said precinct. The motion was denied, and a trial was had, with the result that the court rejected the vote of said precinct, and adjudged that Packwood had been duly elected.

"The question we find most exigent on appeal is whether the court erred in denying the said motion of the contestee to dismiss. The following are the specifications of malconduct contained in the statement: '(1) That the said board of judges of election of Pitt River precinct did not open the polls at sunrise of said day of election, nor keep the polls open for the length of time required by law. (2) That said board * * * allowed certain persons to vote at said polls, on said day of election, whose names did not appear on the precinct register of said Pitt River precinct. (3) That all of the members of the board * * * were not present during all of the time that the polls were held open, and that votes were received during the absence of certain members of said board of election.' We shall consider these in their inverse order.

"As to the third specification, it is enough to say that the law does not require that all the members of the board shall be present during all the time that voting is in progress. As to the second, it is wholly insufficient, in that it fails to state that the alleged illegal votes were received through some fraud, conspiracy, mistake, or negligence of the board, infecting their proceedings or discrediting their presumptive integrity, and in failing to show that there are no practicable means of ascertaining the true vote,—of 'purging the poll.' The mere fact that illegal votes are received is no ground for rejecting the whole vote of a precinct. Russell v. McDowell, 83 Cal. 77, 79, 23 Pac. 183; Whipley v. McKune, 12 Cal. 352; McCrary, Elec. §§ 523, 524.

"The first ground of contest is the main subject of dispute by counsel. Its gist is that the board did not open the polls at sunrise. The averment following—that the polls were not kept open for the length of time required by law—is a conclusion only, and adds no force to the charge. Section 1160 of the Political Code requires the polls to be opened at sunrise of the morning of the day of election. We may admit that the provision is mandatory, but even mandatory provisions of the election law are to be liberally construed. Jennings v. Brown, 114 Cal. 307, 46 Pac. 77. How is the time of sunrise, within the meaning of the statute, to be determined? If by observation of the appearance of the sun's disk above the horizon of the polling place, then the occurrence of clouds or fog must make the legal time to open the poll a matter of guess. If the polling place is in a valley among mountains, it may be sunrise on the neighboring summits while it is yet shadow in the valley. If the time is to be fixed by reference to an almanac, then since in the month of November the sun rises later or earlier, accordingly as we reckon north or south of any point, accuracy can be attained only by consulting tables calculated for the exact latitude of the precinct. These considerations illustrate the difficulty, perhaps the impossibility, which may be encountered in the attempt to determine the lawful time for opening the polls at a given precinct. Therefore, it must be from the nature and necessity of the case that the legislature intended that some margin, even though narrow, should be allowed for honest effort to comply with the statute, and did not intend that the vote of any precinct should be invalidated because the polls were not open at the very instant of sunrise. Therefore, further, if any person seeks to take advantage of omission in this regard, he must allege some delay sufficient to show a transgression of the statute inconsistent with an honest and intelligent endeavor to obey its command, or that the violation of its letter on which he relies has operated to obstruct the full and fair expression of the suffrage of the precinct. This conclusion results from the elementary principle that in pleading a party must allege the ultimate facts which he must prove. Here the statement shows that thirty-two votes were polled at the election held in Pitt river precinct, and the bald fact relied on to invalidate it is that the polls were not opened at sunrise. We are unwilling to allow that proof of this, and no more, would justify the disfranchisement of the precinct. The authorities most pertinent to the subject support our view. Cleland v. Porter, 74 Ill. 76; Soper v. Sibley Co., 46 Minn. 276, 48 N. W. 1112; Holland v. Davies, 36 Ark. 450; People v. Cook, 8 N. Y. 91-93; McCrary, Elec. § 165. A contrary doctrine would, we are strongly disposed to think, 'lead to more fraud than it would prevent.' Atkinson v. Lorbeer, 111 Cal. 421, 44 Pac. 162. The judgment should be reversed, with directions to the court below to dismiss the proceeding."

HENSHAW, J., took no part in the decision of this case.

We dissent: HARRISON, J.; TEMPLE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment of reversal. The requirements as to time and place of holding elections are certainly mandatory. But time, in this connection, means the proper day for holding the election, and does not mean that the polls must necessarily be opened at the hour of sunrise on that day. A slight delay in opening the polls, explained and excused by the absence of one of the officers and by the necessity of setting up the booth, railings, etc., ought not to disfranchise the voters of a precinct, in the absence of any showing of actual injury. Delay in opening the polls in a precinct where ample time is still left for receiving all the votes is a much less serious irregularity than a premature closing of the polls, and yet I suppose it would scarcely be contended that an entire precinct should be thrown out because the polls were closed at 4 o'clock, or even earlier, if at the same time it appeared that every registered voter had deposited his ballot before the closing. In this case it was found by the court, although it had not been alleged, that at least one voter was prevented from casting his ballot by the delay in opening the polls; but it did not appear how he would have voted, and, even allowing that he would have voted for the contestant, the result of the election would not have been changed. It also appears that one man not registered in the precinct was allowed to vote. Counting his vote and the vote that was lost by the delay in opening the polls for the contestant, the result would have been a tie. But as to the illegal vote I think the court erred in rejecting the offer of the contestant to prove that it was cast for the contestant. The voter was "assisted" in marking his ballot by an officer of the election who was called as a witness to prove that the vote was cast for contestant. The offered evidence was excluded upon the ground that the election law (Pol. Code, § 1208) prohibits any disclosure by the assisting officer of the contents of the ballot. But this law applies in terms only to the ballots of electors. Where a ballot is unlawfully deposited by one who is not an elector, the law ought not, and in my opinion does not, enjoin secrecy as to his ballot where the interest of third parties and of the public is concerned.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county. J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Emily J. Higgins against H. M. Higgins and others to enforce a lien. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant San Diego Savings Bank appeals. Affirmed.

N. H. Conklin, for appellant. A. H. Sweet, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Defendant H. M. Higgins and the plaintiff, Emily J. Higgins, husband and wife, entered into a contract in writing of date April 9, 1891, whereby they agreed, among other things stipulated, to live apart, and the husband agreed to pay the wife the sum of $600 per year during her life. Such contract contained the following clause: "The payment of said annuity to be a binding and continuing obligation upon the said H. M. Higgins, and upon his executors, administrators, and assigns, and to constitute a lien upon his estate during his lifetime, and after his death, during the lifetime of the said Emily J. Higgins." The instrument was duly acknowledged, and was recorded on November 12, 1894, in the office of the county recorder of San Diego county, in which county certain lands owned by said H. M. Higgins were situated. Subsequently, H. M. Higgins made to the defendant San Diego Savings Bank a mortgage of the lands aforesaid to secure his promissory note to the bank for the sum of $5,000. Plaintiff sued in this action to recover arrears of the said annuity, and to subject the said lands—particularly described in her complaint—to sale for the payment thereof. The court below held that plaintiff had a first lien on the land, in virtue of said contract with her husband and notice thereof to the subsequent mortgagee, and rendered judgment accordingly. The bank appealed.

Appellant insists that the language of said contract is so uncertain, for want of definite description of property to be affected, that no lien was or could be created thereby, nor any notice of a lien imparted to subsequent incumbrancers. It must be allowed that considerable force of argument and some decided cases support this contention. See Herman v. Deming, 44 Conn. 124; De Wolf v. Manufacturing Co., 49 Conn. 282; Green v. Witherspoon, 37 La. Ann. 751. But the prevailing judicial view, well enough justified, perhaps, in legal principle, is that deeds and mortgages describing the property to be conveyed or incumbered, in terms essentially similar (for purposes of the question here) to those employed in the contract of Higgins and wife, are not void for want of greater particularity, but suffice to pass title or impose a charge according to the apparent intent, extrinsic evidence being admitted, under proper pleading, to identify the property. Trust Co. v. Pauly, 111 Cal. 122, 43

HIGGINS v. HIGGINS et al. (L. A. 427.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1898.)

MORTGAGE—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

Contract of husband declaring payment of annuity to wife a lien on his "estate" is a sufficient description to give notice to a subsequent mortgagee of any of his lands.

Pac. 586; Pettigrew v. Dobbelaar, 63 Cal. 396; Wilson v. Boyce, 92 U. S. 320; Land Co. v. Randell, 82 Iowa 89, 47 N. W. 905; Leslie v. Merrick, 99 Ind. 180; Roehl v. Haumesser, 114 Ind. 311, 15 N. E. 345; Witt v. Harlan, 66 Tex. 660, 2 S. W. 41; Drew v. Carroll, 154 Mass. 181, 28 N. E. 148; Railroad Co. v. Talman, 15 Ala. 472.

The objection that the description of property must be specific in order to satisfy the definition of a mortgage in our statute (Civ. Code, § 2920) is met by the principle which pervades the cases cited that that is certain which is capable of being made certain. True, the term "estate," used in this contract to denote the subject of lien, has in law a diversity of meaning; but it should be understood here in the sense which will accomplish, and not defeat, the obvious purpose to create a lien, viz. to comprehend property susceptible of being impressed with a lien. As it was used without any qualification, it included all the lands of the husband. Archer v. Deneale, 1 Pet. 585; Pulliam v. Pulliam, 10 Fed. 40. Failure to indicate the locality of the property is not fatal. McCullough v. Olds, 108 Cal. 529, 41 Pac. 420. It may be, as the court below ruled, that no lien was created against personalty. The contract was not executed in the manner of a mortgage of chattels under the statute; but, in our opinion, it was effectual to charge a lien on lands, and the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CREEGAN et al. (Cr. 217.)<sup>1</sup>
CRIMINAL LAW—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE—CORROBORATION EVIDENCE—FORGERY.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 1111, providing that a conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice unless he is corroborated by other evidence which in itself, without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect defendant with the offense, such corroborating testimony is not competent if given by a witness who is also an accomplice.

2. Where the only corroborating evidence given under Pen. Code, § 1111, requiring the testimony of an accomplice to be corroborated, was by a witness claimed to be also an accomplice, the question whether he was such was for the jury, and its verdict, from which it must be assumed (defendant being found guilty) that he was found not to be an accomplice, is conclusive of that fact, if the evidence thereon was properly received.

3. Testimony, in a trial for forgery, of a witness claimed to be an accomplice, that he was acquitted of the same offense, is not competent, as showing that he was not an accomplice.

4. Testimony of an accomplice that he did not consider another witness guilty of the crime for which accused was being tried is not competent, as showing that such witness was not also an accomplice.

5. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1944, requiring the judge to be satisfied that a writing, shown a witness for the purpose of establishing proof of handwriting, was genuine, before he could admit it for that purpose, it was improper to show the circumstances under which it was written.

6. On the trial of one charged with forgery, the testimony of an accomplice, to whom was submitted a writing of defendant for the purpose of proving his handwriting, that the writing was a memorandum of extracts from the Bankers' Almanac, containing a list of towns, and that witness and accused were picking out the towns, was incompetent, in so far as it authorized an inference that accused was thus engaged in an attempt to commit a similar offense to the one charged.

7. The only direct evidence connecting the accused with a forgery was that about the time of the crime he was at hotels near the scene thereof under an assumed name, and that the day after the crime he left the locality with another accused, both passing under assumed names. Four months later the two were arrested, and gold coins similar to those obtained by means of the forgery were found on their persons, and in the room of accused was found a package called a "forger's outfit." Held not to be sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty.

8. Where the finding by the jury that a co-defendant was an accomplice must be vacated by reason of the admission of incompetent evidence, the admissions of the alleged accomplice, made, as to accused, out of the latter's hearing, cease to be competent against him.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

James Cregan and Charles Becker were convicted of forgery, and they appeal. Reversed.

Dunne & McPike, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendants were convicted upon an indictment for forgery, and have appealed from the judgment. The forgery of which they were convicted was committed as follows, viz.: On the 9th day of December, 1895, Frank L. Seaver, representing himself to be A. J. Scott, purchased from the Bank of Woodland a draft for $12 upon the Crocker-Woolworth Bank of San Francisco, in favor of A. H. Dean. Prior to this date (December 4th) he had deposited the sum of $2,500 with the Nevada Bank, and opened an account there under the name of A. H. Dean. On the 17th of December he deposited with this bank the above draft, which in the meantime had been raised from $12 to $22,000, and had the same placed to his credit. On the morning of the 18th he drew from the bank $20,000 in gold coin, and on the succeeding day left the state. The defendants were indicted by the grand jury of San Francisco for this forgery, upon the ground that they were parties thereto.

The principal witness on the part of the prosecution was Seaver, by whose testimony the defendants' connection with the crime was shown as follows: An agreement had been made in the city of New York, between the witness and the defendant Cregan, to come to California for the purpose of perpetrating some act of this kind, and in pursuance thereof they reached San Francisco in the latter part of November, 1895, and Seaver procured the draft in Woodland as above stated. On the 11th day of December he returned to San Francisco, and while on the Oakland boat gave the draft to Creegan, who told him that Becker was stopping at an hotel in Oakland, and that he would go back on the boat and give him the draft for the purpose of having it raised. On the 16th of December, Creegan returned the draft to Seaver in its altered condition, telling him that it had been raised by Becker, and advising him to deposit it in the bank the next day. Seaver made the deposit, and at the same time drew out all the money which was previously standing to his credit. In the evening of that day he and Creegan and one McCosta arranged to meet the next morning for the purpose of drawing the money, and on the morning of the 18th they met at the corner of Third and Mission streets, where it was agreed by them that Seaver should go to the bank, draw the money, and take it away, and that McCosta and Creegan should follow him for the purpose of seeing that no harm came to him. In pursuance of this arrangement, Seaver hired a buggy, and with his office boy as a driver went to the bank, —Creegan and McCosta standing outside,—drew $20,000 upon his check, which was given to him in four sacks, of $5,000 each, and placed them in a satchel, which he put in the buggy. He then drove to a distant part of the town, where he met McCosta, and they carried the coin to his room, where he took two of the sacks out of the satchel and gave them to McCosta to deliver to Creegan. McCosta testified that upon receiving the two sacks he went out of the house and met Creegan in the street, and together they took a car for the ferry, and went over to Oakland, where Creegan took the money from him, ostensibly for the purpose of placing it in a room, and shortly returned and gave him one hundred dollars which he said Becker had sent him, and also gave him a package which he requested him to take to New York.

The connection of Creegan with the forgery depends upon the testimony of Seaver and McCosta. Seaver was, by his own admission, an accomplice, and, in order to permit his testimony to be considered by the jury, it was necessary to have other evidence which, in itself, without the testimony of Seaver, tended to connect Creegan with the commission of the crime. Section 1111 of the Penal Code is as follows: "A conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice unless he is corroborated by other evidence which, in itself, and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense, or the circumstances thereof." The testimony of McCosta is the link in the chain of evidence by which the prosecution sought to show that Creegan was implicated in the forgery, and to make the testimony of Seaver available against him. But, if McCosta was also an accomplice, the jury would be required to disregard his testimony, equally with that of Seaver. Whether he was an accomplice was therefore a vital fact to be determined by the jury. The relation which it was shown he bore to the transaction was such as to authorize the defendants to claim that he was particeps criminis, and the prosecution vigorously sought to resist this claim, and the jury were instructed by the court in accordance with the above provisions of section 1111 of the Penal Code. It must be assumed from the verdict that, upon the evidence before them, the jury found that he was not an accomplice, and if this evidence was properly received their verdict must be accepted as conclusive of the fact.

The defendants contend that the court improperly allowed certain evidence to be introduced which influenced the jury in their verdict, and that for this reason the verdict should be vacated. While McCosta was on the witness stand he testified that after leaving the state in December he and Seaver had been arrested in Minneapolis, and brought back here for trial; whereupon the following questions were asked him by the counsel for the prosecution: "Q. You were subsequently tried in this court room? A. Yes, sir. Q. For a complicity in this affair, or for forging this check? A. Yes, sir. Q. And were acquitted? Mr. Dunne: Objected to as incompetent, unadjudicated as against these defendants, and res inter alios acta. The Court: Well, I will overrule the objection." The defendants excepted to the ruling, and the witness thereupon answered, "Yes, sir."

The court manifestly erred in permitting this testimony to be given. One of the main questions to be determined by the jury was whether McCosta was an accomplice. This was a question of fact to be determined by the jury before whom the defendants were being tried (People v. Bolanger, 71 Cal. 17, 11 Pac. 799; People v. Kraker, 72 Cal. 459, 14 Pac. 196); and they were entitled to have it determined upon only such evidence as was competent therefor. The conclusion that another jury had reached in another case, in which these defendants were not parties, was not competent evidence for the determination of this question. The statement of McCosta that he had been acquitted upon that trial had no legal tendency to show that he was not an accomplice in the crime. It was, in effect, merely saying to the jury that upon that occasion he had been told by 12 men, or had heard them say, that he was not guilty. That verdict of acquittal was, at most, but the declaration of the jury in that case that, upon the evidence presented to them, they did not believe him to be guilty. What that evidence was, or what influences may have affected them in reaching that conclusion, was not shown. His acquittal may have resulted from the failure of the prosecution to introduce all the evidence that was introduced at the present trial, or it may have depended upon rulings of the court in regard to the weight to be given to the evidence before them. See Burke v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 34 Cal. 60; People v. Mitchell, 100 Cal. 328, 34 Pac. 698; Marceau v. Insurance Co., 101 Cal. 338, 35 Pac. 856, and 36 Pac. 813. His acquittal in that case freed him from being again placed in jeopardy for the crime, and constituted a perpetual protection against any punishment therefor; but as against these defendants it did not create a legal status for him, or establish the fact that he was not an accomplice.

That the error was prejudicial to the defendants cannot be gainsaid. Upon a controverted issue, to be determined by a jury, the fact that another jury had determined the same issue against the contention of the defendants would have great, if not controlling, influence; and the fact that the court permitted this evidence to be introduced, notwithstanding the objection of the defendants, would naturally incline the jury to the opinion that it was entitled to be considered by them as an element in determining the fact. For similar reasons, the court erred in refusing to strike out the testimony of the witness Seaver that he did not consider that McCosta was guilty of this forgery.

While Seaver was on the witness stand a writing was shown to him, and he stated that it was in the handwriting of Creegan, and was written in the room of the witness in the hotel at St. Paul, Minn. The paper was then offered in evidence as a specimen of Creegan's writing, for the purpose of comparison with certain signatures alleged to have been made by Creegan. The witness was then asked upon what occasion this paper was written, and stated "it was a memoranda of extracts from the Bankers' Almanac, containing a list of suitable towns throughout Minnesota and Dakota which drew drafts on St. Paul and Minneapolis, which Creegan wrote in my company, and while we were both examining the book we picked out the towns for the—". The defense objected to this question, and at the above point in the answer of the witness moved to strike out that part of the answer referring to the purpose for which they were examining the book. Their objection to the question and the motion to strike out the answer should have been granted. The object of introducing the writing was for a comparison with other alleged writings of the defendant, and the judge was required to be satisfied that the writing was genuine before he was authorized to admit it for this purpose. Code Civ. Proc. § 1944. The circumstances under which it was written involved an issue which was irrelevant to the issue before the jury, and the testimony thereof was improperly received. To the extent that the testimony authorized an inference that Creegan and the witness had, several months subsequent to December, been engaged in an attempt to perpetrate a similar offense, it was irrelevant and incompetent to establish the present charge.

It is, moreover, contended on behalf of Becker that there was no evidence before the jury connecting him with the offense, or from which they were authorized to find him guilty, and we are of the opinion that this contention must be sustained. The only evidence by which Becker is connected with the transaction is the testimony of Seaver and McCosta, and the only testimony given by them which indicates his complicity in the crime are statements alleged to have been made to them by Creegan in the absence of Becker, and without his hearing. Neither of these witnesses had any personal acquaintance with Becker, or met or spoke to him at any time, nor was he seen by either of them, except that McCosta says that on one occasion he saw him on the opposite side of a street in Oakland. Nor is there any evidence in the case, except the testimony by these witnesses of Creegan's statements to them, that Becker ever knew of the draft or of its alteration, or of any of the circumstances connected therewith. The only direct evidence that was given respecting Becker is that at some time in the month of December he was at the Golden Eagle Hotel in Sacramento under an assumed name, and was afterwards at the Galindo Hotel, in Oakland, under the same name, and that he and Creegan left Oakland together on the 18th day of December, under assumed names. This, moreover, is the only time in which Becker was shown to have been seen by Creegan while in the state. While these facts might corroborate any testimony having a legal tendency to establish his guilt, they have no connection with the alleged crime, and are not available by themselves as substantive evidence of such guilt.

About four months after the forgery was committed Becker and Creegan were arrested in Philadelphia while planning a trip to Guatemala, and some gold coin which was minted in San Francisco in 1895 was found upon their persons, and in the room of Becker there was found a package called by the magistrate before whom they were examined a "forger's outfit," which it was claimed resembled the package that McCosta stated Creegan had requested him to carry to New York. McCosta did not testify that Creegan told him that the package came from Becker, nor was it shown that Becker ever saw the package that McCosta took to New York. Whether there ever was such a package depends upon the testimony of McCosta, but, if it be assumed that it was the same which Creegan gave to him, there is no evidence that Becker ever saw it prior to the time when he was in Philadelphia, and McCosta's description of the package which was given to him differs materially from that which was found in Becker's room. But, admitting the existence of these facts, they would not in themselves, without the aid of the testimony of Seaver and McCosta, have authorized the jury to find a verdict against Becker. As the finding by the jury that Creegan was an accomplice must be vacated by reason of the admission of incompetent evidence, it cannot be used as a basis for holding that Becker is bound by his declaration, since we cannot assume that in the absence of this evidence the jury would have so found.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. RECLAMATION DIST. NO.
136 et al. (Sac. 238.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1898.)

QUO WARRANTO — USURPATION OF CORPORATE FUNCTIONS—RECLAMATION DISTRICT—HEARING—PUBLICATION.

1. In quo warranto by the state against a pretended corporation, it is sufficient to allege the ultimate fact that it is usurping corporate functions without legal right, without stating the facts constituting such usurpation.

2. Under St. 1867-68, p. 507, § 30, requiring publication of a petition for the formation of a reclamation district "for four weeks next preceding the hearing thereof, in some newspaper published in the county," a publication in a daily paper "once a week for four weeks, commencing on the 5th day of December, * * * to and including the 2d day of January," is a sufficient publication for a hearing on January 3d.

3. The continued usurpation of a corporate franchise gives rise to a continuing cause of action by the state, which is not estopped by mere inaction in the prosecution of its rights.

4. Where a petition for the formation of a reclamation district has been granted by the board of supervisors, and the names of some of the subscribers appear to have been signed by third persons, it is conclusively presumed that such board found that they were authorized and genuine signatures.

Temple, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Quo warranto by the people of the state of California against reclamation district No. 136 and others. There was a judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants appealed. Reversed.

A. M. & H. W. Johnson, for appellants.
Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald and W. A. Gett, Jr., for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is a proceeding by quo warranto to exclude the defendants from all corporate rights. The demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and the defendants answered. When the case was called for trial, defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings, on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, for the reason that the pleading only averred that the defendants were usurping the functions of a corporation, there being no allegation of the particular circumstances constituting such usurpation. The motion for a nonsuit was denied. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendants now appeal from that judgment, and also from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

It is insisted that the complaint is fatally defective in not alleging specifically the acts constituting the usurpation. Many cases are cited to support this contention, but a sufficient answer to them is found in the fact that they are not cases of quo warranto. In a proceeding prosecuted by the state, of the character here inaugurated, it is sufficient to allege the ultimate fact, namely, that the defendants are exercising the franchise without authority of law. People v. Cooper, 139 Ill. 461, 29 N. E. 872; People v. Clayton, 4 Utah, 421, 11 Pac. 206, and cases there cited.

The trial court found that the board of supervisors had no jurisdiction to form the district, and that the district was not legally organized. The most serious objection to the validity of the organization of the district rests upon the publication of the petition of the landowners for its formation. By section 30 of the act of the legislature (St. 1867-68, p. 507) the petition is required to be published "for four weeks next preceding the hearing thereof in some newspaper published in the county." As to the character of the publication made in this case, the affidavit of the printer is as follows: "That a true copy of the annexed petition [which is made part of this affidavit] has been published in said paper [the Sacramento Daily Record] once a week for four weeks, commencing the 5th day of December, 1871, to and including the 2d day of January, 1872." Do the facts set out in this affidavit fill the measure required by the statute? In other words, was the petition published four weeks next preceding the hearing thereof? The hearing of the petition was fixed for January 3, 1872. Giving to the affidavit of the printer a fairly liberal interpretation, it appeared therefrom that the petition was published the 5th, 12th, 19th, and 26th days of December, and January 2d. If such a publication had been had in a weekly newspaper published in the county, it would have come strictly within the requirements of the statute. But does the fact that the publication is had in a daily newspaper once a week for the required time satisfy the law? It must be borne in mind that the number of publications is not specified by the statute. There is no direct adjudication in this state upon the question; but, upon examination of the authorities of other states, we find many cases holding publications of notice in daily papers once a week for the time prescribed by the notice a sufficient compliance with the law. It is unnecessary to quote from these cases. It is sufficient to say that they squarely meet the point and support the validity of such a publication. We simply cite them: Wing v. Dodge, 80 Ill. 564; Wood v. Knapp, 100 N. Y. 109, 2 N. E. 632; Thurston v. Miller, 10 R. I. 358; In re Harris, 14 R. I. 637; Bowen v. Argall, 24 Wend. 501; Alexander v. Alexander (Neb.) 41 N. W. 1065; Dayton v. Mintzer, 22 Minn. 393; Brewer v. City of Springfield, 97 Mass. 153; Frothingham v. March, 1 Mass. 247. To support plaintiff's position, the case of Hellman v. Merz, 112 Cal. 661, 44 Pac. 1079, is relied upon; but that case fails to reach the mark. The reasons for the conclusion there declared are not as full and complete as they could well have been stated. The conclusion, nevertheless, in that case, is correct and absolutely sound. The notice there required was the probate notice provided for by section 1549 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The subsequent section (1705) declares, in effect, that the notices provided for by section 1549 must be published as often as the paper is published during the time over which the notice is extended, unless otherwise directed by the court or judge. This mandatory requirement equally applies to both weekly and daily papers. In the Hellman Case the court or judge did not otherwise direct the publication of the notice, and, it being published in a daily paper, should have been published every day that the paper was issued prior to the day of sale. But such publication was not had, and therein consisted its invalidity. In this case the notice of publication was sufficient.

It is contended that the state is estopped from questioning the validity of this corporation. It is insisted that an estoppel has been created by reason of inaction in the matter upon the state's part for so many years, during which time defendants have expended large sums of money in reclaiming the land embraced within the lands of the alleged district, and have enjoyed the fruits of their labors during all that time. These and kindred circumstances in no way create an estoppel against the state. The continued exercise of a franchise or right is a continued usurpation, upon which a new cause of action in favor of the state is ever arising.

It is claimed that the petition is void upon its face, in this: that it appears therefrom that the names of some of the owners of land were attached to it by other parties. If these names were signed under express authority of the owners of the land, then the signatures were those of the owners. In passing upon the merits of the petition, the genuineness of these signatures was a matter essentially within the power of the board of supervisors to decide. And the approval of the petition by the board was an adjudication of the fact,—an adjudication that was absolutely conclusive. Humboldt Co. v. Dinsmore, 75 Cal. 604, 17 Pac. 710; Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles v. Board of Equalization of Los Angeles, 97 Cal. 318, 32

Pac. 312. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed.

WRIGHT v. PACIFIC COAST OIL CO. (S. F. 82S.)

INJURY TO SERVANT—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

Plaintiff had been for seven years in charge of stills for distilling petroleum, and inspected the bottoms, and notified defendant, the owner, when they were to be replaced. The life of a bottom was about five and a half months, and at the end of four months he would begin inspections, making them after every run. He knew the danger of the bottoms giving way, and whether they had been regularly inspected. A crack being discovered in a bottom, plaintiff and the superintendent knelt down and looked at it, neither thinking of any danger. At the superintendent's suggestion, plaintiff then proceeded to remove a burner to prevent the oil in it being caked, and while standing in front of the still the bottom gave way, and a quantity of asphaltum ran out, burning plaintiff. Held, that the injury was caused by an unforeseen accident, resulting from the inevitable impairment of the still, of which plaintiff had equal means of knowing with defendant, and he could not recover.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by W. H. Wright against the Pacific Coast Oil Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. Tappan & Simpson, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This appeal is by the defendant from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial. The defendant is a corporation engaged in the business of refining lubricating and illuminating oils, and in November, 1895, the defendant was in its employ as a "stillman," and while so employed received personal injuries, and prosecutes this action to recover damages therefor. Upon the premises of defendant there were eight small vats or stills which were operated by the plaintiff. These stills are circular, are seven feet in diameter, and about five feet high. They rest on a brick foundation three or four feet high, and are inclosed with brick, forming a jacket. The bottom of the still is formed of a sheet of steel riveted to the base of an angle iron, and the sides are riveted to the perpendicular part, thus forming a vat shaped like a tub, the top, or cover, having a manhole, through which access may be had to the inside. About 18 inches below the bottom is a grate upon which coke is placed, and where the fire, fed by an oil spray, burns. These stills are filled with petroleum to within about a foot of the top. The oil is heated to a high temperature, and the vapors are conveyed by pipes to the receiving house, and condensed. When the process is completed the oil is evaporated away until only the asphaltum is left, and that is coked on the bottom of the still. When sufficiently cooled, the asphaltum is dug out, and the still is charged for another run. The process ordinarily requires 18 or 20 hours to bring the contents down to a coke, and the cooling, cleaning out, and recharging occupy the remainder of two days. The bottom of the still, being exposed to great heat, lasts about five or five and a half months, and when a new bottom is required the still is taken down, and the rivets connecting the bottom with the angle iron are cut, and a new bottom put in. The greatest heat being at the center, that part is first to wear out. The bottom soon begins to sag at that point, and the sag increases the longer it is used, and as the bottom becomes thin minute cracks are made, through which a seepage or sweating occurs, creating a moisture on the bottom when a new charge is put in or before it is fired up. After a bottom had been used about four months inspections of the bottom began to be made by the stillman by pumping a quantity of oil into the still, and then going under it with a torch and examining the bottom. If it was found to be moist, it was deemed insufficient for another run, and would be reported by the stillman to the superintendent, who would either direct a new bottom to be put in, or have the boiler-maker test it with a hammer to ascertain its strength.

The circumstances more immediately connected with the accident are that the plaintiff was in the receiving house, and was informed by another employé that one of his stills was on fire. The plaintiff testified that he ran to the still, and found a dense smoke pouring out, and immediately opened the damper, thus allowing the smoke to pass up the flue. He then opened the furnace doors, and, kneeling down, looked at the bottom of the still, and observed a small crack near the center of the bottom, through which he says he saw oil dropping down into the fire box. That he looked at it for a very brief space of time, and got up off his knees, and found the rest of the employés there, and Mr. Miller, the superintendent. That he and Miller both got down and saw the crack and what was going on. Then both stood up quietly for a second or so, and the superintendent said: "Well, I guess it won't get any worse; I guess it will take up;" and directed the other employés to go about their work, and then said to the plaintiff: "Wright, you disconnect that burner." That he went and got a pair of tongs to disconnect the burner (which fed the oil to the fire under the still), and gave it one or two turns to loosen it, and then took his hands to it. That he was standing in front of the furnace doors, which were then closed, when he heard a great roaring sound, and was immediately enveloped in flames. His hands were badly burned, and his face to some extent. The oil had been shut off from the burner by some one at the first alarm. The immediate cause of the flame bursting out was that a hole was broken in the center of the bottom of the still, letting a quantity of the asphaltum or refuse fall on the coke fire underneath.

The principal controversy as to the facts relates to the removal of the burner, in which the plaintiff was engaged at the time he was burned. The plaintiff testified that he was ordered to remove it, and Mr. Miller testified that he said to him: "If you take off the burner, it will save from carbonizing." The burner consists of a small pipe which conveys the oil into the furnace, that pipe being inside of a larger one, which conveys steam. The steam pipe is drawn to a nozzle, and is grooved or rifled spirally on the inside, thus spraying the oil. These pipes, or burner, are 12 to 15 inches long, projecting a few inches inside the furnace wall. The reason for removing it was that when the oil and steam were shut off some oil would be left in the burner, and the heat of the furnace would evaporate the pure oil, and leave a residuum which would carbonize, or coke, and thus clog the burner to some extent, and cause trouble in cleaning it out. The burners are sometimes taken off during the run for the purpose of cleaning or adjustment. The plaintiff testified that removing the burner would prevent coking, and that "the taking off the burner had nothing to do with the flame shooting out,—nothing whatever. I did not make any protest against taking off the burner when Mr. Miller directed me to do it. I had no objection to that. I did not regard it as an improper thing to do, under those circumstances." Upon being asked how long it would require to stand there to take the burner off, he replied, "Half a minute."

The plaintiff had been in defendant's employment about ten years, and for seven years next before the accident had been in charge of these stills. He testified that he had never been instructed to examine the bottoms of the stills with a torch, but had always done so out of a desire to make himself useful and to retain his place. The superintendent testified that the stillmen were always instructed to do so; that it was part of their duty; that the boiler-maker who put in the bottoms never examined the stills unless the stillman reported that they required attention; and this is not denied by the plaintiff, nor does he deny that it was always understood to be his duty.

Upon his examination in chief the plaintiff, after describing the mode of examination with a torch, was asked: "Did you make such an inspection as you describe on this particular still prior to the accident? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long prior? A. Couple of weeks. Q. With what result? A. Found nothing that would indicate the necessity of reporting that it was played out, or gone in." Plaintiff further testified: "The bottom becomes very thin in course of time from being used over the fire. They get down almost as thin as a piece of paper. After they have been in use about four months I begin to inspect them to see whether or not there is any sweating or seepage underneath. If they are wet underneath, then I don't use them. I notify Mr. Miller that that bottom needs to be taken off and a new one put on, and Mr. Miller has Mr. Bird do it. * * * I cannot recall that Mr. Miller ever gave me any specific instruction to do that. I knew it was expected of me. I can't recall how I came to get into the habit of inspecting. I had been doing that, adopting that method, for fully four or five years. * * * It gradually came to be understood to be a portion of my duties to examine the bottoms before using them; everybody so understood it."

An explanation made by Mr. Miller throws light upon this method of inspecting the stills. These bottoms are made of steel, and when new are five-sixteenths of an inch in thickness. So long as the contents of the still remain in a liquid state the fire does not injure the bottoms; but when it is no longer a liquid, in the coking stage, the bottom is brought to a white heat and is slowly burned away. The first cracks occur in the cooling process, and, if any exist, upon putting in the cold petroleum, and before the fire is started, the sweating or moisture on the outside of the bottom shows them, even when they cannot be seen or otherwise detected; and, if no moisture appears, it is known to be good for another run, since the cracks will not occur until the next cooling takes place. Hence the necessity for regular inspection, when from the age of the bottom, or its sagging in the center, weakness is indicated. In this case the bottom was found to be scarcely thicker than tissue paper.

It is therefore apparent—First, that it was plaintiff's duty, under his employment as stillman, to inspect these bottoms when they had been in use about four months, and regularly thereafter, and, when cracks were indicated by the moisture, to report to the superintendent; and, second, having decided, as he must have done by making an inspection at about the regular time, that his duty required him to commence the inspection of this particular still, it was his duty to continue these inspections; and, if it was his duty to commence the inspection two weeks before the accident, it was negligence on his part to omit it during the whole of that time, the still being freshly charged every second day, thus furnishing six or seven opportunities for inspection after the one made and before the accident. Upon this point he testified:

"When the convexity began to get considerable, and I knew that the still had been in a period of four months or thereabouts, I would make it my business, after every charge had been cleaned out, to put in one or two barrels of oil, shut off the supply, and go down and make this examination with a torch, and not until I discovered seepage would I report. I might be making these examinations a couple of weeks or longer before the seepage would manifest itself. The seepage was the customary and usual test." Much more of the testimony of the plaintiff, as well as of other witnesses, might be quoted, tending to show that it was the duty of the plaintiff to inspect and report to the superintendent the condition of the stills. Upon that question there is no conflict.

At the conclusion of the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the evidence failed to show any actionable negligence upon the part of defendant, and while said motion was under discussion plaintiff asked and obtained leave to amend his complaint. The original complaint alleged that it was not his duty to have control or supervision of the stills, and that he did not exercise any custody or supervision over them; that said vat or still was imperfectly constructed, defective, inadequate, and unsafe; that such unsafe condition could have been discovered by the defendant by the exercise of ordinary care, and was unknown to the plaintiff; that while he was engaged in heating oil and standing in front of said vat, which was filled with oil, it cracked across the bottom by reason of the imperfection and defectiveness aforesaid, and thereby the contents of the vat ran out and burned the plaintiff. The amendment added, in substance, that while the vat was in said cracked and unsafe condition, which was unknown to the plaintiff, the defendant, knowing its condition, negligently, and without the exercise of common prudence, ordered plaintiff to remove a certain burner which was located above the furnace door, and while plaintiff, in the execution of said order, was standing in front of the furnace door, the vat cracked entirely across the bottom, and the contents ran out, etc. Defendant objected and excepted to the order permitting the amendment. The motion for a nonsuit was renewed, with the statement, in addition to the former, that the averments of the amendment are not justified by the evidence, and that no negligence on the part of defendant is shown. The nonsuit was denied, and defendant excepted.

It would seem to be clear that in the absence of the amendment the nonsuit should have been granted. So far as the condition of the vat or still is concerned, no negligence on the part of the defendant is shown, while the testimony of the plaintiff is clear and explicit that it was his duty to examine the bottom of the still and report its condition to the superintendent. Whether that duty was originally imposed upon him as a part of his employment, it is not necessary to inquire. He had assumed it, if it was not imposed upon him, and continued it for at least four or five years, and knew that it was expected of him. If at any time he concluded it was too burdensome, or the responsibility too great, he should have informed the superintendent, and given him an opportunity either to employ some one as stillman who would perform the duty, or otherwise provide for its performance. The citation of authorities to this proposition would be superfluous. There is not one word of testimony tending to show that the vat was improperly or imperfectly constructed, or that it was defective, inadequate, or unsafe, save from use, as to which it was the duty of plaintiff to watch and report.

I do not think it necessary to discuss or determine the question whether the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to amend his complaint; for, conceding that the amendment was properly allowed, no case was made thereunder which would justify a verdict for the plaintiff. The plaintiff testified that the removal of the burner had nothing to do with the fire or the giving way of the bottom of the still. The only possible connection it had with the accident was that it brought him for about "a half minute" in front of the furnace doors. Giving the plaintiff the benefit of the doubt as to whether the removal of the burner was ordered, or merely suggested, by the superintendent, it does not appear that the plaintiff had not as full knowledge of any possible danger as the superintendent. He had been for seven years in charge of these stills. No one, whatever his station, could be more familiar with them. Indeed, no one knew so well as the plaintiff whether there was danger of the bottom of the still giving way. He knew how long it had been in use, and he alone, so far as the evidence discloses, knew whether or not it had been regularly inspected. Before the superintendent reached the still, plaintiff had opened the furnace doors, knelt down in front, looked at the bottom of the still, and testifies that he saw a small crack about an inch long and about as thick as a knife blade. When the superintendent arrived he and the plaintiff both got down in front of the furnace and looked at the bottom, and the crack seemed to be closing. Neither of them appears to have apprehended any danger to themselves. The superintendent certainly did not, as he had a right to believe that it had been inspected when the still was filled at the beginning of the run, and therefore, though leaking, was sufficiently strong to sustain the weight within. There was no intention of continuing the run of that still. The oil spray had been turned off, though the coke was still burning, and the bricks were red hot. Nothing could be done but to let the fire burn out and the still cool. The removal of the burner was solely to prevent the oil within it being coked by the heat of the furnace, and was regarded by the plaintiff as a proper thing to do under the circumstances.

At the time of the accident the run was approaching completion. The contents of the still were reduced to 12 or 14 inches of asphaltum. The small crack which was seen by the plaintiff only leaked "a little thin spray," and, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, Mr. Miller said it would take up. "Take up is the equivalent of cake up, or coke up." The accident did not occur because of anything, whether gas or oil, that escaped through that crack, or that could by any possibility escape through it in the condition of the contents of the still, which had been reduced to 12 or 14 inches of asphaltum. The conduct of both the plaintiff and Mr. Miller in getting down with their faces before the furnace door and watching it is conclusive of that fact, as the red or white heat of the bottom showed that the contents were reduced to a thick condition, which could not pass through a crack such as the plaintiff described. The accident was caused by a portion of the bottom, about the size of a man's hat, breaking out in the center of the bottom, and thus permitting a quantity of the asphaltum to fall upon the coke fire underneath. That was an occurrence which neither of them anticipated, and which, if likely to occur, should have been more readily anticipated by the plaintiff, who had the better opportunity of knowing the condition of the still, and whose duty it was to watch and report its condition whenever he deemed it unsafe. It was not the case of a latent defect in the material or construction of the still, but a case where the still wears out from use, and is under the immediate care of the employé who is charged with the duty of ascertaining and reporting its condition to his employer.

These works had been in operation, under the supervision of Mr. Miller, some 16 years, and during all that time the same tests as to the sufficiency of the still bottoms had been used without accident. The plaintiff was not a new or inexperienced man. He had been in charge of these stills for 7 years. He had not only an equal opportunity of knowing the condition of this particular still, but a better opportunity than the superintendent. That neither apprehended danger to the person is clear, not only because both got down in front of the furnace to inspect it, but because the plaintiff not only acquiesced in the direction to remove the burner, but testifies that he regarded the order as proper under the circumstances. Even if it were conceded that plaintiff had continued to make the torch inspections of the bottom up to the time the last charge was put in the still, we see no negligence or fault upon the part of the superintendent of which the plaintiff can complain. The plaintiff's actual knowledge was at least equal to that of the superintendent, while his means of knowledge were greater. Where an employé, with his own consent, has undertaken, as a part of his employment, the duty of determining when an appliance which he constantly uses has become unsafe or insufficient from such use, and especially where he has shown himself capable, from long experience, to do so, he cannot hold his employer liable for an unforeseen accident resulting from its expected and inevitable impairment. One of the essential conditions of the right of recovery in case of defective appliances is "that the servant did not know of the defect, and had not equal means of knowing with the master." Wood, Mast. & Serv. § 414; Malone v. Hawley, 46 Cal. 409. This seems to have been understood by the plaintiff to be the law, since in his amended complaint he alleges that defendant knew the dangerous condition of the vat, and that he did not. The evidence does not sustain this allegation. Plaintiff testified that the average life of the still bottoms was from five to five and a half months. He had been in charge of these eight stills for seven years, and therefore he had probably seen at least 112 of these bottoms worn out and replaced. In Shear. & R. Neg. § 287, it is said: "The true definition is that, when circumstances make it the duty of the servant to inquire, it is contributory negligence on his part not to inquire. A servant is charged with actual notice as to the matters concerning which it was his duty to inquire; and especially should this rule be applied where the servant's action is founded upon the assumption that the master ought to have known of something which he did not actually know."

It is true the superintendent saw the crack from which he testified he saw gas escaping; but he further testified that that frequently occurred, and no evil results or dangers followed; that cracks appeared during the coking part of the process, when the still bottom had ample strength to sustain the weight resting upon it; and that, in an experience of about 25 years in the oil-refining business, he had never before known of such an accident occurring; and that, if no cracks were shown by sweating or seepage when the still was charged with cold oil before the fire was started, it was always considered safe for that run, unless the sagging of the bottom was unusual; and as to the condition of the still at the time it was charged for that run the plaintiff had, or should have had, full knowledge, while the superintendent had no knowledge, and had a right to rely upon plaintiff having discharged his duty in that regard, and we have already seen that the giving way of the bottom was wholly unexpected by both. If, therefore, we assume that the plaintiff had continued his inspection after each run, as it was his duty to do, and found no indications of dangerous weakness at the time the still was charged, neither the plaintiff nor the defendant were guilty of any negligence, and in such case there is no liability; and, if the inspections were not continued by the plaintiff, the superintendent, having the right to rely upon the plaintiff having discharged his duty and made the required inspection at the beginning of the run, was, through the fault of the plaintiff, in ignorance of facts essential to the formation of an intelligent opinion as to the condition of the still, and whether or not there was danger in being near it. Several exceptions were taken to instructions given to the jury, some of which we think were rightly taken, but, in view of the full discussion of the case, we think it not necessary to discuss them here. They will sufficiently appear from what has been said. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

VAN FLEET, J. The controversy herein arises from conflicting applications made to the surveyor general of the state to purchase certain unsurveyed lands situated on the margin of Owen's Lake, in Inyo county, and uncovered by the receding waters of the lake, lying between the present shore or water line and the original meander line previously established by the United States government survey; the applications being made under and in pursuance of "An act regulating the sale of lands uncovered by the recession or drainage of inland lakes," etc. St. 1893, p. 341. The features of that act material to our present consideration are:

"Section 1. Any person desiring to purchase any of the lands uncovered by the recession or drainage of the waters of inland lakes, and inuring to the state by virtue of her sovereignty, * * * shall make an application therefor to the surveyor general of the state, which application shall be accompanied by applicant's affidavit that he is a citizen of the United States, or has declared his intention to become such, a resident of this state, of lawful age, that he desires to purchase such lands (describing the same by legal subdivisions, or by metes and bounds, if the legal subdivisions are unknown) under the provisions of this act; that he desires to purchase the same for his own use and benefit, and for the use and benefit of no other person or persons whomsoever, and that he has made no contract or agreement to sell the same, and that he does not own any state lands which, together with that now sought to be purchased, exceeds six hundred and forty acres.

"Sec. 2. Upon the filing of said application, when the land has not been sectionized, the surveyor-general shall authorize the county surveyor of the county where the whole or the greater portion of the land lies to survey the same, who shall make an actual survey thereof, at the expense of the applicant, establishing four corners to each quarter-section, and connecting the same with a United States survey; he must within thirty days file with the surveyor-general a copy, under oath, of his field notes and plat, and a statement, under oath, showing whether or not the land is occupied by any actual settler."

The defendant's application and the survey in pursuance thereof were made prior to the filing of plaintiff's application, and the validity of defendant's application is the only question which demands consideration, since, in the view we take, it determines the rights of the parties. That application, as found by the court and as conceded by respondent, conformed in its statements to all the requirements of the statute, both in form and substance, and, if the material statements therein were true, established defendant's prior right to purchase the land in dispute.

The land, not having been previously surveyed or sectionized, was described in defendant's application by metes and bounds. Upon survey by the county surveyor, under the authority and direction of the surveyor general, it was found that the exterior lines of the tract described in the application contained an acreage in excess of 640, the maximum which defendant was entitled to purchase; and thereupon the surveyor, in closing his lines on the south end of the tract, excluded all except an area sufficient, according to his figures, to make a tract embracing 639.53 acres in extent, and duly returned such survey to the office of the surveyor general. By a computation made at the trial, however, and admitted in evidence, it was disclosed that the surveyor had in fact, though unintentionally, made a mistake in his figures, and had included within the lines of his survey a tract embracing about 642 acres, whereupon defendant at once offered to and did relinquish and abandon any claim to such excess. The court below, while finding that the defendant was not the owner of any other state lands than those sought to be purchased, and that he, "when he embraced in his said application a tract of land containing more than six hundred and forty acres, did so innocently, unintentionally, and through a mistake as to the amount of land embraced within the description in his said application, and that he did not do so knowingly, willfully, fraudulently, or with intent to apply for or obtain title to more land than the law authorized him to apply for or obtain title to"; "that the said county surveyor, without the knowledge of the defendant, did make errors in making his computations of the areas of the several lots of lands described in the said field notes of the said survey made by him as set forth in defendant's answer filed in this action, and in reporting 639.53 acres as the total area of all the lots of land therein described;" and that defendant's application was in all other respects true, —found and concluded "that by reason of the excess of land over and above six hundred and forty acres, applied for and described in said application No. 58 of said defendant, the following statement contained in the aforesaid affidavit of defendant, to wit, 'that I do not own any state lands which, together with that now sought to be purchased, exceed six hundred and forty acres,' was and is not true." And by reason of that conclusion the court gave judgment against the defendant.

In reaching this conclusion the court below very evidently, and as disclosed by an opinion found in the record, proceeded upon the theory, now urged by respondent in support of the judgment, that the statement required by the statute, that the applicant "does not own any state land which, together with that now sought to be purchased, exceeds six hundred and forty acres," is the equivalent of requiring the statement of the fact that the tract embraced in the application contains that much land and no more; that this statement is a material one, and, being found untrue in this case, it vitiated defendant's application, and rendered it wholly invalid as a basis of a right to purchase, under section 3500 of the Political Code, which provides that any "false statement" contained in the affidavit there provided for "defeats the right of the applicant to purchase the land," etc. Whether this section of the Political Code may be regarded as having any application to the provisions of the act under consideration, which in no way refers to it in terms, need not be determined, for we are satisfied that the construction contended for by respondent cannot obtain. The very terms of the act refute the idea that it was the intention to require the applicant to state the precise and exact quantity of land embraced in the exterior lines of his description. No such requirement is found in the act, either in terms or by necessary implication. To the contrary, the act expressly contemplates the sale thereunder of lands which have not, at the date of application, been surveyed, and the exact extent in acreage of which cannot, therefore, in the nature of things, be the subject of definite ascertainment or knowledge at that time, by any means therein provided. And in view, doubtless, of that fact, the act provides in terms for a description of the tract sought to be purchased by "metes and bounds,"—a character of designation in its very nature tending to negative the necessity of exactitude in the matter of quantity, or anything more than an approximate estimate thereof. The statute does intend that an applicant shall not seek or have the right in any case to purchase more than a certain limited number of acres, according to the extent of ownership, if any, of other state lands. But the fact that the description in his application may inadvertently, or by mistake, include more than the amount of land which he is entitled to purchase, is not in any way inconsistent with the idea that he is nevertheless seeking in good faith to purchase only so much as the law authorizes. The very evident contemplation of the statute is that the description, at least in the case of unsurveyed lands, shall be such as to enable the surveyor to identify the tract to be surveyed, but that the quantity of land which the applicant is entitled to purchase under the facts stated in his application is to be ascertained by the official survey made under the direction and authority of the surveyor general, and that the survey is intended to constitute the basis upon which the approval of the application is to be had. Any other construction would render the act inoperative as a means of securing title to unsurveyed lands, since no applicant could venture, at the peril of forfeiting his right to purchase, to state with exact precision the number of acres embraced within a given tract.

It is said that the question of quantity may be readily determined by a preliminary unofficial survey by the applicant. But no such method is suggested or countenanced by the act. On the contrary, the necessity of such a step is negated by the provision allowing a description by metes and bounds. The legislature very evidently recognized the inherent impossibility of an applicant making oath to something which, in the nature of things, he could not personally know. No one could pretend to state positively the exact acreage in a given tract even of surveyed land, unless he knew, of his own knowledge, the correctness of the surveyor's lines; and even then the area would depend upon a matter of computation, in which mistakes very frequently arise. That even surveyors make mistakes in their lines and computations is matter of common knowledge, and is evidenced by the facts before us in this case.

The case presented is not unlike in principle that which arises under a location of a mining claim under the statutes of the United States, where it is provided that no applicant shall be entitled to a claim or location exceeding certain fixed dimensions. It has been the uniform rule of decision in such cases that a mere mistake in including in the boundaries of the location an excess above that authorized by law does not vitiate the location. The excess only is rejected and the location held good, to the limit which the locator is permitted to purchase. Mining Co. v. Rose, 114 U. S. 576, 5 Sup. Ct. 1055; Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 528, 531, 14 Pac. 182; Doe v. Tyler, 73 Cal. 21, 23, 14 Pac. 375. And the case is not without analogy in Fairbanks v. Lampkin, 101 Cal. 520, 36 Pac. 6, where it was held that a mistake in describing all the land applied for as suitable for cultivation, whereas it was found that one legal subdivision thereof was not of that character, defeated the applicant's right to purchase only as to the latter portion. Of course, the mere mistake of the surveyor in including an excess of land within the lines of his survey did not affect or defeat the defendant's right to purchase to the limit authorized under the statute (Hinckley v. Fowler, 43 Cal. 56); and defendant, in relinquishing and abandoning any claim to such excess, did all that he was called upon to do in the premises. Under the facts found by the court, the defendant's application was clearly valid. The finding as to the falsity of that application in the particular mentioned was not a finding of fact, but an erroneous conclusion of law, not supported by the facts. There is nothing in the line of cases relied upon by plaintiff at variance with the conclusion we have reached. Those cases all involve instances where the application was found defective as to some substantive and essential fact required to bring it within the law. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment upon the findings establishing the validity of defendant's application.

In bank. On rehearing. Denied.

For report in department, see 53 Pac. 689.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this cause. It is very clear to my mind that the superior court erred in denying plaintiff's motion to be relieved from his stipulation waiving a jury trial. By amendment of the pleadings, new issues had been raised properly triable by jury, and the waiver of the right to a jury trial upon one issue was not a waiver of the right as to other issues. The order overruling the motion was an order of the court, not of the department or of the judge of that department. The plaintiff had taken and presented his exception to the order, and to have the benefit of that exception was not, in my opinion, obliged to renew his motion on the same ground when the cause came before another department for trial.

QUIGG v. EVANS, Mayor, et al. (S. F. 1,198.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—HARBOR MASTER—ABOLITION OF OFFICE—ALLOWANCE OF FEES—DISCRETION OF CITY COUNCIL—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATUTES.

1. Pol. Code, §§ 2567-2572, creates a board of harbor commissioners for the port of Eureka, and prescribes its powers and duties. Pol. Code, § 2570, makes the town marshal of Eureka the harbor master. The act incorporating the town as a city (St. 1873-74, p. 91, § 9) provided that the city marshal, in addition to his other duties, should be the harbor master. St. 1895, p. 355, abolished the office of city marshal, and made no provision for any other officer of the city to perform the duties of harbor master. Held, that the office of harbor master was not thereby abolished, and that the governor could fill the vacancy under Const. art. 5, § 8, which empowers him to fill vacancies in offices where no mode is provided for filling the vacancy by granting a commission to expire when the next legislature meets.

2. Neither Const. art. 11, § 12, which prohibits the legislature from imposing taxes upon municipalities for municipal purposes, but which provides that it may by general laws vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes, nor section 4 of article 11 of the old constitution, which required uniformity of town governments throughout the state, nor section 13 of article 11 of the old constitution requiring uniformity of taxation, are violated by the allowance by harbor commissioners of the fees of a harbor master some of whose services were performed outside the city, but were for the benefit of the city, where such commissioners are residents of the city, and its mayor is an ex officio member.

3. Under Pol. Code, § 2568, which authorizes the board of harbor commissioners of Eureka to make rules and regulations and take such action as may be necessary for the protection of navigation in Humboldt Bay, the harbor master is entitled to pay for services in the bay outside the city, under orders of such board.

4. Under Pol. Code, § 2572, which provides that the fees of the harbor master shall be prescribed by the board of harbor commissioners and paid monthly by the city, upon the certificate of the board of harbor commissioners, the council is not vested with any discretion, but must allow such claim as certified.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county.

Application of John A. Quigg for a writ of mandamus against David Evans, as mayor, and H. H. Buhn, J. S. Connick, P. F. Autonsen, W. W. Christie, and H. A. Poland, as councilmen, of the city of Eureka. From a judgment granting the writ, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. J. Monroe, for appellants. L. F. Puter and Mahan & Mahan, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Mandamus. The facts are agreed. Plaintiff was duly appointed and commissioned harbor master of the port of Eureka, Humboldt county, June 2, 1897, by the governor, and he duly qualified June 9th, and entered upon the performance of his duties as such harbor master, and is still performing said duties. On June 12th the board of harbor commissioners duly made and entered its order fixing the fees of said harbor master at $2.50 for each day's work as such. He performed certain services between June 9, 1897, and August 1, 1897, amounting to $112.50, for which said board of harbor commissioners issued certificates approving and allowing the same. Plaintiff duly presented said certificates to defendants, and demanded that they issue or cause to be issued warrants on the city treasurer of the city of Eureka for said amount, which was refused, and defendant rejected said claims. The city of Eureka has a population of 8,000 people, and is the principal point on Humboldt bay, and carries on commerce with all of the places mentioned in defendants' answer (certain ports and towns on the waters of the bay and its estuaries) which are outside the limits of the city of Eureka. The services performed by plaintiff at all these various points was a benefit to the city of Eureka, and assisted in stimulating its commerce. Certain of the outside places are shipping points, from which commerce is carried on with Eureka, San Francisco, and other points. Humboldt bay is 14 miles long, and has a tidal area of 28 square miles, 35 miles of navigable channels, and an available water front of about 50 miles. Eureka is situated about 3 miles northeast of the ocean entrance thereto. The agreed statement of facts then locates many shipping points on the bay and its waters, and their relation to Eureka, and gives the report of plaintiff describing his services as harbor master in detail. The court gave judgment for plaintiff, directing the writ to issue commanding defendants to issue warrants as prayed for. Defendants appeal, the agreed statement of facts to be treated as if presented by a bill of exceptions.

Appellants claim (1) That there is not now, and never was, such an office as harbor master for Eureka; (2) and, if there was, it was abolished by the present charter of the city; (3) that the legislature could not compel the city to pay for services outside the city limits; (4) that whatever liability there may be is limited to the harbor master's fees for "enforcing and carrying into effect the rules and regulations" adopted by the board of harbor commissioners; (5) that, if the claim is illegal in part, the council could reject it as a whole; and (6) that this is not a case for mandamus.

1. The first and important question is, has the law created the office of harbor master for the port of Eureka, and, if so, did it exist when plaintiff was appointed? The act of April 4, 1870 (St. 1869-70, p. 744), is an act entitled "An act to create a board of harbor commissioners for the port of Eureka, on Humboldt bay, and to prescribe their powers and duties." The first section creates a board of three commissioners whose duties are prescribed by the act. The chairman of the board of supervisors of Humboldt county and the president of the board of trustees of the town of Eureka are declared to be ex officio members of the board of harbor commissioners, the third member to be appointed by the governor. Section 2 prescribes the duties of the board. Section 3 gives it power to impose certain penalties. Section 4 provides as follows: "The town marshal of said town shall be the harbor master of the port of Eureka, whose duty it shall be to enforce and carry into effect such rules and regulations as the board of harbor commissioners shall, from time to time, adopt and publish, and to report to said board any and all violations thereof." Section 5 prescribes the compensation of the members of the board. Section 6 provides as follows: "The fees of the harbor master shall be as prescribed by the board of commissioners hereby created, and shall be paid monthly, by the board of trustees of the town of Eureka, upon the certificate of said board of commissioners, except such fees as may be provided to be otherwise paid by said board of commissioners." This act was substantially carried into the Political Code as originally enacted, by sections 2567-2572, inclusive. Sections 2570 and 2572 correspond with sections 4 and 6 of the act of 1870. Section 2570 now reads: "The town marshal of Eureka is the harbor master of the port of Eureka. He must enforce and carry into effect," etc. The office corresponding to that of harbor master, created by the acts relating to the harbors of San Francisco and San Diego, is called "chief wharfinger." The city of Eureka was incorporated by act of February 10, 1874. It repealed the act of 1859 by which the town of Eureka was incorporated, and created certain offices, among them a city marshal. St. 1873-74, p. 91. Section 9 provided as follows: "The city marshal, in addition to the duties prescribed by section 4389 of the Political Code, shall be harbor master of the port of Eureka. The mayor, in addition to his other powers, shall be ex officio harbor commissioner for the port of Eureka." February 8, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 355), the legislature approved the "freeholders' charter" of the city of Eureka which superseded the charter of 1874. It repealed the office of city marshal. No provision was made therein for any officer of the city to perform the duties of harbor master. The board was left without an executive officer until June 9, 1897, when plaintiff qualified under his appointment by the governor. This appointment was made under the provisions of section 8, art. 5, of the constitution, which reads: "When any office from any cause becomes vacant, and no mode is provided by the constitution and law for filling such vacancy, the governor shall have the power to fill such vacancy by granting a commission, which shall expire at the end of the next session of the legislature or at the next election by the people." It seems to us that when the board of harbor commissioners was created by the act of 1870, and when its provisions were reenacted in the Political Code, the legislature contemplated that there should be connected with that board an executive officer to be known as "harbor master." The language of the law does not distinctly so declare, but we think it clearly inferable that such was the intent of the law. How could it be said that "the town marshal shall be the harbor master of the port of Eureka, whose duty shall be to enforce," etc., unless there was to be such office? If the legislature had intended merely to add certain duties relating to this board to those already imposed upon the marshal relating to the board of town trustees, there would have been no necessity for mentioning the name of the office of harbor master. Instead of saying, "the town marshal of said town shall be the harbor master, whose duty it shall be to enforce," etc., it would have said, "the town marshal of said town shall enforce," etc. Section 6 of the act provides that "the fees of the harbor master shall be as prescribed by the board," etc. Here it seems to us is a clear recognition of the office. This is further shown by the act of 1874, section 9 of which provides that the city marshal shall, in addition to his other duties, be harbor master. In the performance of the duties prescribed the marshal was acting as harbor master, and not performing added duties as marshal. These duties concerned the public, and the compensation came from the public treasury. "An office is the right to exercise a public function or employment and to take the fees and emoluments belonging to it." 3 Kent, Comm. 454. The duties devolved upon the harbor master at the port of Eureka were much less complicated than those required of the chief wharfinger at the port of San Francisco or the port of San Diego, and might at the time well be placed in the hands of the town marshal; but it is the nature of the duties to be performed, and not their extent, which makes a public office and a public officer. When the freeholders' charter was adopted in 1895 the office of city marshal was abolished, and no provision was made for any officer of the city government to perform the duties of harbor master. But we do not think that sections 2570 and 2572 of the Political Code were repealed, except so far as they relate to the duties of the marshal. The office of harbor master remained. No person being designated by law to perform the duties, the office of harbor master became vacant. There being no mode specially provided by law or by the constitution for filling such vacancy, the governor was authorized to do so under the provision of the constitution already quoted.

2. Appellants contend that the legislature could not compel the city to pay claims for services rendered outside the city limits. The account rendered by plaintiff and the agreed facts show that a part of his services were performed at points on Humboldt bay outside the city limits, but it was agreed that this work "was a benefit to the city of Eureka, and served the necessary purpose of assisting and stimulating the commerce of said city." It was also agreed that the city of Eureka "is the principal shipping point on Humboldt bay, and carries on commerce with all the places" where plaintiff performed any service. It was also agreed that the harbor commissioners made an order "fixing the fees of the harbor master at two dollars and a half per day for each day's work," and that the claims of plaintiff presented and allowed were for fees for services as harbor master. It is said that section 12, art. 11, of the new constitution is violated by imposing this burden of caring for the whole bay upon the city of Eureka. The article referred to prohibits the legislature from imposing taxes upon municipalities for municipal purposes, "but may by general laws vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes." But section 2572, Pol. Code, was passed before the new constitution, and it is conceded by appellants that "section 3 of the charter of 1873-74 and of the freeholders' charter of 1895, of Eureka, makes the present city liable for obligations that pertain to the preceding city and town." Section 1 of article 22 of the new constitution would seem to justify this concession. It is claimed, however, that the tax was unauthorized by the old constitution and we are cited to section 4, art. 11, of that constitution, requiring that "the legislature shall establish a system of town governments which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable throughout the state"; and to section 13 of the same article, requiring taxation "to be equal and uniform throughout the state"; and also to People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15; Hoagland v. City of Sacramento, 52 Cal. 142. We are unable to discover any infraction of these provisions in the legislation now challenged. In the early act the mayor of the town and the chairman of the board of supervisors were ex officio members of the board of harbor commissioners, and in the acts of 1873-74 and 1895 the mayor was a member, and the other two were required to be appointed from residents of the city, so that the tax was to be imposed by the local authorities and not by the legislature. We do not think the provisions of the old constitution relied upon were designed to place any restraint upon the legislature in creating boards of harbor commissioners and in prescribing their powers and duties. The nature of these duties, and the infrequency of occasion to create boards to discharge them, forbade anything like a system of legislation which could be uniform throughout the state, or even among the few ports of entry in the state. Each port of entry and harbor called for legislation adapted to its peculiar condition and location and surroundings.

While it is admitted that some of the services were actually performed outside the city, for example, removing sunken logs so as to clear the channel from obstructions, all parties agreed that it was for the benefit of the port of Eureka and aided her commerce, although incidentally benefiting other points. Section 2568, Pol. Code, provides that "the board of harbor commissioners of the port of Eureka are authorized and empowered to make such rules and regulations, and take such action, as may be necessary or proper for the protection of navigation in Humboldt bay, or in any slough or creek emptying into the same so far as the tide ebbs and flows." Section 2569 confers even broader powers, and clearly gives the board jurisdiction beyond the city limits of Eureka. What the board may do, or where it may go, in the exercise of its powers, it may cause to be done by its executive officer, the harbor master, for it is made his duty "to enforce and carry into effect such rules and regulations as the board of harbor commissioners may from time to time adopt and publish." We see no reason why this officer should not be employed by the board to do for it what the law authorizes the board itself to do or cause to be done, to wit: "Prevent and remove obstructions to the regular ebb and flow of the tides," etc. Section 2569.

3. It is finally urged that this is not a case for mandamus. Section 2572, Pol. Code, provides that "the fees of the harbor master are prescribed by the board of commissioners, and paid monthly by the board of trustees of the town of Eureka, upon the certificate of the board of commissioners." Appellants contend that the claim of the harbor master should be presented to and passed upon by the council of the city of Eureka as any other claim, with the discretion in the council to approve or reject it, and that if rejected the charter (section 179), provides a remedy; that the charter "supersedes all laws inconsistent with such charter" (Const. art. 11, § 8); and that section 2572, supra, is inconsistent with the provisions of the charter and is superseded by it. If the harbor commissioners have the power to fix the fees, then it cannot rest with the council to reject. If the council is charged with the discretion to approve or reject the claim of the harbor master after the harbor commissioners have fixed his compensation, it would be within the power of the council to defeat the law by which the harbor commissioners act. We do not think that it was the intention of the charter to supersede, nor has it the effect of superseding, the sections of the political Code relating to the harbor commissioners.

and the harbor master. Section 53 of the new charter recognizes the existence of the harbor commissioners, and provides that the mayor shall be "ex officio harbor commissioner of the port of Eureka." Under the law the compensation of the harbor master is fixed by the commissioners at $2.50 per day, and the law says (section 2572, supra) this must be "paid monthly by the board of trustees of the town of Eureka, upon the certificate of the board of commissioners." No question is made of the former liability of the municipality. If it be said that there is no longer a "town of Eureka," and therefore the section of the Code does not apply to the "city of Eureka," section 3 of the new charter answers: "The said city of Eureka * * * shall be subject to all the obligations, debts, liabilities, dues and duties of the existing municipality." We think the law as it now exists specially enjoins upon the city the duty of paying the harbor master's fees as fixed by the harbor commissioners, and that upon their certificate being presented it became the duty of the council to order a warrant drawn in favor of plaintiff for the amount certified by the harbor commissioners. Section 1085, Code Civ. Proc., provides that the writ of mandate may issue in such case. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BURNS. (Cr. 389.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1898.)

POLICE COURTS—ABOLITION—CLERK OF COURT—VERIFICATION OF INFORMATION—CRIMINAL LAW —SEPARATE EXAMINATION—GRAND LARCENY—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A police court established in Los Angeles, under St. 1885, p. 213, providing for police courts in cities of between 30,000 and 100,000 inhabitants, is not abolished by a census showing a population of over 100,000, taken under St. 1897, p. 28, providing for a state census of any city, where St. 1883, p. 24, fixes the United States census as the basis of enumeration for the purpose of classifying municipal corporations.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2093, empowering every clerk of court authorized to take testimony to administer oaths, the police clerk of Los Angeles has authority to administer an oath by which a verification to an information is made, notwithstanding Pen. Code, § 811, requiring a complaint on which a warrant of arrest is issued to be sworn to before a magistrate.

3. The statute does not confer on one jointly charged with another the right to a separate examination before the magistrate.

4. Even though the statute conferred on one jointly charged with another the right to a separate examination, error in refusing it would not be jurisdictional.

5. The information charged that accused did "take, steal, and carry away from the person of W. M. one gold-filled case watch and chain, and one diamond ring." Held that, though the description of the property was very general, the offense was sufficiently described, which was all that was necessary.

6. No injury can result from the court changing an instruction that the jury must be convinced of the guilt of defendant beyond "all" reasonable doubt, to "a" reasonable doubt.

7. Where two witnesses testified to seeing accused in the act of removing a ring from the cravat of a sleeping person, though they could not see the ring on account of accused's hand being in the way, but had seen it on the cravat, and noticed afterwards that it was gone, it cannot be said that the prosecution relied entirely or mainly on circumstantial evidence; and instructions based on such an assumption were properly refused.

8. Where a witness as to good moral character of accused was asked on cross-examination a question hinting at a former crime of accused, which, with the answer, was stricken out, and it was not shown to have been asked in bad faith and without grounds for expecting an affirmative answer, it is not ground for a new trial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

John Burns was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment and a denial of a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Tanner & Taft, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and this appeal was taken by him from the judgment, and from a denial of a new trial.

1. The first point made is that the court erred in overruling the defendant's motion to set aside the information because the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate. This is based upon the contention that there is legally no such officer as the clerk of the police court of Los Angeles, before whom the complaint upon which the warrant of arrest was issued purported to have been sworn to; and it is further contended that, conceding the existence of such an officer, still such officer is not a magistrate, and, under section 811 of the Penal Code, the complaint must be sworn to before a magistrate. The first proposition was decided adversely to the appellant in Re Mitchell (Cal.) 52 Pac. 799. The second proposition was also decided adversely to him in People v. Vosalo (Cal.) 52 Pac. 305.

2. It is also contended that the defendant was not properly committed, because he was jointly charged with one Tollman, and demanded from the magistrate a separate examination. The statute does not confer this right upon an accused person, and, if it did, the denial of it is not a ground for setting aside the information. Such an error (granting it to be one) would not be jurisdictional.

3. A demurrer to the information was interposed, and upon that the point is made that the description of the property alleged to have been stolen is insufficient. It is charged that the accused did "take, steal, and carry away from the person of Walter McStay one gold-filled case watch and chain, and one diamond ring." The description is a very general one; but the fact that the property is charged to have been stolen from the person of Walter McStay will prevent any embarrassment at the trial, and any difficulty in establishing a plea of former jurisdiction in the possible event of a second prosecution. The offense is sufficiently described, and that is all that is necessary.

4. The contention that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict cannot be maintained. The evidence is ample, though conflicting.

5. In the instruction to the effect that the jury must be convinced of the guilt of the defendant "beyond all reasonable doubt," the court changed the word "all" to "a." The difference made, counsel has not been able to state; but they think that the fact of the change may have induced the jury to believe that the word "all" was too comprehensive, and that they need only be convinced beyond some particular reasonable doubt. Why the judge made the change I cannot imagine, nor yet how any injury could result from the change.

6. The court refused two instructions in regard to circumstantial evidence. One refers to criminal cases, "where the prosecution rely upon circumstantial evidence for a conviction"; the other case "where circumstantial evidence is relied upon to connect a defendant with the commission of a public offense." It cannot be said that the reliance in this case was entirely or mainly upon circumstantial evidence. I think two of the witnesses testified to seeing the defendant in the act of removing the ring from the cravat of the prosecuting witness, while he was asleep. True, they could not see the ring during the operation, for the hand of the defendant was in the way; but they had seen the ring upon the cravat, and saw him apparently slipping it off, and noticed, after the operation, that it was gone. This can hardly be said to be a case of circumstantial evidence.

7. One Summerville was examined as a witness on behalf of the defendant to prove his good moral character. On cross-examination the district attorney asked him who he had heard speak of the defendant. The witness mentioned one Mr. Davis, who was an attorney, and said that Mr. Davis had said defendant was a nice man. He was asked if Mr. Davis had not said that Burns had paid him in full for defending him upon a charge of larceny. The witness replied, "He did not." At this point the defendant objected, and asked the court to strike out the evidence, which the court did. It is contended that this was misconduct on the part of the district attorney, and that a new trial should be had on that ground. Whether the district attorney was guilty of misconduct or not depends upon whether the question was asked in good faith or not. If the district attorney had reason to think there was no truth in the charge of former delinquency so hinted at, his conduct was most reprehensible; but we have no right to assume that such was the case. If the district attorney did have reason to expect an affirmative answer, it is not entirely clear that the examination was not proper. At all events, it is not so plain that we can say that the question was not asked in good faith, and that it was not proper to take the judgment of the court upon the subject.

Objection is made to the refusal to give two other instructions, not noticed heretofore; but it is evident as to them that the court was only asked to repeat charges already given, and there can be no benefit in our going over them seriatim. The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LONG (two cases). (Cr. 405, 402.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—RECORD.

Order sustaining demurrer to indictment can be reviewed only on exceptions and bill of exceptions provided by Pen. Code, §§ 1172, 1174, there being no judgment roll or record in a criminal case, except on conviction (section 1207).

Department 2. Appeals from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Demurrers to indictments against S. C. Long and Ida Long were sustained, and the people appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. Chas. R. Gray, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. These two appeals involve the same questions, presented upon facts in all respects similar. Each is taken from an order sustaining a demurrer to an indictment for perjury. There are no bills of exceptions in the transcripts, and respondents make the point that there are here no records upon which the appeals can be heard. There does not seem to be any judgment roll or record in a criminal case except upon conviction. Pen. Code, § 1207. It is by virtue of that section only, making the minutes of the court a part of the judgment roll, that the minutes get into and become a part of the record on appeal. Section 1007 of the Penal Code provides that upon a demurrer being submitted the court shall give judgment either allowing or sustaining it, and an order to that effect shall be entered upon the minutes. Conceding that this order can be regarded as a final judgment in a case like this, where the case is ordered to be resubmitted, the statute does not provide for a judgment roll or a record of any kind except through a bill of exceptions. If the order is a judgment, still the exceptions to the ruling, though properly enough entered in the minutes, are not a part of the judgment rendered by the court. Sections 1172 and 1174 provide for exceptions and for a bill of exceptions to this very ruling. It may well be held that these provisions are exclusive of any other mode of obtaining a review, even when there is a judgment roll. But, however that may be, there can be no possible doubt about it in a case like this, where there is no other mode provided for a record upon appeal. There being no legal record from which we can determine whether the court erred, the orders or portions of the orders appealed from are affirmed in each case.

PEOPLE v. GEORGE. (Cr. 404.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 21, 1898.)

CRIMINAL LAW—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

The misstatement of the name of an affiant in a complaint charging an offense will not invalidate subsequent proceedings based on such complaint, which was subscribed by affiant.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; J. K. Law, Judge.

Information against James George for felonious assault. Appeal by the people from an order sustaining a motion to set aside information. Reversed.

Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for appellant. V. G. Frost, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an appeal taken by the people from an order of the superior court sustaining a motion of the respondent to set aside the information, which charged him with felonious assault upon Frank Botano. The motion was made "upon the ground that before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate for the offense charged in the information." The point rests entirely upon the alleged insufficiency of the complaint made before the magistrate upon the preliminary examination. The part of said complaint necessary to be considered is as follows: "Personally appeared before me this 4th day of October, A. D. 1897, Frank Bartino, of Merced, the county of Merced, who, first being duly sworn, complains and accused James George of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder, committed as follows: That said James George, on or about the 3d day of October, A. D. 1897, at and in the said county of Merced, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously assault affiant, the said Frank Bartino, with a deadly weapon, with the intent then and there to kill and murder the said affiant. * * * Said complainant, therefore, prays that a warrant may be issued for the arrest of the said James George, and that he may be dealt with according to law. Frank Botano. Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 4th day of October, A. D. 1897. Jno. Naffziger, Justice of the Peace No. 2 Township, County of Merced." We think that upon these facts the court erred in setting aside the information. The preliminary examination and the commitment following it were certainly not void on account of any defect in the complaint. The most that can be said against the complaint is that it is somewhat ambiguous. The justice before whom the affidavit was made recites, at the commencement of it, that Frank Bartino "personally appeared before me," etc.; but in the body of the instrument the affiant testifies that the defendant, George, feloniously assaulted "affiant," and the affidavit is subscribed by Frank Botano, as affiant; and, as thus subscribed, it was certified by the justice to have been "subscribed and sworn to" before him. It is clear enough that Frank Botano was the person who was the affiant and made oath that the assault was made upon him; and the word "Bartino" was evidently inserted by mistake. The fact that in the recital the justice misstated the name of the real affiant, who actually subscribed the complaint, could not have prejudiced the respondent; and there is no doubt that he could successfully protect himself against any other prosecution for the offense charged. The court below directed the district attorney to file a new information, but it is difficult to see how a better one could be prepared. The information was sufficient in form and substance, and it does not appear "that before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate." The order appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE v. BRENNAN. (Cr. 364.)

THREATENING LETTERS—INFORMATION—EVIDENCE—STIPULATION.

1. An information which, after elimination of the word "extortion" in the general designation of the offense with which the accusation opens, properly charges the sending of a threatening letter with intent to extort money, will be held to charge the latter offense.

2. Evidence taken on a preliminary examination on one charge cannot, on subsequent stipulation that it be considered the evidence on another charge, be given in evidence on trial of the latter case; Pen. Code, § 686, providing merely that in a criminal action, where the charge has been preliminarily examined before a committing magistrate and the testimony taken down by question and answer in the presence of defendant, who has had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness, the deposition may be read, on its being shown that the witness is dead.

3. Stipulation, on preliminary examination of one charge, that there be considered, as evidence thereon, evidence taken on the examination of another charge, is not a stipulation that on the trial of the case the evidence be admissible without regard to objections to its relevancy, materiality, and competency.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Nicholas Brennan was convicted of sending a threatening letter with intent to extort money, and appeals. Reversed.

E. L. Forster and Richard Gibson, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. An information was filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco which accused defendant "of the crime of felony, to wit, extortion," in that he, with intent to extort money from one Theresa Tarpey, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously sent her a letter which expressed and implied a threat to do her person an unlawful injury. The letter is set out in full. The defendant was convicted, and this appeal is taken from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. At the proper time the defendant moved the court to set aside the information because it did not comply with certain sections of the Penal Code, but he did not demur.

It is now contended that the information attempts to charge two offenses, and charges neither effectively. This claim is founded upon the use of the word "extortion" in the general designation of the offense with which the accusation opens. The word can be eliminated, and the information will still be good. Regarded as a charge of sending a threatening letter with the intent of extorting money, the information seems all that can be required. And it is plain that there is no attempt to charge any other offense. The defendant could not have been, and was not, misled by the unnecessary use of the word "extortion."

The charge was fully and accurately explained to the jury by the learned judge of the court. He said: "The real accusation, as set forth in the information, though denominated therein as 'extortion,' is not an accusation of an extortion committed,—an accusation that money was actually obtained by extortion,—but that a threatening letter was sent by the accused with intent to extort money," etc. The defendant had been held upon three criminal charges, in all of which it was alleged that Theresa Tarpey was the victim of the crime charged. The complaints in the several cases, though put in evidence, are not in the transcript. Counsel and the court, in speaking of them, designated them, respectively, as the charge of rape, or the rape case; the charge of extortion; and "taking a female by inducements for the purposes of prostitution, in which Theresa Tarpey is named as the female." The complaint charging the defendant with rape was filed December 4, 1896. The preliminary examination was commenced on the 15th of the same month, and, after some testimony had been taken on the charge of rape, Officer Handley verified and filed with the magistrate the so-called charge of extortion. Mr. Vernon, the stenographer, was examined as a witness, and testified that a stipulation was made to the effect that the testimony taken in the rape case should be considered the evidence in the extortion case. It was made in open court and entered by him in his notes. As to the time or the stage in the proceedings when the stipulation was entered into, the following evidence was given: "Mr. Black: What was the date of that stipulation,—that is, on the charge of extortion? A. That occurred twice. Mr. Van Duzer agreed to that at the time he took the testimony at the house, I believe. Q. What was the stipulation on that very day, though,—what date was that? A. That was the 15th day of December. The examination of witness was entered on the 28th of December. It was continued once or twice before that. The examination of witnesses on the charge of extortion was commenced on the 28th of December, and it was after two witnesses had been examined that this stipulation was entered of record and taken down by me, referring to the testimony that had already been taken on the other charge. That was the stipulation entered into by Mr. Long, who subsequently came into the case. Mr. Forster: Now, Mr. Vernon, what papers—what record—are you taking that stipulation from? A. I was looking at the extortion charge then. I find a stipulation in the extortion charge here. It is: 'Mr. Mogan: It is stipulated that the testimony taken in the rape case be considered as the testimony in this case. Mr. Long: Yes; that is the case for the defense in the extortion matter.' Q. Well, now, wasn't there a stipulation in the record of the rape case also, Mr. Vernon, to that effect? A. Yes, sir. Q. And isn't that stipulation in the extortion record there a copy? Isn't that a part of the same record that is in the rape case? A. No; this is just at the end of the extortion case, before the testimony in the rape case comes on. That is the last thing before the testimony in the rape case comes on. Q. Well, isn't there a good portion of the record in the extortion case exactly the same as the record in the rape case? A. Well, there was additional testimony in the extortion case, and then the whole of the testimony in the rape case went in in the extortion case. Q. So the stipulation you are reading now from the extortion case is not the stipulation as would appear in the rape case, and as having been transferred from one record to the other? A. There was just the one stipulation made at that time,—that was the time that the extortion case was through,—that is, the additional testimony was through. Then that stipulation was made, but Mr. Van Duzer had previously made a stipulation at the house to that effect." Against the objections of defendant, the court then permitted the deposition to be read. It is not objected that the depositions were not properly certified. It is contended that this deposition does not come within the statute, because it is not a deposition taken upon a preliminary examination of the defendant upon the charge upon which he was being tried.

The evidence was offered under the provisions of section 686 of the Penal Code, which, so far as material here, reads as follows: "In a criminal action the defendant is entitled: * * * (3) To produce witnesses on his behalf, and to be confronted with the witnesses against him, in the presence of the court, except that where the charge has been preliminarily examined before a committing magistrate, and the testimony taken down by question and answer in the presence of the defendant, who has, either in person or by counsel, cross-examined or had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness; or where the testimony of a witness on the part of the people, who is unable to give security for his appearance, has been taken conditionally in the like manner in the presence of the defendant, who has, either in person or by counsel, cross-examined or had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness, the deposition of such witness may be read, upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he is dead or insane, or cannot with due diligence be found within the state."

As to that portion of the deposition which was taken before the stipulation was entered into, I can conceive of no theory upon which it can be brought under the provisions of the Code. Such testimony was not taken in the presence of the defendant, upon the charge then on trial.

The contention that none of the testimony was taken upon a preliminary examination of the charge upon which he was being tried is based upon the proposition that the examination was upon a charge for extortion, while the trial was held to be upon a charge for sending a threatening letter with intent to extort money. The complaint upon which the examination was held is not in the record. It is assumed to have been a charge of extortion rather than for sending a threatening letter, because the attorneys and the court, as well as the stenographer, so designated it when it was offered. It was before the court at the trial, and, for aught we know, may in fact have been identical with the present charge.

It is incumbent upon the appellant to make error appear. As in civil cases, where there is a specification of insufficiency of the evidence upon some point, we will presume that all the evidence upon such points has been put into the bill of exceptions. Here the bill contains no specifications as to any insufficiency, unless it be in regard to proof of venue. Under such circumstances, this point cannot be sustained.

The objections having been overruled, the district attorney proceeded to read the deposition of Theresa Tarpey, such witness having died. The threatening letter is alleged to have been sent on the 21st day of December, 1895, and as to dates the testimony corresponds with the allegation. The deposition commences by showing when the witness became acquainted with defendant, and then as follows: "Did you meet him in January, 1895? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you go to any place with him? A. Yes, sir. Q. On or about the 4th day of January, did you go to what place? A. Pacific Heights. Q. In the day or night? A. Night." At this point the following occurred at the trial: "Mr. Forster: We object to all that testimony, if your honor please, as not competent, relevant, or material. This defendant is now being tried on a charge of extortion, having extorted through the alleged sending of a certain letter. Anything outside of that we object to, and in particular all that matter that is being read. The Court: This is the testimony, I understand, that was given before the committing magistrate on the hearing of that charge? Mr. Forster: On the charge of rape; this testimony gets into the case by reason of the fact that it was taken during the preliminary examination on the charge of rape. The Court: But it was stipulated as the evidence also in this extortion case. Mr. Forster: Well, I presume that stipulation would only go so far as the parts are relevant to this case. The Court: It is admissible because it was stipulated; it is what the magistrate had before him; it is what the woman swore to. It seems she is dead, and they can't bring her here. Mr. Forster: Well, we will renew the objection. The Court: Well, I will overrule the objection. Mr. Forster: Exception. Well, I wish, if your honor please, to have a general objection go on record as to all the testimony outside of the actual sending of this letter, and have it understood that that is objected to, and objection overruled and exception taken. Mr. Black: That is the objection; there is no doubt about that (continuing reading)." The witness then proceeded to relate circumstantially the commission of the crime of rape upon her person by the defendant on the 4th day of January, 1895, which was, lacking just 14 days, one year before the sending of the threatening letter. It was not claimed that there was any connection between the charge of rape and the offense for the commission of which defendant was being prosecuted, other than that the testimony was given at the preliminary examination, or, rather, by virtue of the stipulation, was to be deemed as so given. It was not admitted because relevant or material, but "because it was stipulated." No evidence could possibly be better calculated to create a prejudice against the defendant, and nothing could be more obviously irrelevant. Page after page of it was read with remarks of counsel and the judge in the police court. Even there, much of the evidence was objected to, and the judge let it all in without ruling upon its admissibility, taking it subject to a motion to strike out.

The third charge upon which defendant was examined was a charge of enticing a female to become an inmate in a house of prostitution. When this charge was reached during the examination in the police court, as appeared from the notes of the evidence read at the trial, the attention of the witness was called to her complaint. In the superior court the following occurred: "Mr. Forster: We again renew our objection at this point, if your honor please, on the same ground, that all this matter is irrelevant and immaterial, and not bearing on the issues in this case. The Court: Well, it is her testimony, given under this charge, isn't it? Mr. Forster: On the charge of rape, as I understand it. The Court: Of course, I suppose it would be admissible as showing the relations of these parties. Mr. Forster (after discussion): Well, do I understand your honor to let this testimony go in? The Court: Yes, sir. Mr. Forster: Exception. The Court: It goes in by stipulation of counsel and parties. Mr. Forster: Well, if that is the case, just consider that I have objected. With Mr. Black's consent, it is stipulated that I object to all of this testimony outside of the direct testimony in relation to the sending of the letter." The testimony was then read, and contained a long statement of how the defendant enticed her to a disreputable house. His promise to get some one "to show her how," etc. She also stated that he compelled her to go there; that she went because she was afraid of him; and there consorted with Chinamen, giving defendant the wages of her shame.

All this was alleged to have happened some two months after the sending of the threatening letter, and could not have thrown any light upon that charge, and it was not and is not claimed that it did. It was admitted because of the stipulation, and because the witness was dead at the time of the trial. There was no stipulation that the testimony could be read in evidence anywhere. All that the stipulation purported to be was that the evidence taken should be considered as taken in each of the three charges. So far as the preliminary examination was concerned, it should apply to all. There was no intent to stipulate to anything beyond. The deposition was not taken for the purpose of being read as evidence upon the trial. It was so read because of the death of the witness, which was not a thing to be anticipated.

Conceding that the testimony was taken at a preliminary examination upon which he was then being prosecuted, there is no use of a stipulation. The ruling was then based upon the proposition that all the evidence taken before a committing magistrate can, in the event of the death of the witness, be read at the trial, though not relevant, material, or competent, and yet injurious in the highest degree. I shall assume that there is no occasion for argument on such a proposition.

There are other alleged errors in regard to the admission of testimony, but there must be a new trial, and most likely the same rulings will not be repeated. I am not able to make out from the record that the defendant has been denied a speedy trial. It is only fair to the defendant to state that evidence was produced in his behalf which tended to prove that Theresa Tarpey upon her deathbed retracted all that she had said in reference to the charge of rape, and for enticing her to a house of prostitution; that she sent for defendant's mother and sister, and made the retraction to them; and also signed a statement to that effect before a notary, who verified the same as a witness. The defendant, also on oath, denied their truth. Judgment and order reversed, and a new trial granted.

ISAACS v. JONES et al. (Sac. 250.)

In bank. Dissenting opinion. For majority opinion, see 53 Pac. 793.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this cause, and from the decision of the department. The matter in litigation in this action is the amount of surplus assets of the firm of Michael and Bernhard Isaacs, and the respective shares of the parties. Appellant had a lien upon Bernhard's share. Its lien was a valuable interest. The property and its value to which the lien attached not only can be, but must be, determined in the action; and, in my opinion, it is a plain case for intervention.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1898.)

GUARANTY—PARTIES—LIABILITY—CONTRACTS—BREACH—JUDGMENT—VACATION—APPEAL—RECORD.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 2808, providing that the liability of one who guaranties a conditional obligation is commensurate with that of the principal, guarantors of a promise to pay a sum certain out of the profits of a business for a particular year, their agreement being part of the same transaction with the principal obligation, are absolutely liable on the principal's failure to meet his agreement.

2. Where one agreed to pay a fixed sum out of the profits of his business, and, before the close of the season, voluntarily prevented its fulfillment by selling the business, his liability thereupon became fixed.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 1660, establishing a presumption that a promise in the singular number, but signed by several persons, is joint and several, a guaranty, "I, E. C., do hereby guaranty," etc., when subscribed by him and another, cannot be deemed the obligation of only one, with the other as witness merely.

4. Where defendants had prepared a demurrer to the complaint for failure to state a cause of action, but it was, as they claimed, by mistake and excusable neglect, not filed, and default was taken against them, on a motion to open the default such demurrer does not satisfy a rule of court requiring the party moving for such relief to serve a copy of his proposed "answer" with the motion.

5. An appeal from an order cannot be entertained where the record does not contain a copy of the order.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; E. W. Risley, Judge.

Action by F. S. Bagley against E. A. Cohen and others. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appealed from that, and from an order refusing to open a default, and from an order denying a change of place of trial. Affirmed.

Alfred H. Cohen, for appellants. George W. Harlow, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This action is brought against the defendants upon their guaranty of a contract made to the plaintiff by one Gould. The contract is as follows: "On or before sixty days, I, E. H. Gould, do hereby agree to pay to F. S. Bagley, or order, out of the profits realized by me from my business of packing raisins at Malaga, during the present season, the sum of three hundred and ten ($310) dollars, in gold coin of the United States of America. Dated Fresno, September 12, 1894. E. H. Gould. [Seal.]" Prior to the delivery of this contract, and as a part of the same transaction, the defendants subscribed the following guaranty, which was written beneath the contract: "I, E. A. Cohen, do hereby guaranty the payment of the foregoing note in accordance with the conditions thereof. E. A. Cohen [Seal], by L. L. Cory, Agent. Edgar A. Cohen. J. B. Cohen." Within 10 days after the execution of the foregoing instrument, Gould sold and conveyed all his right, title, and interest in and to his business of packing raisins at Malaga, and thereby prevented himself from realizing any profits out of said business. Judgment by default was entered against the defendants, and they have appealed therefrom, upon the ground that the complaint fails to state a cause of action.

The contract of the defendants being a part of the same transaction with the contract of Gould, the two instruments make but a single contract on their part. Hazeltine v. Larco, 7 Cal. 32. Their guaranty that Gould would perform his contract was an original undertaking by them, and their liability as guarantors is commensurate with that of Gould. Civ. Code, § 2808. Their promise that he would perform his contract, "in accordance with the conditions thereof," made them absolutely liable for his failure to perform it when he should be so liable. Otis v. Hazeltine, 27 Cal. 80.

By the sale and conveyance of his business, Gould voluntarily prevented himself from fulfilling his contract according to its terms, by putting it out of his power to make any profits in the business, and his liability became thereupon fixed and absolute. Bish. Cont. § 1426; Whart. Cont. § 885a; Wolf v. Marsh, 54 Cal. 228; Love v. Mabury, 59 Cal. 484; Poirier v. Gravel, 88 Cal. 79, 25 Pac. 962.

The name of E. A. Cohen alone in the body of the guaranty does not make him the sole guarantor. Both of the defendants signed the instrument, and the averment that both of them "made and subscribed it" destroys the contention that J. B. Cohen was only a witness to its execution. Civ. Code, § 1660.

Prior to the entry of judgment, an application was made on behalf of the defendants for a change of the place of trial. They did not appear or answer or demur at the time the motion was made, and the court denied their motion. Code Civ. Proc. § 396. After the judgment was entered, they filed a demurrer to the complaint, together with an affidavit of merits, and gave notice of a motion for an order changing the place of trial, and at the same time gave notice of a motion to set aside their default on the ground of mistake, surprise, and excusable neglect. In support of the latter motion an affidavit of their attorney was filed, to the effect that he had seasonably prepared a demurrer and affidavit of merits, with the notice of his motion and demand for a change of the place of trial, and had instructed his clerk to forward them to an attorney in Fresno, with directions to have them served and filed, but that he did not discover that, through the mistake of his clerk, the demurrer had not been sent until after the default of the defendants had been entered. No affidavit of the clerk was presented showing the character of the mistake, or from which it could be determined whether the neglect was excusable, or why the papers had not been sent. The court denied the motion upon the ground that, under its rules upon such a motion, the moving party must serve with the notice of his motion a copy of the answer he proposed to file. From this order the defendants have also appealed.

The demurrer filed by the defendants was not an "answer," within the meaning of this rule. The only ground stated in the demurrer was the want of facts in the complaint sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and this objection could be presented upon an appeal from the judgment by default, and has been here presented and found untenable. If the complaint states a cause of action, there is a manifest propriety in requiring a defendant who has suffered a default by reason of his neglect to make it appear to the court that he has some defense to the plaintiff's claim, as a condition upon which he shall be relieved from his neglect. In their notice of appeal the defendants state that they appeal also from the second order denying a change of the place of trial, but the record contains no copy of such order. The judgment and orders are affirmed.

SISKIYOU LUMBER & MERCANTILE
CO. v. ROSTEL et al. (Sac. 384.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1898.)

PUBLIC NUISANCE—RIGHT OF INDIVIDUAL TO ABATE—PLEADING.

1. In a private action to abate a public nuisance, the complaint should affirmatively disclose either that there are no other properties than plaintiff's so situated as to be injured by the alleged nuisance, or, if there are such, that they are not injured by it as are plaintiff's.

2. Construction of a building, so that part of it overhangs a street in a town in such a manner that a neighbor's property is rendered more liable to fire than before, thereby increasing the cost of insurance and depreciating the market value of the property, ordinarily gives no right of action to the party aggrieved.

3. Where, in a private action to abate a nuisance, it is necessary to aver the existence or nonexistence of other property owners than plaintiff, an averment that the premises alleged to be injured are in a certain town gives rise to the presumption that there are other property owners therein.

4. In a private action to abate a public nuisance, the complaint should show the relative situations of the nuisance and plaintiff's property.

5. The complaint in a private action to abate a public nuisance alleged that the building that constituted the nuisance was on block 26, and that plaintiff's premises were in blocks 27 and 30, "as designated on the Pacific Improvement Company map of said town." The map was not made a part of the complaint, and it did not appear where it could be found. Held, that the description was insufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by the Siskiyou Lumber & Mercantile Company against H. Rostel and others. From an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint, and a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. H. Magoffey, for appellants. Gillis & Tappscott and J. W. Parker, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. The action is to abate a nuisance and for damages. The complaint alleges as the first cause of action, in substance, that plaintiff is the owner of certain lots in blocks 27 and 30, in the town of Sisson, in Siskiyou county, upon which there are valuable buildings, consisting of dwelling houses, barns, warehouses, and stores, and that defendant Rostel is the owner of lot 17 in block 26, in said town, which last-mentioned property is situated on the northwest corner of Walnut and Castle streets,—public highways; that defendants are erecting a large building on said lot 17, which is being so constructed that the second story thereof, at a height of about 12 feet from the ground, is being extended and projected over and into said Castle street, to a width of 10 feet, and for a length of 60 feet, so that to that extent it overhangs and protrudes into said public highway; and it is alleged in the sixth paragraph of said first count that said building "will constitute a nuisance to this plaintiff by greatly endangering his property and buildings hereinbefore described, and making them more liable to be destroyed by fire, and also by materially increasing the rate of insurance upon the same, and by materially damaging their market value," and, if allowed to be constructed as defendants now intend, will cause damage to plaintiff which cannot be estimated, etc. In the second count the same facts, except those alleged in said sixth paragraph, are reasserted, and alleged to constitute a public nuisance. The prayer is for an injunction, both prohibitory and mandatory, forbidding further construction, and requiring the removal of said building as to that portion which obstructs the street, and for damages and costs. Defendants demurred to the complaint, generally for want of facts, and specially that it does not show wherein plaintiff is injured in any manner different or greater than the general public. The demurrer was overruled, and the propriety of this ruling constitutes the only question which we deem it essential to notice.

It may be inferred, although nowhere expressly so alleged, that the fact relied upon as constituting the nuisance and cause of injury to plaintiff, in the manner of constructing the obnoxious building, is its projection into and over the public highway, as described, since nothing else is alleged which may be regarded as in any way infringing upon plaintiff's rights. Anything which is an obstruction to a public street or highway constitutes a public nuisance. Pen. Code, § 370; Taylor v. Reynolds, 92 Cal. 573, 28 Pac. 688; Marini v. Graham, 67 Cal. 130, 7 Pac. 442; Vanderhurst v. Tholcke, 113 Cal. 147, 150, 45 Pac. 266. And a private individual cannot maintain an action to abate such a nuisance unless it be made to appear by proper averment that the plaintiff will suffer therefrom some injury in its nature special and peculiar to him, and different in kind from that to which the public is thereby subjected. Civ. Code, § 3493; Lewiston Turnpike Co. v. Shasta & W. Wagon-Road Co., 41 Cal. 562; Payne v. McKinley, 54 Cal. 532; McCloskey v. Kreling, 76 Cal. 511, 18 Pac. 433; Gardner v. Stroever, 89 Cal. 26, 26 Pac. 618.

It is alleged that the construction of the building in the manner stated will endanger plaintiff's property by rendering it more liable to fire, by increasing the rate of insurance, and by depreciating its market value. Ordinarily, these are not elements of damage which give a right of action to the aggrieved party. They constitute a detriment, incident to the right of owning and enjoying property in a city or town, and for which there is no redress. McCloskey v. Kreling, supra; Rhodes v. Dunbar, 57 Pa. St. 274. But, assuming that the fact that the alleged endangering of plaintiff's property and injury thereto arising solely from the character of defendant's building as a public nuisance would give plaintiff a right of redress which the law does not otherwise afford (see McCloskey v. Kreling, supra), the complaint is nevertheless fatally defective, in that it wholly fails to show that other and adjacent property owners in the town will not suffer like detriment and injury with the plaintiff. It is true, the complaint does not allege in terms that there are such other property owners; but the pleading in this respect is to be construed most strongly against the pleader (Lewiston Turnpike Co. v. Shasta & W. Wagon-Road Co., supra); and the designation of the premises as "in the town of Sisson" gives rise to the presumption that there are other inhabitants and owners of property therein. The term "town" implies and signifies an aggregation of inhabitants, and a collection of occupied dwellings and other buildings. Klauber v. Higgins, 117 Cal. 451, 460, 49 Pac. 466; Webst. Dict. definition of word "Town." Moreover, if there were no other inhabitants of the town so situated as to be injured by the alleged nuisance, the complaint should in some form affirmatively disclose that fact, since it was essential that it show special injury to the plaintiff. So far as the averments of the complaint are concerned, they do not even show that plaintiff's property is situated next adjacent to that of defendant, nor in its immediate vicinity. For all that appears, it may be widely separated therefrom by the intervening property of others. Aside from the fact that they are alleged to be in the same town, the relative situation of the buildings of plaintiff and that of defendant cannot be determined from the complaint. The lots of plaintiff are alleged to be in blocks 27 and 30, and that of defendant in block 26, "as designated on the Pacific Improvement Company map of said town"; but no such map is made a part of the complaint, nor does it appear where it can be found, and the reference is therefore meaningless as indicating the relative location thereon of said designated blocks, except by mere inference to be deduced from their respective numbers. The complaint therefore fails to state facts from which the conclusion could be drawn that plaintiff will be in any way specially damaged; and, as this was essential to authorize plaintiff to maintain the action, the demurrer should have been sustained. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

FERNANDEZ v. TORMEY et al. (S. F. 858.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1898.)
PLEDGES—WHAT ARE—NEGLIGENCE OF PLEDGEE—CONVERSION—PLEADING—MORT-GAGES—CONSTRUCTION.

1. Mortgagee was accommodation co-maker with the mortgagor on two notes to a bank. A stock-yard company was indebted to the mortgagee in a large sum, evidenced by notes of third persons and a mortgage and contract incident thereto. These securities were assigned to another third person as a pledge holder, to secure said accommodation notes. Mortgagor then executed the mortgage in question to secure his note to the mortgagee, and to secure his said co-maker "against any loss which he may ever sustain by reason of the assignment" of the stock-yard securities, and to "indemnify" him "from any loss by reason of the execution" of the two notes to the bank; and it was further stated that the assignment was by way of security for a third note made by the mortgagor to one S. It was read to the mortgagor, who made no objection. Afterwards a suit by the aforesaid assignee was brought to foreclose the stock-yard mortgage, and this mortgagee was made a defendant, but no personal judgment sought, and the suit not prosecuted, and the stock-yard company shortly became insolvent. The mortgagee paid one of the two notes to the bank, and half of the other. It did not appear that the note to S. was due. The stock-yard securities had meanwhile greatly depreciated in value, and the mortgagor tendered a reassignment of them, a cancellation of the instruments on which mortgagee was jointly indebted, and payment of the sums paid thereon, with interest and counsel fees. Held, that the assignment was a pledge, which did not divest the title of the mortgagee; and hence he did not sustain loss thereby.

2. Where a mortgage was given solely to indemnify the mortgagee from loss as security for the mortgagor's obligations, the circumstance that the mortgage note was absolute in terms is unimportant; and recovery is restricted to the amount actually paid and loss actually sustained, with interest and counsel fees to the time a tender was made.

3. It is not a conversion or a divesting of the pledgor's title in mortgage securities for the pledgee to institute suit to collect same.

4. Where a mortgage was given to indemnify their owner against loss resulting from the pledge of certain securities, the fact that they depreciated in value, and the obligors became insolvent, and the assumed fact that the delay of the pledgee to protect such securities by suit caused the loss, in the absence of allegation or proof that such resulted from the giving of the pledge, does not charge the mortgagor with the loss.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Suit by Bernardo Fernandez against Patrick Tormey and others. From a decree for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appealed. Reversed.

Stanley, Hayes & Bradley and F. W. Hall, for appellants. Gunnison, Booth & Bartnett and W. O. Tinning, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Suit to foreclose a mortgage executed to Bernardo Fernandez, the plaintiff, by defendant Patrick Tormey, on August 23, 1893. At that time, the Union Stock-Yard Company of San Francisco, a corporation, was indebted to Fernandez in the sum of $50,742.12, to fall due, with accruing interest, on August 23, 1893, which indebtedness was evidenced by the promissory note of a certain third person, a mortgage of lands securing the same, and a contract in writing whereby said corporation had assumed and agreed to pay the amount unpaid on said note to Fernandez, and he had released the original maker thereof from personal liability thereon. Said Tormey, having occasion to raise a considerable sum of money, borrowed $45,135.60 from one John A. Stanly, and $16,000 from the Commercial Bank of Vallejo. On said August 23, 1893, the following transactions occurred at the office of said Stanly: Tormey and Fernandez (the latter acting for the accommodation of the former) executed two joint notes, for the sum of $8,000 each, to the said Commercial Bank, payable, with interest, one year from date, and, to secure one of them, Fernandez made to the bank a mortgage of land owned by him; as security for the other, Fernandez and Tormey made a mortgage to the bank of lands owned by them as tenants in common. Tormey executed his note to Stanly for said sum of $45,135.60; and Fernandez made to one Henry Rogers a formal written assignment of the aforesaid note, mortgage, and contract of the stock-yard company, he being informed that Rogers took the same as pledge holder to secure the said note of Tormey to Stanly. Tormey also deposited with Rogers, for the same purpose, other evidences of debt to a large amount. At the same time and place, Tormey made to Fernandez the note and mortgage on which the latter sues in this action. It is first stated in this mortgage that for the purpose of securing payment of a promissory note dated August 23, 1893, copied at length, by which in terms Tormey promised to pay Fernandez the sum of $62,742.12 on or before two years after date, with interest, etc., the mortgagor mortgages to the mortgagee certain described tracts of land. It is then provided that "this mortgage and the note secured hereby are given to secure the said Fernandez against any loss which he may ever sustain by reason of the transfer and assignment by him to Henry Rogers of" the aforesaid obligations of the stock-yard company, particularly described; also "to indemnify and save the said Fernandez harmless from any loss or liability which he may ever sustain by or on account of the execution by him" of said notes and accompanying mortgages for $16,000 to the Commercial Bank. It was further stated in the mortgage that said assignment to Rogers was given as security for the payment of Tormey's note to Stanly, and that said notes to the Commercial Bank were given for money advanced by the bank to Tormey. The mortgage was read to Fernandez, and he made no objection to any of its provisions. On June 24, 1895, Rogers instituted an action in the proper court to foreclose the said mortgage of the Union Stock-Yard Company. Fernandez was joined with the company as a defendant, but no personal judgment was asked against him (Haber v. Brown, 101 Cal. 446, 35 Pac. 1035); and no steps seem to have been taken in that action beyond filing a complaint. On June 27, 1895, said stock-yard company, on its own petition in insolvency, was adjudged an insolvent debtor. On November 19, 1895, Fernandez paid to the Commercial Bank $12,400, satisfying the amount due on the mortgage he had made to the bank for Tormey's accommodation on land owned by himself in severalty, and paying also one-half the amount due on the mortgage which covered land held by himself and Tormey in common. It does not appear whether Tormey's note to Stanly is yet due. November 20, 1895, Fernandez commenced this action. After trial the court found as facts, among other things, that by the assignment of August 23, 1893, the plaintiff conveyed and transferred to Rogers all his right and interest in and to said obligations of the stock-yard company, and that, in consequence thereof, plaintiff has sustained a loss of $50,742.12, the value of those securities at the date of the assignment, together with interest from that date; that, after the commencement of this action, Tormey tendered to plaintiff repayment of the sums plaintiff had paid to the Commercial Bank, and interest thereon, together with the note duly canceled and certificate of satisfaction of the mortgage to said bank which plaintiff had discharged in part only, also a reassignment by Rogers to plaintiff of the said obligations of the stock-yard company, etc., and offered to pay plaintiff's expenses of the action, including such reasonable counsel fee as the court might fix, which tender was followed by deposit in court of the money and instruments tendered. The court further found that the value of said stock-yard company securities, after they were assigned to Rogers by plaintiff, depreciated from 20 to 33 per cent., and that said tender included nothing on that account. From these and other findings the court concluded that Tormey is indebted to plaintiff on the note and mortgage in suit to the full amount of the principal thereof, $62,742.12, and a further sum of $10,176.41 for interest thereon; and for these sums, with counsel fees, etc., a decree of foreclosure was rendered.

On appeal defendants raise no question as to the right of plaintiff to sue for the enforcement of the mortgage to the extent necessary to reimburse him for the money he paid to the Commercial Bank, with interest and expenses; nor does plaintiff dispute that Tormey's tender after suit brought covered all the detriment he sustained in that behalf. The principal contest in this court relates to the effect and consequences of plaintiff's assignment to Rogers of the stock-yard company's paper. The express purpose of the mortgage in suit is security to plaintiff against "loss which he may ever sustain" on that account; hence, it was essential that he should have sustained actual loss, as distinguished from liability thereto, resulting proximately from said assignment, in order to vest him with any right of action on that branch of the mortgage. Civ. Code, § 2778, subd. 2; Oaks v. Scheifferly, 74 Cal. 478, 16 Pac. 252; Elder v. Kutner, 97 Cal. 490, 32 Pac. 563; Ide v. Spencer, 50 Vt. 293; Shepard v. Shepard, 6 Conn. 37. It is the main proposition of plaintiff, as we understand the argument of his learned counsel, with which the findings of the trial court seem to be in accord, that, by the immediate effect of said assignment, plaintiff lost the securities which were the subject thereof, and that the mortgage here sued on was intended to secure to him absolutely payment for the same at the price of $50,742.12, the amount unpaid thereon on August 23, 1893. Plaintiff testified at the trial to some parol negotiations had with him by Tormey, prior to the date just mentioned, which testimony, although neither clear nor very convincing, may yet perhaps, if it could be considered, tend to sustain such contention.

The case, however, cannot be reconciled with that view. Nothing can be clearer on the evidence than that Rogers, on his part, took the obligations assigned to him by plaintiff to hold in pledge for the payment of Tormey's note to Stanly. We may concede, as counsel insist, that the statement in the mortgage to that effect does not estop plaintiff (Osborne v. Endicott, 6 Cal. 149); but the statement harmonizes with all the parol evidence of the occurrences at the time of the assignment, and its correctness, as concerns Rogers and Stanly at least, must be said to have been established without conflict. It, of course, follows that plaintiff was not divested of his title in the assigned securities by force merely of the assignment. Civ. Code, §§ 2888, 2986. Now, it may be admitted that there might have been such a contract between plaintiff and Tormey that, as to them, the assignment to Rogers would be held equivalent to an outright sale of the stock-yard company securities, Tormey becoming responsible to plaintiff for the purchase price. But security for any such responsibility is not included within the terms of the mortgage, interpreted in the light of attending circumstances. The provision that "this mortgage and the note secured hereby are given to secure the said Fernandez against any loss which he may ever sustain by reason of the transfer and assignment by him to Henry Rogers" of the stock-yard company's obligations is of the essence of the contract, and estops both parties. Its natural import is indemnity against loss contingent, and not yet accrued. That such agreements shall have a prospective operation, when a different intent is not expressed, is the rule of law concerning their interpretation. Warwick v. Hutchinson, 45 N. J. Law, 61. It is beyond peradventure that the mortgage provides for indemnity only as it relates to the hypothecation of plaintiff's property and credit to the Commercial Bank, and it is reasonable to suppose that, if any different purpose had been intended as regards his property assigned to Rogers, such different purpose would have been made clear; noscitur a sociis. Plaintiff can enforce the mortgage only to accomplish the object for which it was made. So far as the matter under view is concerned, such object appears plainly from the terms employed, understood in connection with the concurrent fact that Rogers held the assigned obligations in pledge, to have been indemnity against the consequences of such pledge, and not security for some other and different engagement of Tormey with plaintiff resting in parol. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856. The circumstance that the mortgage note was absolute in its terms is unimportant. Vogan v. Caminetti, 65 Cal. 438, 4 Pac. 435. Hence, for any purpose of the mortgage, plaintiff must be regarded as a pledgor of the evidences of debt he delivered to Rogers. As a pledgor, he did not part with his interest therein, and the findings that he did, and so sustained loss to the amount of the value thereof, are contrary to the evidence.

Regarding plaintiff's further insistence that the action of Rogers in suing on the pledged securities was an application of the same on the debt of Tormey to Stanly, and, virtually, a conversion of the same, we observe that, as pledge holder, it was Rogers' right to collect the money which became due on such securities, and his suit for that purpose was not a conversion of them. Civ. Code, §§ 2996, 3006; McArthur v. Magee, 114 Cal. 126, 45 Pac. 1068.

Loss to plaintiff is also said to have accrued from the facts in evidence that, subsequently to the assignment to Rogers, the stock-yard company was adjudged insolvent, the land on which its debt to plaintiff was secured depreciated in market value, and the further fact assumed (whether with or without proof we need not decide) that the statutory recourse for such debt against the stockholders of said company was lost by delay of Rogers to sue thereon. There was, however, no evidence that the mere fact of decline in market value of the incumbered land was in any degree attributable to the said assignment. So far as appears, the decline would have been the same had the assignment not been made. The indefinite finding of depreciation in that behalf "from twenty to thirty-three per cent." evidently had reference only to the sufficiency of the plea of tender, and was not designed as the basis of any part of the affirmative judgment for plaintiff. As to the asserted consequences of neglect of Rogers to proceed against the stock-yard company or its stockholders, there was neither allegation in the complaint, nor finding by the court, of such neglect or of loss for that reason. On the contrary, it was a postulate of both the complaint and the findings that, if the assignment itself by plaintiff to Rogers did not deprive the former of his property in the securities, yet such result followed when Rogers at length sued on the same, and that his action was to that extent wrongful. Plaintiff could not recover for loss caused by Rogers' failure to sue earlier without alleging and proving it. Thomas v. Davis (Tex. Civ. App.) 39 S. W. 579. See Northwestern Nat. Bank of Aberdeen v. J. Thompson & Sons Mfg. Co., 17 C. C. A. 638, 71 Fed. 113; Sampson v. Fox, 109 Ala. 662, 19 South. 896. Upon the record before us, plaintiff was entitled to no recovery beyond the sums of money tendered to him by Tormey after suit brought, together with reasonable attorneys' fees to the time of tender. The judgment and order denying a new trial should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

CHURCH et al. v. McCABE. (S. F. 1,341.) (Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1898.) Department 1. Action by J. S. Church and others against Ulty McCabe, special administrator. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Dismissed.

PER CURIAM. After this motion to dismiss the appeal was submitted, another motion for its dismissal was made and granted upon the ground that the appellant had failed to file the transcript within the time prescribed by the rules of this court. That order has accomplished the purpose of the present motion, and the motion is therefore dismissed.

COLUSA COUNTY v. SEUBE. (Sac. 274.) (Supreme Court of California. June 27, 1898.) In bank. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge. Action by Colusa county against B. Seube. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Affirmed. For decision in department, see 53 Pac. 654. W. G. Dyas and B. F. Howard, for appellant. Ernest Weyand, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The only question involved in this appeal is as to the validity of an ordinance of the board of supervisors of Colusa county regulating and licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors within that county. The same ordinance was involved and under consideration in Ex parte Seube, 115 Cal. 629, 47 Pac. 596, where it was held to be one within the power of the board to enact, and valid; and upon the authority of that case the judgment herein appealed from must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

DE LONG v. STATE. (Sac. 278.) (Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; J. E. Prewett, Judge. Action by Tully P. De Long, by Rachel M. Wright, his guardian, against the state of California. From an order granting the motion of defendant for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. White, Hughes & Seymour, for appellant. Wm. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order granting a motion of defendant for a new trial. The case is founded upon the same accident, is based upon like facts, involves the same questions, and is subject to the same principles with that of Melvin v. State (Sac. 287; this day decided) 53 Pac. 416. For the reasons given in the opinion in that case the order here appealed from is affirmed.

In re DISBARMENT OF COFFEY. (Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1898.) In bank. In the matter of the disbarment of John J. Coffey. Rule to show cause.

PER CURIAM. A certified copy of a judgment convicting John J. Coffey of a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, to wit, attempt to extort money by means of a verbal threat, having been filed in this court, it is hereby ordered that the said John J. Coffey be and appear before the supreme court, sitting in bank, at the city of San Francisco, on Tuesday, the 5th day of July, 1898, to show cause, if any he can, why he should not be expelled from the bar. It is ordered that a copy of said citation and of said judgment be served upon the said John J. Coffey, by the bailiff of this court, 10 days prior to the hearing.

In re HALE'S ESTATE. (S. F. 1,051.) (Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1898.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge. In the matter of the estate of Joseph P. Hale, deceased, an appeal was taken from an order of partial distribution. Reversed. Alexander D. Keyes and Galpin & Ziegler, for appellant. M. Cooney, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal involves an order of partial distribution made upon the same evidence, and similar in all material respects, to that considered in Re Hale's Estate (S. F. 935; this day decided) 53 Pac. 429; and upon the authority of that case the order herein is reversed.

MEYER v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO et al. (CAPRON et al., Interveners. L. A. 333, 373.) (Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.) In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge. Actions by Albert Meyer against the city of San Diego and others, and the San Diego Water Company against the city of San Diego and others. The actions were consolidated, and from the judgment R. Niccolls and others and the San Diego Water Company appeal. Reversed. Works & Lee, Works & Works, and L. L. Boone, for appellants. W. H. Fuller, Gibson & Titus, and H. E. Doolittle, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. These are appeals in the consolidated action brought to enjoin the issuance of certain municipal bonds of the city of San Diego, and to annul a contract which had been entered into by the city with the Southern California Mountain Water Company, a corporation. It has been this day decided, in Meyer v. City of San Diego (L. A. 331) 53 Pac. 434, that the trial judge was disqualified by interest, and that the motion made for a change of venue should have been granted; and the order denying a change of venue was therefore reversed. It may be regretted that the expense and labor necessarily incurred in the preparation and presentation of these appeals should thus be wasted; but as, under the circumstances, the judgment rendered is of no force or validity, the questions cannot be considered upon their merits, and naught remains but to reverse the judgment. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE v. CARCOPO. (Cr. 363.) (Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1898.) Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county. Appeal by the people from an order dismissing an information charging Anthony Carcopo with an assault with a deadly weapon. Affirmed. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People. James A. Devoto, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an appeal taken by the attorney general from an order dismissing an information charging the respondent with an assault with a deadly weapon. The information was based upon a commitment made by one W. H. H. Gentry, Esq., who claimed to be a justice of the peace in and for the town of Berkeley. At the proper time the defendant moved the court for a dismissal upon the grounds: (1) The pretended court before which the pretended preliminary examination was held had no legal existence; (2) that W. H. H. Gentry, who assumed to act as justice of the peace, and as such held the examination and made the pretended commitment, was neither de jure nor de facto a justice of the peace, judge, or magistrate; and (3) the defendant has never been legally committed by a magistrate. These points are all in reality the same, and have been fully considered and decided in the very recent case of Miner v. Justice Court (Cal.) 53 Pac. 795. Upon the authority of that case, the order is affirmed.

I concur: HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur solely upon the authority of Miner v. Justice Court, supra. I dissented in that case, but it must now be taken as declaring the law on the question there involved.

121 Cal. 113

SAN DIEGO WATER CO. v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO et al. (L. A. 326.) (Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1898.) In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge. Action by the San Diego Water Company against the city of San Diego and another. From an order refusing a change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Reversed. Works & Works and Trippet & Neale, for appellant. Gibson & Titus and H. E. Doolittle, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the same order refusing to grant a change of venue which has been considered and disposed of in the decision this day rendered in Meyer v. City of San Diego (L. A. 331) 53 Pac. 434. For the reasons therein given the order is reversed.

SAN FRANCISCO SAV. UNION v. RAY et al. (Sac. 252.) (Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1898.) In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county. Action by the San Francisco Savings Union against T. J. Ray and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and T. J. Ray appeals. Affirmed. Lamberson & Middlecoff, for appellant. Bradley & Farnsworth, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon the authority of the decision in Bank v. Alcorn (Sac. 332) 53 Pac. 813, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed. BEATTY, C. J., did not participate in the foregoing.

STOCKTON COMBINED HARVESTER & AGRICULTURAL WORKS v. HAMBURG-MAGDEBURG FIRE INS. CO. (Sac. 259.) (Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1898.) Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge. Action by the Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works against the Hamburg-Magdeburg Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed. Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. Nicol & Orr and J. C. Campbell, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. This case is submitted on the same brief and record as Sac. 262 (Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 53 Pac. 565). NORTH FORK WATER CO. v. EDWARDS et al. (L. A. 434.)<sup>1</sup>

WATERS—ARTIFICIAL DITCHES—EASEMENTS—PRESCRIPTION—SURFACE WATER.

Plaintiff was the owner of an open cement and stone ditch, built for carrying water used for domestic and other purposes. Its easement was based on prescription. The ditch was constructed along a hillside, and defendants' land extended to its center. The ditch received the wash of the hillside, and carried away the water and debris. Defendants, at great expense, graded and planted their land in trees to within 10 feet of the ditch, relying on the surface water being collected therein and carried away. The hillside under cultivation and the amount of debris washed into the ditch being increased, plaintiff constructed aprons for carrying same across the ditch upon defendants' lands. The flow of this volume of water worked an injury to defendants, and thereupon they built dams on their land, which caused the water to flow back into the ditch. It did not appear that plaintiff could not dispose of the water in some other way. Held, that defendants would not be enjoined from maintaining the dams, since the aprons were a burden not contemplated when the easement was acquired.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Bill by the North Fork Water Company against J. S. Edwards, B. F. Edwards, and Eva Edwards, for an injunction. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Otis, Gregg & Hall, for appellant. C. C. Haskell and Rolfe & Rolfe, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Plaintiff is the owner of a ditch used to convey water to a large number of families, and to the inmates of the Southern California Insane Asylum, for domestic and other uses. The course of the ditch at the point in question was along a hillside, and above the ditch the lands were uncultivated, and not owned by defendants. Below the ditch, and extending to its center, are defendants' lands. Plaintiff acquired a right of way or easement over defendants' lands by prescription. When the ditch was first dug, it followed generally the contours of the land.

There were two depressions running down the hillside to defendants' lands. A short flume carried the water of the ditch across one of these depressions originally. At the other the ditch was built on the ground. These depressions were slight, but formed drains for the land above the ditch, and led into, and some little distance over, defendants' land, where they spread out and disappeared as distinct channels. The ditch was reconstructed later,—about eight years before the action was commenced,—and was converted into an open cement and stone walled ditch, and was built upon the ground at the depressions referred to, leaving no passageway for storm waters to pass beyond it. The flume mentioned was dispensed with. The ditch received the storm water, and prevented it from flowing onto defendants' land. Defendants thereupon graded and leveled their lands at considerable cost, filling up these depressions, and planted the lands to fruit trees up to within 10 feet of the ditch. The easement acquired by plaintiff dates from the construction of this cemented ditch. Plaintiff never exercised or claimed the right to construct aprons at these points, and pass the storm water over the ditch onto defendants' land, until 1895, but up to that time always received this water in its ditch, with such sand and other debris as it might carry. In the spring of 1895 the land above the ditch along these depressions, owned by other persons, was cleared and planted to fruit trees; and the cultivation of the soil caused additional sand and detritus to flow into the ditch, to the injury of plaintiff and the quality of the water, to avoid which two aprons were constructed in December, 1895, to carry the storm water over the ditch at these depressions, and discharge it upon defendants' lands. It appeared that the water conveyed to consumers was injured in quality more than it had been hitherto, although it appeared that the water was always more or less muddy just after storms, and that at many places along the ditch plaintiff had diverted the surface waters at similar depressions into its ditch. The evidence was that defendants would be materially injured by the flow of storm waters across these aprons, as constructed, and that the water would form new and different channels from the depressions formerly existing. One of these aprons was 110 feet wide, and the other 80 feet wide; and the necessity for resorting to them grew out of the cultivation of the lands above the ditch, and not by any act of defendants. It was found by the court that the aprons "are in all respects a suitable and proper appliance for so conducting said storm and other waters for the protection of said ditch." It was also found that the consumers of water had no other adequate supply than by means of this ditch. It was not found, and did not appear, that plaintiff could not divert these storm waters in some way other than by the aprons. Defendants constructed dams below these aprons to turn back the overflow, and compel it to enter the ditch as before. The action was to restrain defendants from maintaining these dams. The only question discussed is, has plaintiff the right to maintain the aprons? It seems to be conceded that, if plaintiff has no such right, then the dams are rightfully erected, and, if it has such right, they should be removed.

It seems to me that the right of way here, so far as defendants' servient estate is affected by it, must be regarded as a right only to build a ditch by closing the depressions, as was done, and receiving the surface water formerly flowing down these depressions into the ditch, and conveying it by means of the ditch alone and away from defendants' land. Defendants had a right to assume that plaintiff would continue to use the ditch in the manner it had used it in acquiring the right; and they had the right to grade their lands, and fill up the depressions, and plant trees, upon the assumption that plaintiff would continue to provide for the surface storm waters. The case stands precisely as though no depressions or drainage channels ever existed over defendants' lands. If plaintiff had constructed aprons at the beginning of its use, and had discharged the water, as it is now proposed to do, upon defendants' land, or had built culverts to carry the water under the ditch, the easement would clearly now include such right; but no such privilege was exercised or claimed. It may be that the acquiescence of defendants in the occupation by plaintiff was partly due to the benefit derived from damming these depressions, and stopping the flow of water over defendants' land; and the court found, upon sufficient evidence, that defendants, at great cost, graded and planted their lands, "relying upon the surface water flowing above said ditch being collected therein, and thereby carried off, and prevented from flowing on their said lands." The necessity for these aprons is of recent origin, in no wise connected with the origin of the easement. Until this necessity arose, there was no occasion for using aprons at this point. Every easement includes what are termed "secondary easements"; that is, the right to do such things as are necessary for the full enjoyment of the easement itself. But this right is limited, and must be exercised in such reasonable manner as not to injuriously increase the burden upon the servient tenement. The burden of the dominant tenement cannot be enlarged to the manifest injury of the servient estate by any alteration in the mode of enjoying the former. The owner cannot commit a trespass upon the servient tenement beyond the limits fixed by the grant or use. Rights by prescription are stricti juris, and should not be extended beyond the user. Doubtless the right to make repairs is incident to the right of way acquired by plaintiff and would be implied, even though it is a prescriptive right, but we do not think the building of these aprons can be said to come under the denomination of "repairs." They were in the nature of changes in the mode of enjoyment, and, while they might be made if not harmful to the servient estate, they cannot be made to its material injury. The necessity for them arises from the rightful use of the lands above the ditch. It is a condition which should have been provided for when the way was being acquired. The character and extent of a way claimed by prescription are fixed and determined by the user under which it is gained. Washb. Easem. p. 135. It was held in Capers v. McKee, 1 Strob. 164, that the owner by prescription of a private way over another's land has no right to cut ditches for the improvement of his way without the consent of the owner of the soil, unless he has acquired such right, also, by prescriptive use. And, where a grant is presumed from the use, then the use must define the extent of what is presumed to have been granted. Jones, Easem. §§ 818, 819.

Appellant quotes from Ware v. Walker, 70 Cal. 591, 12 Pac. 477: "Where the use of a thing is granted, everything is granted essential to such use. Such a right carries with it an implied authority to do all that is necessary to secure the enjoyment of such easement." Gale & W. Easem. (Am. Ed.) 231, 232, is cited in support of this statement of the law. It is obvious that as a rule of universal application the quoted paragraph is too broadly stated; and the context shows that it was not intended to apply to all cases, but to the case then in hand, which was the exercise of the right in a reasonable manner, and without damage to defendant, namely, removing deposits in the bed of the stream which obstructed the flow of water to plaintiff's ditch. Appellant cites Burris v. Ditch Co., 104 Cal. 248, 37 Pac. 922; Joseph v. Ager, 108 Cal. 517, 41 Pac. 422; Jacob v. Day, 111 Cal. 571, 44 Pac. 243. In the case of 104 Cal., 37 Pac., the right was upheld to clean out a ditch to make it uniform, and without increasing the flow of water, and without damage to plaintiff's lands, or increase of the burden upon them. The case in 108 Cal., 41 Pac., by no means supports appellant's contention, but quite to the contrary. Quoting from Gale & W. Easem. 237, it was said: "As every easement is a restriction upon the right of property of the owner of the servient tenement, no alteration can be made in the mode of enjoyment by the owner of the dominant heritage, the effect of which will be to increase such restriction. Supposing no express grant exist, the right must be limited by the amount of enjoyment proved to have been had." The rule was stated in 111 Cal., 44 Pac., to be that, while the owners of a ditch "have a right to operate their ditch, they have no right so to operate it as to render it a nuisance to, or destructive of, the servient tenement." We discover no error in the rulings of the court at the trial, and, as we think the judgment and order were correct, they should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

SMITH v. THOMAS. (Sac. 362.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1898.)

ELECTIONS—BALLOTS—CONTEST—LIST OF DIS-PUTED VOTES—EVIDENCE—WITNESSES—RESIDENCE OF VOTER.

1. Where a ballot was found at the recount to be so marked that it could be identified, and there was some evidence that the mark was not on the vote when first taken from the box, the court's finding that it was made subsequently was warranted.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1116, requiring the contestant of an election canvass to serve a list of alleged illegal votes on defendant, evidence offered by contestant to prove the illegality of a vote not so specified was properly excluded, though it was named on a similar list served on contestant by contestee.

3. Testimony at a recount that one not a legal voter stated to witnesses that he did not vote, and for certain reasons would not vote, for defendant, is admissible to impeach his testimony that he did so vote.

4. In an election contest, clear evidence must be furnished as to how an illegal voter cast his ballot, before his vote can be deducted from the total of contestee.

5. A vote was not necessarily illegal on account of nonresidence of the voter, where he testified that he was often absent from the town, performing different jobs, but that he always left with the intention of returning when his work was done.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Action by M. W. Smith against J. W. Thomas. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Power & Alford and Hannah & Miller, for appellant. Chas. G. Lamberson and W. B. Wallace, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an election contest involving the right to the office of supervisor in district No. 3, county of Tulare. Defendant was declared elected by the board of canvassers. At the trial the court found that each received the same number of legal votes, and, as a conclusion of law, that plaintiff take nothing by the action.

1. The first point made upon the appeal is that a certain ballot which had been counted for the defendant is illegal, because it was marked so that it could be identified. There clearly was such a mark upon the ballot, and, if it was upon the ballot when voted, it should be rejected. The court found that the mark was not upon the ticket when taken from the box, but was made subsequently. There was some evidence to sustain this finding, although apparently the preponderance was the other way. After the preliminary showing as to the custody of the ballots since the election, there was also a strong presumption that the ballots were in the same condition in which they were when first taken from the box; that is, that the marks were made by the voter. Still, we cannot say that there was not a substantial conflict in the evidence. Two witnesses testified that they scrutinized the ballots closely as they were first counted, and would have seen the mark had it been there. They saw no such mark.

2. The plaintiff offered to prove an illegal vote which was not specified in the list of illegal votes served by him on the defendant, as required by section 1116 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The evidence was upon objection excluded. Although not on plaintiff's list, the voter's name was on a list served on the plaintiff by the defendant; and appellant now contends that defendant must therefore have known of the illegality of the vote, and the purpose of the statute requiring a notice has been accomplished. But the purpose of the statute had not been accomplished. It was intended that the opposite party should know what votes the contestant would attempt to show were illegal, in order that he might come prepared with evidence upon that subject. If he had learned that the voter named had voted for him or was a legal voter, and for either reason did not prepare proof upon the subject, such evidence would be as unfair as though the voter had never been named. He was not apprised that the contestant would rely upon the illegality of that vote.

3. One Stingley was called for plaintiff, and testified that he voted for the defendant. Although the court held that Stingley was not a legal voter, it refused to deduct the vote from the tally of defendant. The reason given was that Stingley, as a witness, was so thoroughly impeached that he could not be believed, and the court could not determine for whom he voted. The testimony consisted of proof by several witnesses that Stingley had stated to them that he did not vote for any one for supervisor, and for certain reasons would not vote for the defendant. As independent evidence, these statements were clearly incompetent, as was held in the recent case of Lauer v. Estes (Cal.) 53 Pac. 262. But it was here used for the purpose of impeachment, and may well have had the effect given it by the court. There was no evidence other than that of the impeached witness as to how he had voted.

4. One Crabtree, called as a witness, was asked for whom he had voted for supervisor. He declined to answer, and was then asked: "Without intimating whether or not you voted, did you have any preference for the office of supervisor of supervisor district No. 3 on or before the 3d day of November, 1896, and before the day the general election was held in this supervisor district?" An objection having been overruled, he answered: "On election day, if I had voted, I suppose I would have voted for Mr. Thomas." He was then asked, if he had voted at all, would he have voted for supervisor, to which he replied: "I don't know but what I would." There was other evidence which tended to show that the witness had voted, and that he was not a legal voter. The court refused to deduct the vote from the tally of defendant, and perhaps in so doing was influenced to some extent by the testimony, improperly admitted, tending to show that the witness had said that he had voted for Smith. There was, however, no testimony as to how he voted except that above set out. I do not think it amounted to evidence. He thought when on the witness stand that he would have voted for Thomas if he had voted, and, if he had voted, he did not know but he would have voted for supervisor. The witness could not have been convicted of perjury for this testimony if it had been proven that he voted for Smith. He may have forgotten how he did in fact vote. At the general election there were many other offices to be filled. The requirement of secrecy is based upon the idea that voters may find it inconvenient to have it known for whom they voted,—may, in fact, be weak enough to desire to create the impression that they voted otherwise than as they did vote. They may not be willing to risk their political standing by openly voting independently. And I think results show that many do vote differently from their professions. Under such circumstances, I think very clear evidence should be furnished as to how one did vote before his vote can be deducted from the total of any candidate. The secret ballot brings many inconveniences, and we must take the bitter with the sweet.

5. We cannot disturb the finding as to the residence of George Phœbus. His evidence was to the effect that he was often absent from Visalia, performing different jobs of work, but that he always left with the intent of returning when his work was done. The evidence is somewhat equivocal, but I think the construction given it by the court was reasonable. The judgment is affirmed.

SHAEFFER v. LACY. (S. F. 1,052.)

BAILMENTS—RIGHTS OF BAILOR AS TO THIRD PERSONS—TRIAL—FINDINGS—JUDGMENT—VACATION.

1. Civ. Code, § 2991, which provides that one who has allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of property for the purpose of making any transfer of it cannot set up his own title to defeat a bona fide pledgee, affords no protection to a pledgee of property received from one with whom it was left for safe-keeping.

2. The ownership of property left with another for safe-keeping is not changed by representations or acts of such bailee with reference to the property, not brought to the owner's notice.

3. A finding of fact that property was left with another for safe-keeping is inconsistent with a conclusion of law that the bailee was thereby clothed with the apparent ownership of the same.

4. Where a conclusion of law is unsupported by the findings, a motion to vacate the judgment and enter a judgment to correspond with the findings is authorized, under Code Civ. Proc. § 663 (St. 1897, p. 58), which permits the court to amend and correct conclusions where a judgment is set aside because they are inconsistent with or unsupported by the findings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Jessie Shaeffer against H. Lacy. From a judgment for defendant, and order denying a motion of plaintiff to set aside the judgment, and enter an unconditional judgment for plaintiff, on the ground that the conclusions of law were inconsistent with, and not supported by, the findings of fact, plaintiff appeals. Remanded, with directions to vacate judgment, correct conclusions of law, and enter judgment for plaintiff.

F. J. Castelhun, for appellant. W. T. Baggett, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to recover the value of certain jewelry, to wit, a diamond stud, an opal stud set with diamonds, and a diamond ring. The pleadings are verified, and the answer is merely a specific denial of the allegations of the complaint. Judgment was given for the recovery of the possession of the property upon payment to defendant of $349.74 and costs of action, $21. Plaintiff moved to set aside the judgment, and to enter in lieu thereof an unconditional judgment in favor of plaintiff, on the ground that the conclusions of law were inconsistent with, and not supported by, the findings of fact. The motion was denied. The appeal is from the judgment, and from the order denying plaintiff's said motion, and comes here on bill of exceptions.

The court found that plaintiff was the owner of the jewelry, being of the kind worn by men, and of the value of $400, and in 1890 "placed said property in the possession of one Dr. W. D. Johnson for safe-keeping." Said Johnson, while in possession of the property, in 1893, represented to defendant that he was the owner of the property, and borrowed from defendant $200, giving his notes therefor, and as security for the loan, pledged with defendant the said property, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent. In the year 1894 plaintiff learned of this pledge; and in the year 1895 she demanded the return of the property from defendant, but he refused the return thereof, "and plaintiff took no further steps in the matter, except to request Dr. Johnson to return the jewelry, until after the death of said Johnson, in December, 1895. Defendant is in possession of the property, "holding the same as a pledge to secure payment of said notes." "About March 1, 1894, defendant removed the opal from said opal stud set with diamonds, and sold the same for $35, and applied the same on said notes." No part of the sum so borrowed has been repaid except said sum of thirty-five dollars, and the amount now due is $349.74. On January 1, 1895, plaintiff demanded of defendant the said jewelry, which was refused.

As conclusions of law, the court found "that plaintiff, in delivering said property to said Johnson as aforesaid, clothed him with the apparent ownership of the same," and that "plaintiff is entitled to possession of the said jewelry upon the payment by her to said defendant" the amount due on said notes and costs of action. If the property belonged to plaintiff, and defendant refused on demand of plaintiff to surrender its possession to her, he thereby converted it, and this action in the form of trover was proper. Apparently, the court allowed defendant's claim against Johnson as a set-off to plaintiff's claim for the value of the property, and the judgment is for a return of the property upon payment of this set-off. In view of the pleadings and the fact that defendant converted the property, we cannot see upon what principle the court gave the judgment. We pass that question, however, to the more important one discussed in the briefs.

1. The finding is that the property belonged to plaintiff, and was delivered to Johnson for safe-keeping. The uncontradicted evidence of plaintiff was that she "delivered it to Dr. W. D. Johnson, and asked him to place it in his safe-deposit box." The defendant testified as follows: "I knew Dr. W. D. Johnson. On the 2d day of June, 1893, he called on me to borrow one hundred dollars. He offered as security the jewelry described in the complaint. He said it was his; that he had received it from Mrs. Shaefter, the plaintiff, for services rendered the Shaefter family. I lent him one hundred dollars on the jewelry, taking his note for the amount. The note bears interest at two per cent. a month. He had the ring on his finger and the stud in his shirt. The next day he called, and borrowed one hundred dollars additional, with the same security." Plaintiff testified in rebuttal that Dr. Johnson "had never rendered her family any services; that he might have rendered her husband's family services, but that she understood that he had been well paid for them." It is, I think, apparent from the findings of fact, that the court accepted the evidence of plaintiff; for the finding is unqualified that plaintiff placed the property in Johnson's hands for safe-keeping only. It must be held that the conclusion of law that "she clothed him with the apparent ownership of the same" is deduced from her evidence.

Section 2991, Civ. Code, provides as follows: "One who has allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of property for the purpose of making any transfer of it cannot set up his own title to defeat a pledge of the property made by the other to a pledgee who received the property in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value." The phrase "for the purpose of making any transfer of it," we think, must have been inserted as words of limitation upon the power to pledge by one having the "apparent ownership" of the property. The section would have a much broader meaning without than with these words. Formerly, a factor to whom goods were consigned for sale could not pledge them as against the consignor. Wright v. Solomon, 19 Cal. 64. Under this section, however, as it now reads, one who has allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of property for the purposes of sale or transfer cannot recover from the pledgee of such other person, if the pledgee receives the property in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value. The rule of the Code permits the owner to show that the property was not intrusted to the bailee or person assuming ownership, for the purposes of sale, but for transportation or temporary custody and the like objects. And so we understand the note of the Code commissioners. Mr. Jones says: "Mere possession of a chattel is not title; and one taking a pledge of it is bound to satisfy himself that the pledgor is the owner; and, if he relies solely upon the pledgor's possession, he takes the risk of having to surrender the property to the true owner." The example of a chattel put in the hands of a mechanic for repairs is given, where by force of his possession, though lawful, he could not pledge the property. A case is cited by the author, which we have examined and find on all fours with the one at bar, holding that one who, having goods for safe-keeping, pledges them with intent to convert the proceeds to his own use, in effect commits larceny, and the pledgee acquires no title as against the owner, although he deals with the pledgor in good faith. Jones, Pledges, § 54, citing Gottlieb v. Hartman, 3 Colo. 53. In that case Mrs. Hartman deposited with one Morrison, the keeper of a restaurant, with whom she was staying, certain jewelry for safe-keeping. Morrison pledged the property with Gottlieb, a pawnbroker, to secure a loan of money. Mrs. Hartman sued Gottlieb in trover, and recovered judgment, and her action was sustained. Mr. Benjamin lays down the rule "that no man can sell goods and convey a valid title to them unless he be the owner, or lawfully represent the owner." Benj. Sales, § 6. And Mr. Edwards says: "As no one can convey the title to another's property without his consent, so it is quite clear that, as a rule, he cannot pledge it or incumber it without some authority." Edw. Bailm. § 192.

Respondent relies upon McNeil v. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, approved in Barstow v. Mining Co., 64 Cal. 388, 1 Pac. 349. In that case the plaintiff, being the owner of certain shares in a bank, had an account with certain stockbrokers relating to other stocks which they were carrying for him. To secure any balance which might be due on that account, plaintiff delivered the shares in dispute with a blank assignment and power of attorney to transfer them. These brokers pledged the shares without the knowledge of plaintiff, and without actual authority; and they came into the hands of defendants. The opinion is valuable for its review of the cases upon the point. It will suffice to quote briefly to show that the case in no sense supports respondent's contention, nor does it sustain the rule deduced from it by him. I quote: "Simply intrusting the possession of a chattel to another as depositary, pledgee, or bailee, or even under a conditional executory contract of sale, is clearly insufficient to preclude the real owner from reclaiming his property in case of an unauthorized disposition of it by the person so intrusted. Ballard v. Burgett, 40 N. Y. 314. 'The mere possession of chattels, by whatever means acquired, if there be no other evidence of property or authority to sell from the true owner [italics by the learned judge], will not enable the possessor to give a good title.' Per Denio, J., in Covill v. Hill, 4 Denio, 323. But if the owner intrusts to another, not merely the possession of the property, but also written evidence, over his own signature, of title thereto, and of unconditional power of disposition over it, the case is vastly different. There can be no occasion for the delivery of such documents, unless it is intended that they shall be used either at the pleasure of the depositary or under contingencies to arise."

The fact that Johnson represented that he owned the property cannot change the fact that he did not own it; and because he was seen wearing the jewelry by the pledgee at the time the latter took it cannot affect plaintiff's right to it any more than can the fact found that it was jewelry such as men wear. The broad fact stands out as found in this case that Johnson took the property for safe-keeping alone. There is no evidence that plaintiff knew he was representing it to be his own, or was wearing it, or exercising any ownership over it. Upon principle, we can see no difference between this case and that of the pledge or sale of stolen personal property; for, when Johnson pledged it, he converted it, and his pledge was the same as if he had stolen it, and then pledged it, in which case an innocent purchaser or pledgee would take no title. Swim v. Wilson, 90 Cal. 126, 27 Pac. 33. Nor can we see any distinction in principle between this case and that of Robinson v. Haas, 40 Cal. 474, which was the case of certain sheep intrusted to one Rood to be kept upon terms agreed upon; or Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 139, in which it was said: "The mere delivery of the possession of personal property does not, standing alone, constitute such an indicium of ownership as will bind the owner." See, also, Lowe v. Woods, 100 Cal. 408, 34 Pac. 959, and cases there referred to. We cannot discover upon what principle the trial court could reach the conclusion it did from the findings, nor can we find support for the judgment in the findings.

2. The plaintiff's motion to vacate the judgment and enter up a different judgment "upon findings of fact made by the court" is authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 663 (act March 3, 1897; St. 1897, p. 58). The court may do this because of "(1) incorrect or erroneous conclusions of law not consistent with or not supported by the findings of fact; and in such case, when the judgment is set aside, the conclusions of law shall be amended and corrected." We think that plaintiff, on the findings of fact, was entitled to judgment. The conclusion of law that "plaintiff, in delivering said property to said Johnson, as aforesaid, clothed him with the apparent ownership of the same," we must construe to mean that, in the opinion of the trial court, this apparent ownership was given for the purpose of making a transfer of it, or at least with authority to transfer it. In that view the conclusion of the learned judge was erroneous, and plaintiff's motion should have been granted. We recommend that the cause be remanded, with directions to set aside and vacate the judgment entered in the action, to correct the conclusions of law in accordance with this opinion, and to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $400, with legal interest from January 1, 1895, and costs of action.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

CLARKE et al. v. COBB (LANGENOUR et al., Interveners. Sac. 351).
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1898.)
LANDLORD AND TENANT—CROPPING CONTRACT—RENT—MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

1. A contract whereby one agrees to farm land let to him for a term of years, and to give annually for the use thereof a certain portion of the products grown thereon, is a lease, and not a cropping contract; and the portion of the product to be delivered to the landlord when gathered is rent.

2. In the absence of appropriate words in a lease reserving part of the crop as rent, to indicate that the crops are to be held in co-tenancy, the products to be delivered to the landlord after harvest will be deemed the property of the tenant until that time.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 707, providing that the purchaser in foreclosure proceedings may, from sale until redemption, receive from the terre-tenant the rents of the property, or the value of the use thereof, the purchaser can recover an amount of the landlord's share of the crops raised as rent, only in proportion as the time intervening between the purchase and the expiration of the year term bears to one year.

4. The purchaser at a foreclosure sale does not take the interest of the mortgagor as landlord in the crops raised on the premises under the sheriff's certificate.

Harrison, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by Catherine Clarke and J. E. Cain, executors of the will of W. J. Clarke, deceased, against G. M. Cobb, defendant, and E. C. Langenour and others, interveners. There was a judgment for interveners, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

B. F. Howard, for appellants. N. A. Hawkins and H. C. Watkins, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. W. J. Clarke and plaintiffs and appellants, executors of the estate of W. J. Clarke, deceased, respectively entered into contracts with one Cobb, whereby said Cobb agreed to farm and cultivate certain lands to grapes and grain for a term of years. For present purposes, these contracts were the same; and it was provided therein that the lands were demised and let to said Cobb, he agreeing to give annually for the use thereof a certain portion of the crops of grain and other products grown thereon. At the time these contracts were entered into, certain mortgage liens rested upon the realty. Subsequently these liens were foreclosed, and under such foreclosure proceedings the mortgagees became the purchasers of the land, and certificates of sale were issued to them. The sales under foreclosure proceedings took place in January and April, respectively, of 1896; and, no redemption intervening, deeds passed to the purchasers six months thereafter. Crops of various kinds were cultivated upon these lands by Cobb under his contracts during the cropping season of 1895-96; and subsequent to the aforesaid sales of the land, and during the period of time allowed by law for redemption, these crops were gathered and harvested by Cobb. As provided in his contract, he set aside the portion thereof to be given for the use of the land; but, upon notice and warning from the purchasers at the sale, he refused to deliver the same to the plaintiffs, and this action was brought against him by them for a recovery of the possession thereof. Clarke died subsequent to the making of the contract with Cobb, and prior to the foreclosure proceedings. The mortgagee purchasers at the sale, claiming the property by virtue of their purchase, intervened, and have become the real defendants in interest.

It is conceded by all parties that the merits of this litigation are dependent upon the construction to be given that portion of section 707 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides: "The purchaser, from the time of the sale until a redemption, and a redemptioner, from the time of his redemption until another redemption, is entitled to receive from the tenant in possession the rents of the property sold, or the value of the use and occupation thereof." At the threshold of this investigation, it becomes important to determine the legal status of the contracts entered into with Cobb by Clarke and his executors. That these contracts were leases, that the conventional relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties, and that the grains and fruits to be delivered to the landlord when gathered and harvested were rent, we are entirely satisfied. Rent is a compensation paid for the use of land. It need not be money. Any chattels or products of the soil serve the purpose equally as well. These contracts are in no sense cropping contracts. The single difference differentiating them from ordinary conventional leases is that the rent is to be paid in products of the soil, after harvest, rather than in money. But such difference is wholly immaterial, as changing the character and aspect of the instruments. It is substantially conceded that the landlord and tenant are not co-tenants in the land, but it is claimed that they are co-tenants in the crops to be raised. The authorities of this state recognize that such conditions may exist. Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 544; Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 59. But we find no apt words here to disclose such a status. When it is established that a certain contract is a lease, and that the relation of landlord and tenant exists between the parties, there must be some appropriate words in the contract to indicate that the crops raised on the lands are to be held in co-tenancy, or such will not be the conclusion reached. If there is nothing in the language to indicate that intention, then the products to be delivered to the landlord after harvest, by the tenant, will be deemed the property of the tenant until that time, and treated as rent to be then paid. There is but little authority against the views we have here declared. The New York authorities almost stand alone as taking a contrary position. The decisions of the highest courts of at least a dozen states hold, upon facts similar to those at bar, in entire accord with the views we entertain. See Freem. Coten. § 100, note 1. This court held in Bernal v. Hovious, supra, that the contract under consideration in that case was a cropping contract; and of course, when such is the fact, the title to the products of the land necessarily vests in both parties, for the relation of co-tenancy is created. The facts of that case are broadly different from the facts here presented. Again, that decision is based solely upon the New York authorities. In Walls v. Preston, supra, Bernal v. Hovious, and the New York authorities upon which it is based, are reviewed and explained, and the doctrine of the Bernal Case limited. In Walls v. Preston the facts were entirely similar to those found in this record, and, after a careful consideration of the principles involved, the court said: "It clearly appears to us that the parties in this case intended to make a lease, and that the instrument executed by them was a lease; that its effect as such was not destroyed by their having contracted for the payment to the lessor of a portion of the specific crops to be produced; and that that covenant was an agreement to pay the rent of the premises out of the crops."

Having arrived at the conclusion that the crops involved in this litigation were rent due from the tenant Cobb to his landlord, do the provisions of section 707 of the Code of Civil Procedure heretofore quoted give them to the purchaser at the foreclosure sale? These products were the rents to be annually paid for the use of agricultural and vineyard lands. They were due and payable at a certain period of the year, and that period occurred after the purchase from the sheriff, and prior to the time when right of redemption was barred. These contracts stood exactly as though the land had been rented for a cash rental of $1,200 per annum, payable at harvest time. Upon such a state of facts, it could not be claimed for a moment that the purchaser at the sheriff's sale would be entitled to the entire amount of rent due and payable for the use of the land for the entire year. If the foreclosure sale had occurred one day prior to the day when the rent was due and payable, upon such a line of reasoning the purchasers would be entitled to the entire $1,200. If rent was payable semiannually, and no rent happened to fall due during the time intervening between the purchase under foreclosure and the expiration of redemption, it certainly could not be claimed that the purchaser was not entitled to any rent. In the eyes of the statute, the material question is not, when does rent become due and payable? but it is, what amount of rent has the property earned subsequent to the purchase, and prior to the redemption? By virtue of the statute, if the property is not rented, the purchaser may sue for the value of the use and occupation; and the value of the use and occupation would be such value for the time the purchaser held under his certificate of sale. And, likewise, a recovery for rent would necessarily be limited to the amount earned for that time.

In the case at bar, where the rent is an annual rent, the purchasers at the foreclosure sales are entitled to an amount of rent in proportion as the time intervening between their purchases and the expiration of the year term bears to one year; providing, of course, the six-months term of redemption had not expired in the meantime. In Reynolds v. Lathrop, 7 Cal. 43, it is held that "the effect of the sale was equivalent to an assignment of the lease for the time." The contention that rent payable by the year is indivisible is unsound. Undoubtedly, the statute could provide for a division of it. It must be borne in mind that the whole matter of redemption is purely statutory, and the statute seems to contemplate a proportionate division of the rents. It was intended by this statute to give the purchaser at the sale the fruits of the land produced while he held the certificate of purchase; only this, and nothing more. To support a construction which would give the purchaser at the sale (perchance, a purchaser of a single day) the rents of property under a lease for years, for the sole reason that rents for the entire period happen to become due and payable upon that day, would seem to wander far from the intention of the legislature in enacting the statute. If such construction obtain, evidently the statute would at once become useless legislation; for upon the day of sale, by reason of previous mutual arrangements between the judgment debtor and the tenant, all questions of rent would have been compromised and settled. We cannot bring ourselves to hold that, if the mortgagor himself is in possession, he is liable only for the value of the use and occupation after the sale; while, if the tenant under the mortgagor is in possession, all rents owing by the tenant for an unlimited period in the past, and which happen to become due while the certificate of purchase is held by the purchaser at the sale, are his property. As to the general principle of law that a transfer of real estate carries with it rents earned, but not yet due, we are not concerned.

There is nothing in the contention of respondents that the purchasers at the sale, conceding that the landlord at the time had an interest in the crops, took such interest under the certificate of sale issued by the sheriff. If there had been no tenant, and the owner had cultivated the land and possessed the crop, such crop would not have passed by the certificate of sale. This court has repeatedly held that the owner has the right to retain and harvest the crops grown and ripened pending the time of redemption.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in accordance with the views heretofore expressed.

We concur: VAN FLEET, J.; McFARLAND, J.; TEMPLE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

HARRISON, J. I dissent. Section 707, Code Civ. Proc., declares: "The purchaser, from the time of the sale until a redemption, and a redemptioner, from the time of his redemption until another redemption, is entitled to receive from the tenant in possession the rents of the property sold, or the value of the use and occupation thereof." The term "rents," as here used, signifies the amount agreed to be paid by the tenant in possession, as distinguished from the value of the use and occupation, which is to be paid by the judgment debtor if he remains in possession. The purchaser is entitled to all of these "rents" which accrue after the sale of the property, subject to his obligation to refund the amount he may receive in case the judgment debtor shall redeem from the sale. Section 700, Id., declares: "Upon a sale of real property the purchaser is substituted to and acquires all the right, title, interest and claim of the judgment debtor thereto." By virtue of this section the purchaser acquires the entire title of the judgment debtor to the property sold, and is entitled to the rents thereafter to accrue therefrom, as fully as if the sale was made by the judgment debtor himself. A sale by the sheriff is equivalent to a sale by the judgment debtor. Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 649. "The execution of the deed gave to the purchaser at the sale no new title to the land purchased by him, but was merely evidence that his title had become absolute." Robinson v. Thornton, 102 Cal. 680, 34 Pac. 121. "The purchaser has already bought the land and paid for it. The sale is simply a conditional one which may be defeated by the payment of a certain sum by certain designated parties, within a certain designated time. If not paid within the time, the right to a conveyance becomes absolute without further sale, or other act to be performed by anybody. * * * During the period which elapses between the sale and expiration of the time for redemption, the statute regards the purchaser as the owner in equity, and gives him the rents and profits, or the value of the use and occupation. In short, it gives him the entire beneficial interest in the property, except the actual possession." Page v. Rogers, 31 Cal. 293. See, also, Duff v. Randall, 116 Cal. 226, 48 Pac. 66. In Reynolds v. Lathrop, 7 Cal. 43, it was held that, before the expiration of the time for redemption, the purchaser could maintain an action against the tenant for rent, according to the terms of his lease. The court said: "But we think it clear that Lathrop was responsible to the plaintiff for the rents, in the way he would have been to the judgment debtor had no sale been made, and that, consequently, the plaintiff could sue for the rent as often as it fell due under the terms of the lease existing when he became purchaser. The effect of the sale was equivalent to an assignment of the lease for the time." If, instead of the sale by the sheriff, the judgment debtor had, at that time, assigned the lease for the time allowed for redemption, his assignee would have been entitled to all the rents which might accrue during the term for which the lease was assigned. A grant of the reversion of an estate passes the rights to rents that subsequently become due as incident to the reversion, but not the rents then in arrear. 4

Kent, Comm. 354; Sampson v. Grimes, 7 Blackf. 176; Peck v. Northrop, 17 Conn. 217. "The rent is incident to the reversion, and passes with it; and the grantee, by force of the conveyance, has a right to receive all rent accruing upon the estate. It is a part of the realty, and passes by the deed." Burden v. Thayer, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 76.

In the absence of an agreement or a statute for that purpose, there can be no apportionment of rent which, by the terms of the lease, is payable at stated intervals. "When rent is payable quarterly or yearly, the annual or quarterly payments are not to be apportioned if the reversion is transferred before the time at which the rent becomes due. The right to such quarter's or year's rent passes with the reversion. In the present case, had the year's rent become due five days after instead of five days before the mortgage, it would have passed by it to the plaintiff." Burden v. Thayer, supra. Taylor, in his Landlord and Tenant (section 389), says: "It is also well settled that in all cases of periodical payments accruing at intervals, and not de die in diem, there can be no apportionment, for rent will not be apportioned in respect to time, except by force of a statute, or of some special provision of the lease." Kent says (volume 3, p. 470): "The rule at common law was that neither law nor equity would apportion rent as to time, and therefore if the tenant for life gave a lease for years, rendering a yearly rent, and died in the course of the year, the rent could not be apportioned, and the tenant would go free of rent for the first part of the year. The principle was that an entire contract could not be apportioned." See, also, Zule v. Zule, 24 Wend. 76; Marshall v. Moseley, 21 N. Y. 280; Woodf. Landl. & Ten. § 403. By the statute of 11 Geo. II. c. 19, and subsequent statutes in England, and also in some of the states, the common-law rule has been superseded, and in certain cases an apportionment of rent is authorized in the case of the death of the lessor between two rent days. But, as no statute of this nature has ever been adopted in this state, the common-law rule must control. This question was very fully considered in Bank v. Wise, 3 Watts, 394, where the lessor's interest in a lot of land and house thereon was sold at sheriff's sale. The land was held at the time of the sale by a tenant, under a lease for five years, executed three years previously, at an annual rent payable half yearly, under which a half year's rent fell due on the 1st of February. The sale was made by the sheriff in January, and the court held that there could be no apportionment between the purchaser and the judgment debtor, but that the purchaser was entitled to the entire rent, saying: "The idea of apportioning the rent that becomes payable after the purchaser of a reversionary interest in fee at a sheriff's sale has paid the purchase money and received his deed of conveyance for it, between him and the defendant in the execution as whose estate it was sold, is unknown to the law, and cannot be reconciled with any of its analogous and fixed principles." In Klein v. Chase, 17 Cal. 596, a redemption was made 21 days after the sale; but it was held that the purchaser was entitled to all the rents which accrued between the time of sale and redemption. At that time the law did not require the purchaser, in case of a redemption, to account for any of the rents which he might have received. In Martin v. Martin, 7 Md. 368, the tenant had leased a farm for two years, agreeing to pay as rent one-half of the wheat and corn raised thereon. After paying the rent for the first year, and before any rent was due for the second year, he accepted certain orders drawn upon him by his landlord, payable out of the rent. After these orders had been accepted, but before any rent was due, the farm was sold at sheriff's sale under a judgment against the landlord. It was held that, notwithstanding the acceptance of these orders, the tenant was liable to the purchaser for the whole rent of that year. There is no injustice in this rule. If the land is under lease, that fact is considered by the purchaser in making his bid, and the amount of rent which he will receive from the tenant is an element in determining the amount of his bid. If, by the terms of the lease, the rent day fell prior to the sale, it would belong to the judgment debtor, and the property would have less value than if it should fall after the sale. "By allowing the purchaser to take all the rent becoming due after the sale, it adds so much to the value of the lessor's interest in the land at the time of sale, and secures to him the benefit of the partial rent not due at that time in the way that it can be done consistently with established rules of law." Martin v. Martin, supra.

To hold that the purchaser is entitled to only the amount of rent "earned" by the land subsequent to the sale would in many cases render the provision of the statute nugatory; for, if that is the limit of his right, it must also be held that he is entitled to whatever the land has earned during that period. The tenant cannot be compelled to pay the rent otherwise than in accordance with the terms of his lease; and if, by these terms, he has paid the rent for a portion of the period for redemption, the fact that the land has earned some rent during a part of that period cannot impose upon him any liability to the purchaser for the rent so earned. If the tenant has paid the rent in advance before the sale, and his term expires during the period for redemption, he cannot be compelled to pay any further sum for his use and occupation of the land. So if, by the terms of his lease, there is no rent payable during this period, the purchaser can have no claim upon him for the rent. He cannot be made liable beyond the terms of his lease, whether he has paid the rent before the sale, or is not required to pay it until after the time for redemption has expired. The judgment should be affirmed.

WEBB et al. v. KUNS et al. (L. A. 365.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1898.)

WORK AND LABOR—PLEADINGS AND FINDINGS—MECHANICS' LIENS—FORECLOSURE—PLEADING.

1. A complaint alleged that plaintiff was to be paid a reasonable sum for extra work as to a certain contract, and also the performance of the work. The finding showed the performance of the work, its acceptance by defendants on a certain day, and that "defendants agreed to pay therefor the sum of ten dollars." Held, that the finding was not that the work was done for an agreed price; hence there was no variance.

2. In an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, a mistake in the complaint in regard to the terms of the contract, as to time of payment, where the contract, the notice of lien, and the findings show the facts, is immaterial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by W. E. Webb and others against N. Kuns and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendants appealed. Affirmed.

C. K. Holloway, for appellants. Tanner & Taft, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to foreclose a mechanic's lien for the sum of $82.50. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The general point is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding, and under this an attempt is made to show a variance between the findings and the allegations of the complaint in two respects. As I think no material variance is shown, I will not consider whether the point can be made under the specification.

1. The complaint avers, in accordance with the terms of the contract and the statement in the claim of lien recorded, that plaintiff was to be paid a reasonable sum for any extra work; also that extra work was done. It is found that these allegations are true, and in addition "that the plaintiff performed all the extra work mentioned in the complaint, and fully completed the same, and same was accepted by the defendants on the said 18th day of October, 1895, and the defendants agreed to pay therefor the sum of ten dollars." There is no variance,—not even an inconsistency. The finding is not that the work was done under a contract for an agreed price, but to the contrary, and that after it was done defendants accepted it, and agreed to pay therefor $10. This was an admission that it was worth $10.

2. The complaint states that three-fourths of the contract price was to be paid during the progress of the work, and the balance 35 days after completion. The contract, the claim of lien, and the findings are to the effect that $100 of the contract price was to be paid upon completion, and the balance 30 days after completion. The contract is correctly described in the notice of lien which was filed. A valid lien was therefore created. The mistake in the complaint was utterly immaterial, as defendants could not have been misled thereby. It is evident that the appeal is frivolous and vexatious. It is therefore ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed, with $50 damages allowed respondents.

FAIRBANKS et al. v. ROLLINS.

WATER RIGHTS — CONTRACTS — TRIAL — FINDINGS.

1. Performance of a contract to convey "a good and sufficient water right" for the irrigation of a certain parcel of land was sufficiently tendered by an offer of water certificates issued by an irrigation corporation, guarantying the holder a flow of water of the quantity specified in the contract, together with a right of way through a pipe line reaching the lands to be irrigated for the conveyance of water "represented by said water certificates."

2. A finding of an ultimate fact cannot be impeached by an immaterial finding of a mere probative fact.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county.

Action by C. W. Fairbanks and another against J. M. Rollins on a note. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Haskell, for appellant. Otis, Gregg & Hall, for respondents.

BRITT, C. By a contract in writing of date February 10, 1897, the plaintiffs agreed to sell and convey to defendant a "good and sufficient water right" for the irrigation of a parcel of land containing 4.22 acres, the same to be sufficient to furnish water to the amount of at least one-seventh of an inch, measured under four-inch pressure to each acre or fraction thereof in said parcel of land; in consideration whereof defendant agreed to execute to plaintiffs his promissory note for the sum of $500, and to pay the same when plaintiffs should tender to him a conveyance of said water right. He made to plaintiffs his note accordingly, and this is an action to enforce payment thereof. In his answer, the defendant pleaded said contract, and averred that the only offer of plaintiffs to perform the same consisted in the tender to him of five so-called "Class A Water Certificates" issued by the Bear Valley Land & Water Company, a corporation, together with the tender of a right of way through a certain pipe line reaching his land, for the conveyance of the water "represented by said water certificates." The form of said certificates was set forth in the answer. Thereby the said corporation in terms guarantied to the holder thereof a flow of one-seventh of an inch of water for each acre of land to which the water was to be devoted, etc. It was further averred in the answer that said certificates constitute no water right; that they do not and cannot vest in or transfer to the holder thereof any water or water right whatever; and that they are of no value. There were other allegations in the answer to the effect that said certificates evidence a fictitious increase of the capital stock, and also of the indebtedness of said corporation, and that it had no lawful authority to issue the same. The court found that plaintiffs made a tender substantially as alleged in the answer of defendant. It also found that such tender was an offer to convey a water right in accordance with the terms of said contract of February 10, 1897; that said certificates entitled the holder to the water described on the face of the same, and were of the value of at least $500; and that such certificates "convey and transfer the water and water rights represented on their face." There were also findings of evidential matters concerning the organization and powers of said corporation, and the origin and history of the said certificates issued by it. Judgment was for plaintiffs. Defendant relies for reversal on the contents of the findings alone.

The findings of ultimate facts above stated show that the consideration upon which said note was executed has not failed; and that, by the acceptance of the tender made to him, defendant would have received the transfer of the "water and water rights represented on the face" of said certificates, viz. a flow of one-seventh of an inch of water for each acre to be irrigated, which was the object of his contract with plaintiffs. Defendant claims that the objections urged by him to the validity of said water certificates are sustained by the said findings of evidence regarding the issuance thereof. We do not concede that; but, if we should, still those findings which respond to the substance of the issue, and show that plaintiffs offered to convey rights of water as required by their contract with defendant, would not be overthrown. The case is within the rule which forbids the impeachment of findings of ultimate facts by comparing them with other findings of mere probative facts which have no proper place in findings at all. Rowe v. Blake, 112 Cal. 637, 44 Pac. 1084; Rankin v. Newman, 107 Cal. 608, 40 Pac. 1024; Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 299, 38 Pac. 740. The judgment should be affirmed.

BAILEY v. JOHNSON (SACRAMENTO COUNTY, Intervener. Sac. 415).

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1898.)

SUBMISSION OF CONTROVERSY—PARTIES—COUNTIES—TAXATION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1138, which provides that parties to a question in difference which might be the subject of a civil action may agree on a case containing the facts on which the controversy depends, and present a submission of same to any court of competent jurisdiction, and obtain a determination of such question, a taxpayer and a tax collector may not submit an agreed case involving the validity of a tax, since the county, and not the tax collector, is a "party" to such question.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Agreed case of James Bailey against Frank T. Johnson, tax collector of Sacramento county, and the county of Sacramento, intervener. From a judgment for plaintiff, intervener appeals. Reversed.

C. H. Oatman, F. D. Ryan, and J. C. Jones, for appellant. J. H. McKune, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. The "agreed case" entered into between the plaintiff, Bailey, the owner of the assessed property, and defendant, Johnson, the tax collector of the county, whereby it was sought to submit to the court below, under the supposed sanction of section 1138 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the question of the validity of the tax in controversy, gave the court no jurisdiction of the subject-matter sought to have adjudicated. Section 1138 provides that "parties to a question in difference, which might be the subject of a civil action, may, without action, agree upon a case containing the facts upon which the controversy depends, and present a submission of the same to any court which would have jurisdiction if an action had been brought," etc., and thereby have a determination of such question. But this provision has reference to interested parties, authorized and capable of litigating the question involved. The taxpayer and the county were the only parties to the "question in difference," involving the validity of the tax in controversy. Defendant, Johnson, the tax collector, was not such a party, and he was without authority to bind the county in the premises. He was but the agent of the county for the collection of the tax, with no interest other than that of an officer performing a duty enjoined by law, and with only such power and authority as the statute gave. He was not concerned in the question of the validity of the tax. If he failed to collect it because of its illegality, he was not responsible to the county; and if he collected it, and it subsequently proved to have been illegally assessed, he was not responsible to the aggrieved taxpayer. It is quite obvious, therefore, that he was not a "party," within the statute, authorized to submit the controversy without action.

It does not follow that, because he would have been the proper party defendant in an action brought by Bailey to enjoin the collection of the tax, he is the proper party to this proceeding. Such an action runs against the officer or individual whose act is to be enjoined, whether he be a principal or an agent. And, while such an action would nominally be against the tax collector, the real defendant would be the county, with the right in the latter to conduct and have control of the defense. Here there is an attempt, without the intervention of an action, to submit to adjudication a controversy in which the rights of the county are directly involved, without any opportunity on its part to be heard. The objection to the jurisdiction interposed by the district attorney on behalf of the county should have been sustained. This renders it unnecessary to consider the other proposition discussed. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to dismiss the proceeding.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—CONTRACT—CONSIDERATION—MISTAKE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—EVIDENCE.

1. A contract to convey by good title was made between persons, both of whom claimed the premises by paramount title; but at the time of making the contract the vendee, acting on the advice of counsel, conceded the vendor's title to be the better one. The vendor testified that he agreed to convey only his interest, which was corroborated by another, and not denied by the vendee. Held, that a finding that the provision requiring a good title was inserted by mistake was justified.

2. The vendor and the vendee each claimed the premises by paramount title, and the vendee's counsel erroneously advised him that his title was inferior. The vendee knew all the facts on which this advice was based, and thereupon contracted to buy the vendor's interest. Held, that he was not entitled to be relieved from the contract on the ground of mistake, under Civ. Code, § 1577, defining a mistake as an unconscious ignorance or forgetfulness of a material fact, or a belief in the existence of a material thing which does not or did not exist.

3. The vendor and the vendee adversely claimed land in the former's possession worth $9,000, the vendee claiming under an attachment for $1,300. Held, that the vendee's agreement to purchase the vendor's interest for $4,750 was supported by a valuable consideration, though it afterwards appeared that the vendee's title was the better one.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. Yorke, Judge.

Action by Shirley C. Ward against Vicente Yorba to reform a contract to sell lands, and for specific performance as reformed, and for damages. Judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Smith, for appellant. A. M. Stephens, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to reform a contract of sale and purchase of a certain parcel of land situated in the city of Los Angeles, and to specifically enforce the same when reformed, and for damages. The pleadings are verified. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying a new trial, defendant appeals upon a statement of the case. The findings are quite lengthy, but the salient facts may be briefly summarized as follows: The premises in controversy originally belonged to one Francisca D. de Labracco, and both plaintiff and defendant claim title through this common source,—plaintiff by sale on execution to one Jarvis (who conveyed to plaintiff) at suit of one Bacon; and defendant by attachment proceedings at his own suit. Plaintiff's deed took effect as of date March 31, 1892, and defendant's March 5, 1892, by relation. The validity of defendant's attachment proceedings was in dispute at all the times mentioned in the findings. The property involved was worth $9,000. A suit was pending against Labracco, in which one Javier Yorba and one Davilla were plaintiffs, wherein it was claimed that Labracco was trustee of the title for plaintiffs in that suit; but it was found that defendant had knowledge of this action, and claimed to be able to control it. There was also a judgment lien for $312.75 on the property, of which defendant had full knowledge at the time he entered into the contract, the subject of the controversy. Plaintiff was in possession under his deed, and on February 10, 1893, the parties began negotiations looking to the sale by plaintiff and the purchase by defendant of plaintiff's interest in said property for the sum of $6,000, at which time both plaintiff and defendant believed defendant's attachment lien to be subordinate to the judgment lien through which plaintiff claimed title. On February 24, 1893, a controversy arose between the parties as to their respective claims, the defendant claiming that his right was superior to plaintiff's; and on that day defendant offered to sell his interest to plaintiff for $1,300 (the amount of his judgment in the attachment), or he would pay plaintiff $4,750 for his interest in the property, which latter proposition plaintiff accepted, and a written agreement was accordingly on that day entered into; but by mistake the agreement was drawn so as to obligate plaintiff to convey a good and perfect title, whereas the agreement was that he should convey only his interest in the property. Defendant knew all the facts relating to the title at the time the agreement was entered into, and was acting upon the advice of counsel then present. Defendant agreed to pay $100 cash in hand, which was done, and $4,650 in 30 days, which he failed to do. The consideration to defendant was plaintiff's compromise of his claim of superior title, dependent upon defendant's imperfect attachment proceeding mainly. The court, as conclusion of law, found that plaintiff was entitled to judgment (1) reforming the contract as prayed for, and (2) for the sum of $4,650, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from March 24, 1893, amounting in all to $5,789.25, and for costs of suit; and judgment was accordingly entered. Appellant relies upon the written contract, which it is conceded respondent cannot perform. Respondent claims that he can perform the actual agreement, and stands ready to do so. We do not understand appellant to dispute that the findings support the judgment, but his contention is that the evidence does not support the findings. We assume that the points relied upon are those presented in the briefs of respective counsel.

1. Appellant insists that the evidence fails to show that the actual agreement was different from the written agreement, or that there was any mistake in the drafting of the latter, and that it devolved upon respondent to make out a good title, which it is found he failed to do. Appellant concedes that a "vendor may stipulate that the purchaser shall accept the title as it is," but he adds that "such conditions should be looked at with great jealousy, as they are often traps for the unwary, and the court should at least expect the fact to be broadly stated that the seller only sells such title as he has, without warranting the same"; citing 1 Sugd. Vend. pp. 29, 30 (24), and pages 455, 456 (390, 391); Haynes v. White, 55 Cal. 38; and other cases. If the evidence clearly showed that the actual agreement was as it was found to be by the court, the case is brought within the principle invoked. Upon this point the evidence is somewhat, but not seriously, conflicting. On the day the contract was entered into there met in the office of Mr. Meserve—respondent's attorney—Mr. Meserve and respondent; Mr. Munday, appellant's then attorney, and appellant; and Mr. Sanchez, who was brought in by and as interpreter for appellant, who could not himself "talk or understand English." Mr. Unger, who made the abstract, was present part of the time. As to what took place at this meeting, which resulted in the contract being signed then and there, Mr. Meserve, Mr. Munday, and Mr. Ward, respondent (and Mr. Unger to some extent) testified on behalf of respondent, and Mr. Sanchez and appellant on behalf of appellant. We have carefully read this testimony, and while there is a decided and sharp conflict as to one or two facts that will be noticed hereafter, as to the fact that respondent was offering to sell only whatever interest he had in the property the evidence is clear, and is not denied by appellant in his testimony; and on his cross-examination Sanchez testified: "Q. Did you hear Mr. Meserve tell Mr. Munday all we were selling was the right, title, and interest such as was acquired under the Jarvis deed? A. Yes, sir; I heard Mr. Yorba say he thought he could control the Davilla suit. He said, 'I can fix it with my brother and mother all right.' This was at the time of signing the contract." It was testified to by respondent's witnesses, two of whom understood some Spanish, that what was said by and to appellant's attorney and by and to respondent's attorney during the negotiations was communicated to appellant by the interpreter. We think there was sufficient evidence to support the findings, and that the parties understood perfectly that respondent was selling and appellant was buying only such interest or title as respondent then had, and that the written instrument did not express the true intent of the parties in this regard. The contract was drawn by respondent's attorney as soon as the parties had reached an agreement, and both signed it. How it happened to be drawn as it is was not explained by any witness. It was drawn by the attorney of respondent (who is himself an attorney), and it is urged that on this account the rule in such cases should apply with especial force. Section 1639, Civ. Code, provides that "when a contract is reduced to writing, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible; subject, however, to the other provisions of this title." Section 1640, Id., reads, "When through fraud, mistake, or accident, a written contract fails to express the real intention of the parties, such intention is to be regarded and the erroneous parts of the writing disregarded." Here the ground relied upon is mistake, and it is urged that in actions of this kind the mistake must be "clearly made out by proofs entirely satisfactory"; citing 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 152 et seq.; Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 52; Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, 73 Cal. 452, 15 Pac. 82. It was said in the latter case: "The conclusion from the sum of all the authorities on the subject is, not that relief must necessarily be denied because there is a conflict of testimony, for that would result in a denial of justice in some of the plainest cases calling for such relief, but that upon all the proofs, taking the facts as they appear to the court after eliminating testimony unworthy of credence, or based upon mistake or uncertainty, as in other cases, the mistake must be established in a clear and convincing manner, and to the entire satisfaction of the court." As was said in that case, so say we here, "Viewed in this light, and we cannot say the court was unauthorized by the testimony in the conclusion it reached." The draftsman did not attempt to explain how he came to make the mistake, and probably could have given no rational explanation had he been asked to do so. That it was a mistake clearly appears, we think, by great preponderance in the evidence; and, that being so, an explanation as to how it happened is unimportant and immaterial.

2. It is contended that appellant's consent to the contract was not free, but was induced by the mistaken belief that the title was in respondent, and that appellant was purchasing a valuable interest in the property, and that he was clearly entitled, upon discovery of the mistake, to rescind the contract, and that this he immediately offered to do. It appears from the testimony of appellant and the witness Sanchez that Mr. Munday advised appellant that respondent's title was superior to appellant's. Appellant testified: "I then told Mr. Sanchez to ask Mr. Munday what chance I had in that suit. Then he answered me that I had no right in the world in the matter, except to bring suit or to buy the property." At another point in his testimony he said: "Mr. Munday told me that I had no right to the property whatever; that the attachment that I had was second to the one that Mr. Ward had. I found out that I did have title to that property,—that Mr. Munday's advice was erroneous, when I went to you [speaking to his then counsel, Mr. Smith], which was about March 27, 1893." It appears from the evidence of both Meserve and Munday that up to the time the parties met in Meserve's office, February 24th, each of them believed that he had the better title through the sheriff's sales; and in order to convince Meserve, respondent's attorney, of his error, the negotiations on that day were suspended while they went to the clerk's office to consult the records, after which, and after consulting the notes of the abstract of title prepared for defendant, Meserve conceded Munday's position. There was, however, some question as to the regularity of the attachment proceedings by which appellant got his title, which the court found was at all times a subject of dispute between the parties. Mr. Munday, in rebuttal of appellant's testimony, testified that appellant was mistaken as to the time he was told he had no title; that it was some days before February 24th, and certainly prior to the making of the contract; and that he (Munday) did not know till that day that his client's title was superior to respondent's. There is much evidence tending to show that appellant knew all the facts as found by the court at the time he signed the contract, and that he was not then ignorant of the supposed strength of his own title. Mr. Munday testified: "The abstract was there before us, and I was buying what there was. I do not think 'perfect title' was mentioned, or any understanding of perfect title used. I understood it in this way: I stated to the parties the exact status of the title as I found it from the records—from this abstract or memorandum—there in your office. After that, and upon that, Mr. Yorba authorized me to make the offer of four thousand five hundred dollars. The Court: Question. For what? A. For whatever appeared on this— As a matter of fact, he said he could control this, these outstanding liens,—these outstanding suits, rather; didn't care anything for them. * * * Then—it was possibly my own suggestion—we split the difference between four thousand five hundred dollars and five thousand dollars, making four thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars. One hundred dollars was paid, and a receipt given for it, and the contract was written out by Mr. Meserve. I looked it over. Everybody seemed to be satisfied. I went out with Mr. Yorba. Tried in different places to borrow money for him." We are unable to see that appellant was misled in any way by any representations of respondent, and, if he acted through any mistaken belief of the strength of respondent's title or the weakness of his own, his action was in the face of full information then in his own control and that of his attorney. He acted not only upon means of knowledge available, but upon actual knowledge. There is no fraud or unfairness alleged or proved, and we are unable to see why appellant should not be held to the performance of the contract fairly and intelligently entered into by him. Section 1577 of the Civil Code, relied upon, has no application, because there was not "an unconscious ignorance * * * of a fact material to the contract"; nor was there a "belief in the present existence of a thing material to the contract which did not exist."

3. It is claimed by appellant that there was no adequate consideration for the contract. It is not claimed by appellant that there was any fraud practiced upon him, or that there was anything unfair in the transaction. His claim rests wholly on the alleged mistake he made in supposing respondent's title superior to his own. But we have seen he was not mistaken, but acted with full knowledge of the record title of respondent. It appears, however, that respondent was then in possession of the premises. He disputed the regularity of appellant's attachment proceedings, while admitting that, if the lien was valid and legal, his deed took effect prior to respondent's deed; and it appears that an action is now pending in the lower court between appellant, as plaintiff, and respondent, as defendant, involving the regularity of said attachment proceedings, which action was determined in favor of this appellant, and was "tried * * * and submitted at the same time as the trial and submission of this action," and it was this attachment which the court found was at all times a subject of dispute between the parties. It is in evidence, and was found by the court, that the property was worth $9,000. Appellant's judgment under which he claimed was for $1,300, and he claimed to be able to control the other pending action of Yorba and Davilla against Labracco; and he knew of the judgment lien of $312.75 in the action of Bacon against Labracco. There was therefore nothing unconscionable or unreasonable in his agreeing to pay $4,750 for respondent's title or claim to property which had cost appellant $1,300, and was worth $9,000. We think there was sufficient consideration to support the contract. By it all of respondent's rights were extinguished, and possession to be surrendered, and all litigation avoided. There was some value to appellant in these considerations, and, however small, they were given in good faith, and free from fraud, and will support the contract. Appellant got all he bargained for, and should not be heard to complain of the inadequacy of the consideration. He was in position at the time he signed the contract to know all that he learned later on, and, if he chose to purchase rather than fight for peace, he must abide the consequences of his own deliberate act. We find no error, and therefore recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

SAN JOSE SAFE-DEPOSIT BANK OF
SAVINGS v. BANK OF MADERA et al. (Sac. 433.)<sup>1</sup>

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1898)

MORTGAGES—WHAT ARE—RECORD—CONVEYANCE OF PREMISES—REDEMPTION—VALIDITY—RIGHT TO QUESTION.

1. Where one borrows money with which to redeem from a foreclosure sale, and, as security therefor, assigns to the lender all his right, as redemptioner or otherwise, by reason of the redemption, and authorizes him to obtain from the sheriff a deed of the property in his own name, the borrower does not convey the land absolutely, but only hypothecates his interest in it, inclusive of the right, under Code Civ. Proc. § 707, to receive the rents from the terretenant, and the lender holds the sheriff's deed as mortgage.

2. Where the execution debtor and a junior lienor, who has hypothecated her interest as redemptioner, join in conveying the legal title, the grantee holds the same subject to the equitable mortgage created by the assignment of the redemptioner.

3. Offer of payment is not a condition to the right to defend against a claim of ownership based on an assignment as security of the interest of a redemptioner from sale under foreclosure, and of his right as such to demand a deed from the sheriff.

4. Where the grantee of the interest of a junior lienor knew of her prior assignment, as security, of her interest as redemptioner, he cannot object that the mortgage, a copy of the record whereof was produced to the sheriff at the time of redemption, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 705, was never legally recorded because of defects in the certificate of acknowledgment; nor that the redemption money was paid to the sheriff then in office, and not to the officer who made the sale; nor that the notice of redemption served on the sheriff then in office described the sale as made by him, instead of by his predecessor.

5. The assignee of the purchaser at a foreclosure sale who has accepted the redemption money cannot deny that the redemption was effectual.

6. Where the period allowed a judgment debtor to redeem has expired without his redeeming, neither he nor his assignee can question the effectiveness of a redemption by a creditor.

7. One who has assigned her interest under a redemption as security for the money with which the redemption was made is estopped to impugn the manner of her own redemption.

8. One claiming to hold land absolutely under conveyances from the mortgagor and a senior lienor cannot, as holder of a docketed judgment against the legal owner, question the manner of redemption of the land by the senior lienor, who had assigned her interest as redemptioner before the conveyances.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Madera county; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by the San José Safe-Deposit Bank of Savings against the Bank of Madera and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial it appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Hatch and Frs. E. Spencer, for appellant. R. L. Hargrove, W. T. Searles, and B. W. Child, for respondents.

BRITT, C. In this action, after trial, the court below rendered judgment whereby defendant Westfall, as sheriff of the county of Madera, was required to execute to plaintiff a deed of certain land which had been sold by his predecessor in office in the course of judicial proceedings to foreclose a mortgage thereon, and whereby also, among other directions in plaintiff's favor, the Bank of Madera and other defendants were enjoined from asserting any title or interest in said land. Afterwards the court granted a new trial, and the plaintiff took this appeal. Among the facts in evidence, or admitted by the pleadings, it appeared that on March 4, 1893, defendant Charles Dworack owned said land, and on that day mortgaged the same to one Roberts as security for a debt of $3,000, and interest thereon, he owed to said Roberts. On January 10, 1894, said Charles Dworack made a second mortgage of the premises to his mother, the defendant Mary Dworack, purporting to secure payment to her of the sum of $8,500, with interest, on or before January 10, 1896. August 4, 1894, said Charles made a deed in terms conveying said land to said Mary, and caused the same to be duly recorded. The court found that this deed was never delivered to the grantee or to other person for her. December 12, 1894, the land was sold by the then sheriff of the county, one Thurman, pursuant to a judgment obtained by Roberts in an action prosecuted by him against Charles and Mary Dworack to foreclose his said mortgage of March 4, 1893. Roberts himself became the purchaser. This is the sale which the judgment in the present action directed said Westfall to consummate by issuing his deed to plaintiff. Previous to such sale, said Bank of Madera recovered a personal judgment against Charles Dworack for the sum of $1,490, which was docketed and became a lien on the interest of said Charles in said land subordinate to the lien of Roberts' mortgage. On February 18, 1895, Mary Dworack, claiming to be a qualified redemptioner as holder of said mortgage of January 10, 1894, paid to Westfall, who had succeeded Thurman in the office of sheriff, the sum necessary to redeem the land from the sale to Roberts, and Roberts accepted the same as paid for that purpose. The money thus paid was borrowed from the plaintiff in this action. The court found that, "for the purpose of effecting a redemption from the foreclosure sale of December 12, 1894, the plaintiff herein loaned and advanced to the defendant Mary Dworack the sum of $3,750, with the distinct understanding that said sum was to be used by her in effecting such redemption, and that, after such redemption should be effected, she would repay said sum to plaintiff, and interest," etc. It was also found, in effect, that, in order to secure plaintiff for the money so advanced, the said Mary Dworack, on said February 18, 1895, executed to plaintiff "an assignment and transfer of all her right as redemptioner, or otherwise, by reason of the redemption that day made by her of the real property above described." Such assignment in terms authorized plaintiff to obtain from the sheriff a deed of the property. On April 16, 1895, said Roberts quitclaimed to the Bank of Madera whatever interest he then had in the land. On June 29, 1895, Charles Dworack and Mary Dworack made their several deeds of grant, each purporting to convey the said land to said Bank of Madera, in consideration whereof that bank released its aforesaid judgment against said Charles. At the same time, and for the same consideration, Mary Dworack released the mortgage for $8,500 made to her by Charles on January 10, 1894. The court found that the Bank of Madera took possession of the premises under said deeds from Charles and Mary Dworack, and also that it was not at the commencement of this action (July 29, 1895), nor ever at all, the owner or entitled to the possession thereof.

It is plain that when Mary Dworack assigned to plaintiff her rights as redemptioner,—whatever those may have been,—in order to secure the loan plaintiff made to her, she did no more than hypothecate her interest in the land, inclusive of the right, under the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 707), to receive the rents from the terre-tenant; and, if plaintiff should procure the sheriff's deed, it will hold the same as mortgagee, and not as owner. Civ. Code, § 2924; Baber v. McLellan, 30 Cal. 135; Baker v. Insurance Co., 79 Cal. 34, 21 Pac. 357; Sears v. Dixon, 33 Cal. 326. The Bank of Madera acquired from Charles and Mary Dworack, by their deeds of June 29, 1895, the legal title to the land, and yet holds the same, subject to such rights of the plaintiff as may be found to inure to it as equitable mortgagee in virtue of its transactions with Mary Dworack. See Page v. Rogers, 31 Cal. 300-305; Hill v. Eldred, 49 Cal. 398. Therefore the finding declaring that the Bank of Madera is not, and never was, the owner of the land (on which the judgment enjoining it from asserting any claim thereto seems to have followed), was contrary to the evidence, and the court very properly granted a new trial. The contention of plaintiff, as we understand the argument, that none of the defendants can resist its claim to ownership of the land in the absence of an offer to repay the loan made by it to Mary Dworack, is not sustainable. We see no substantial distinction between this phase of the action and the case where a mortgagee sues the mortgagor in ejectment. Payment or offer of payment is not a condition of the right to defend. Locke v. Moulton, 96 Cal. 21, 30 Pac. 957.

What has been said suffices for the disposition of the appeal; but, in view of a new trial, it is proper to advert briefly to certain other matters appearing in the record. The court found, and there was evidence to sustain the finding, that, before the deed of Mary Dworack to the Bank of Madera, the latter had notice of the prior assignment to plaintiff of the rights accruing to said Mary in virtue of her redemption from Roberts. The court therefore rightly disregarded sundry objections of said bank, touching the procedure followed by Mary Dworack for the purpose of such redemption,—as that the mortgage of January 10, 1894, a note of the record whereof was produced to the sheriff (Code Civ. Proc. § 705), was never legally recorded because of defects in the certificate of acknowledgment thereto; that the redemption money was paid to the sheriff then in office, and not to the officer who made the sale; that the notice of redemption served on Sheriff Westfall described the sale as made by him, instead of by his predecessor, etc. The Bank of Madera is in no situation to raise such questions, even if said alleged irregularities would in any case invalidate a redemption otherwise good, as to which we intimate no opinion. Said bank cannot, as the assignee of Roberts, question the redemption. Roberts, having accepted the money paid as and for that purpose, could not deny that the redemption was effectual. Bagley v. Ward, 37 Cal. 121; Freem. Ex'ns, § 314a. As grantee of Charles and Mary Dworack, it is in no better position; for as to Charles, the judgment debtor, the full period of six months allowed him to redeem, under the statute then in force, having expired, and he having effected no redemption, his beneficial interest in the land was gone, and whether the sheriff should convey to the first purchaser or to a redeeming creditor was of no material concern to him. Blair v. Chamblin, 39 Ill. 522, 527.

And, of course, Mary Dworack was estopped, as to plaintiff, to impugn the manner of her own redemption. The original status of the Bank of Madera, as holder of a docketed judgment against Charles Dworack does not aid it in this particular (Bagley v. Ward, supra); for allowing that it could now, and in this action, enforce any right of redemption in its own favor by reason of such judgment, it does not seek to do so, but claims to own the land absolutely under said conveyances from the Dworacks.

The foregoing remarks have no relation to the question agitated in the case whether Mary Dworack was a qualified redemptioner, within the definition of the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 701). If she was not, then we suppose that the payment she made to Roberts could not operate to invest her with statutory rights of a redemptioner, and her assignment conveyed none to plaintiff, though no doubt the effect of the sale to Roberts was thereby extinguished. Phyfe v. Riley, 15 Wend. 248. See Edwards v. Burris, 60 Cal. 157. But, as to this question, whether the mortgage of January 10, 1894, on which said Mary assumed the right to redeem, was a fraud upon the Bank of Madera and other creditors of Charles Dworack; and whether plaintiff had notice of its fraudulent character, or was otherwise affected thereby; also whether the deed of August 4, 1894, from Charles to Mary Dworack was delivered, or, if not formally delivered, was yet assented to and acted upon by the grantee, so as to become operative and destroy her character of mortgagee by merger in the fee,—are issues mainly of fact, on which we cannot anticipate the decision of the trial court. The order granting a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

SAN JOSE SAFE-DEPOSIT BANK OF
SAVINGS v. BANK OF MADE-
RA et al. (Sac. 444.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1898.)
RECEIVERS—POWER TO APPOINT—APPEAL—DIS-MISSAL.

1. The court has no power to appoint a receiver of lands pendente lite in an action by one not entitled to their possession, and involving only legal rights.

2. Where a new trial is granted after an appeal from a judgment, the appeal will be dismissed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Madera county; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by the San José Safe-Deposit Bank of Savings against the Bank of Madera and others, to compel defendant Westfall, as sheriff, to execute a deed of certain lands, and to restrain the other defendants from asserting title to such lands. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and a new trial was afterwards granted, and a receiver pendente lite appointed, and defendants appealed from the judgment and from the order appointing a receiver, the appeal from the judgment having been taken before the granting of the new trial. Appeal from the judgment dismissed, and order appointing a receiver reversed.

R. L. Hargrove, W. T. Searles, and B. W. Child, for appellants. Jackson Hatch and F. E. Spencer, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Appeals by defendants from a judgment and a subsequent order appointing a receiver. The main facts in the case are stated in the opinion rendered on the plaintiff's appeal from the order granting a new trial. The judgment included a provision that plaintiff recover from the defendant Bank of Madera the sum of $1,745, rents of the land in dispute, collected by said defendant, from June 29, 1895, the date of the deeds made to it by Charles and Mary Dworack, to November 7, 1896, the date of the court's decision in the case. On February 15, 1897, the Bank of Madera and certain other defendants appealed from the judgment, and gave a bond in double the amount of the pecuniary recovery to stay execution thereof pending the appeal. June 1, 1897, the court made an order granting a new trial on the motion of said defendants, and the plaintiff appealed therefrom on July 2d following. August 10, 1897, on the application of plaintiff, the court appointed a receiver "to take and keep possession of the real property described in the judgment, * * * and to receive and collect the rents, issues, and profits thereof, from date of said judgment until the further order of the court."

This order was erroneous. We have seen, in affirming the order granting a new trial, that the ultimate rights of the plaintiff are, if anything, those of a mortgagee. These do not include the right to possess the land (Civ. Code, § 2927), nor to have possession thereof delivered to a receiver (Guy v. Ide, 6 Cal. 99), except by statute now in an action to foreclose the mortgage (Code Civ. Proc. § 564, subd. 2). Plaintiff's action is not prosecuted for the purpose of foreclosure. The complaint contains no allegation even that the money loaned to Mary Dworack has not been repaid. The averments of the complaint, in so far as they furnish a basis for the recovery of the rents and profits of the land, are meager; but, if they may be regarded sufficient for that purpose, still the appointment of a receiver of the rents was not proper. It was not made in order to carry the judgment into effect, nor could it have been, since (aside from any consequence of the order granting a new trial) the judgment for money was stayed by a proper bond (Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 328, 24 Pac. 121), and was not proper with a view to preserving the future rents, etc., to abide the result of the action, because plaintiff's case has not the character of a suit in equity to subject the rents to payment of Mary Dworack's debt to plaintiff. On the contrary, it proceeds on the assumed ownership by plaintiff of the land and the profits thereof. Henry v. Everts, 30 Cal. 425. In such a case, involving merely legal, as distinguished from equitable, rights, the law does not authorize the appointment of a receiver. Bateman v. Superior Court, 54 Cal. 285; Scott v. Lumber Co., 67 Cal. 76, 7 Pac. 131. The case of Whitney v. Buckman, 26 Cal. 447, on which plaintiff seems to rely, was decided on a former statutory provision which was not re-enacted in section 564, Code Civ. Proc. The distinction is pointed out in Bateman v. Superior Court, supra. As the order granting a new trial on defendants' motion has been affirmed here, the judgment, of course, falls, and the appeal taken therefrom should be dismissed; the order appointing a receiver should be reversed; defendants to recover costs on both appeals.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal from the judgment is dismissed; the order appointing a receiver is reversed; defendants to recover costs on both appeals.

THAXTER v. INGLIS et al. (L. A. 423.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1898.)
BOUNDARIES—CONVENTIONAL LOCATION—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS

1. Uncertainty as to the location of a boundary is sufficient foundation for an agreement respecting it by the adjoining owners.

2. Declarations made by a party to a boundary agreement, subsequent thereto, that the location was subject to future correction, were not against his interest, and, not being shown to have been uttered in the presence of the other party or his successors in title, were properly excluded in an action concerning the boundary.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Annette Thaxter against Wheeler M. Inglis and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. E. Bacon, for appellant. James Burdett, for respondents.

BRITT, C. This action concerns the boundary between adjoining tracts of agricultural lands. The quantity of land in dispute seems to be less than the tenth part of an acre. Plaintiff derives title through one A. W. Thaxter, now deceased. Defendants' land was formerly the property of one John Willey. The court found, in substance, that in the year 1881 said A. W. Thaxter and John Willey, in order to determine a dispute and uncertainty between them respecting the common boundary of said lands, fixed and agreed by parol upon certain lines as and for such boundary, and that they and their successors in interest thereafter claimed and occupied their respective tracts up to the lines as so established during a period of nearly 15 years, and until a time shortly before the commencement of this action, when the plaintiff repudiated the same. Defendants abide by such agreed boundary, and judgment was in their favor.

On appeal the plaintiff argues that the evidence did not justify said findings. The finding of a dispute between said former owners was perhaps scarcely sustained by the evidence, but it is immaterial. There was uncertainty as to the location of the boundary, and this was sufficient foundation for their agreement. Helm v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 485, 18 Pac. 604. Less conflict appears in the evidence regarding said agreement, and the subsequent occupancy conforming thereto, than is common in such cases, and the finding was in accord with the preponderance of the same. The judgment following thereon was right. Cavanaugh v. Jackson, 91 Cal. 580, 27 Pac. 931.

It is said that the court erred in excluding evidence of subsequent declarations of said A. W. Thaxter to the effect that the location of the boundary was provisional, and subject to future correction. These declarations were not against interest and were not shown to have been uttered in the presence of defendants or of their predecessor in title. They were properly excluded from consideration. See Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1849, 1853. The judgment and order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SIMONSON et al. v. BURR, Sheriff, et al.
(L. A. 425.)

HOMESTEAD — VALIDITY — DECLARATION — SUFFICIENCY — ABANDONMENT.

1. Although under Civ. Code, §§ 1238-1262, the husband alone may select the homestead from community property, the fact that the wife joins with him in the declaration does not vitiate it.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 17, providing that the singular number includes the plural, and the plural the singular, the statements in a declaration of homestead that "we do now, at the time of making this declaration, actually reside on the land" claimed, and that "we do hereby claim the same as a homestead," are the individual statements of each of the declarants.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 1243, providing that a homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment or a grant thereof; and section 1244, making such abandonment effectual only from the time it is filed in the office in which the declaration of homestead was recorded,—the leasing of homestead property, and the purchase of other property, and the fact of residence thereon, do not constitute an abandonment of the homestead.

4. Whether a declaration of homestead was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding a creditor is immaterial, where the creditor's claim was not merged in judgment prior to the declaration.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. Yorke, Judge.

Suit by Espen Simonson and Bengita Simonson against John Burr, as sheriff of Los Angeles county, and George H. Emery, to restrain the sale, under an execution, of certain property, claimed as a homestead. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Mulford & Pollard, for appellants. Kendrick & Knott, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs in this action, at all the times named in the pleadings therein, were husband and wife. On April 6, 1891, the real property involved in the action was conveyed by deed to the wife, Bengita Simonson. On December 3, 1892, the plaintiffs jointly executed, acknowledged, and filed for record a declaration of homestead upon the said property. The declaration stated that "we, Espen Simonson and Bengita Simonson, hereby certify and declare that we are husband and wife, and that we do now, at the time of making this declaration, actually reside on the land, and premises hereinafter described; that the land and premises on which we reside are situate in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, bounded and described as follows [then setting out the description]; that it is our intention to use and claim said land and premises, together with the dwelling house thereon, and we hereby do claim the same as a homestead; that the actual cash value of said property we estimate to be four thousand dollars. In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands, this 3d day of December, 1892." On June 30, 1893, the defendant George H. Emery recovered a judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county against the plaintiff Bengita Simonson, for the sum of $1,649, and $45 costs, which judgment was duly docketed, and no part thereof has been paid. On February 6, 1897, a writ of execution upon the said judgment was issued and placed in the hands of the defendant John Burr, who was then the sheriff of Los Angeles county; and, under the supposed authority of said writ, he, as such sheriff, levied upon the said real property, and was threatening to advertise and sell the same to satisfy the said judgment. Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced this action to obtain an injunction restraining the sale of the said property, or any part thereof, under or by virtue of said execution. The complaint sets out all the facts, and alleges, in effect, that the said real property was purchased and paid for with community funds, and at all the times mentioned in the complaint was the community property of the plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs' title thereto would be clouded by such sale, and great and irreparable injury would thereby be done to them. The answer denies, upon information and belief, that the said property at all the times mentioned in the complaint, or at any time, was community property, or was purchased with community funds; denies that plaintiffs' title to said real property would be clouded by a sale of the same, "other than such as defendants are of right and law entitled to place thereon," or that any injury would thereby be done to plaintiffs; and alleges, upon information and belief, that on or about the month of September, 1896, plaintiffs leased the said property to one Schandoney for the term of one year, and that, since said letting, they have not lived upon or occupied the same, or any part thereof, but have been and now are living and residing upon other property in Los Angeles county which they lately purchased, and upon which they have erected a home in which they are now residing. A general demurrer to the answer was interposed and sustained; and, defendants declining to amend, judgment was entered on May 7, 1897, awarding the plaintiffs the relief demanded in their complaint. From that judgment, defendants appeal.

1. In support of the appeal it is claimed that the declaration of homestead set out was nugatory and entirely ineffectual to create any homestead right in the property described, for the reason that it was executed jointly by the husband and wife. The Civil Code provides as to homesteads: Section 1238: "If the claimant be married, the homestead may be selected from the community property, or the separate property of the husband, or, with the consent of the wife, from her separate property." Section 1239: "The homestead cannot be selected from the separate property of the wife without her consent, shown by her making, or joining in making, the declaration of homestead." Section 1260: "Homesteads may be selected and claimed * * * by any head of a family." Section 1261: The phrase "head of a family" includes "the husband, when the claimant is a married person." Section 1262: "In order to select a homestead, the husband or other head of a family, or, in case the husband has not made such selection, the wife, must execute and acknowledge * * * a declaration of homestead and file the same for record." Section 1263: "The declaration of homestead must contain: (1) A statement showing that the person making it is the head of a family; or, when the declaration is made by the wife, showing that her husband has not made such declaration, and that she therefore makes the declaration for their joint account;

(2) a statement that the person making it is residing on the premises, and claims them as a homestead," etc.

"The statute in reference to homesteads is a remedial measure, and, as such, is to be liberally construed;" and where the several acts required "have been substantially performed, and where the declaration contains the essence of the statutory requirements, the construction should be so liberal as to advance the object of the constitution and statute." Schuyler v. Broughton, 76 Cal. 524, 18 Pac. 436; Southwick v. Davis, 78 Cal. 504, 21 Pac. 121; Heathman v. Holmes, 94 Cal. 291, 29 Pac. 404. We think the declaration involved in this case shows a substantial performance of all the acts required by the statute, and that it was sufficient to create and establish a valid homestead upon the premises described therein. The declarants were husband and wife, and the husband was therefore the "head of a family." If the premises were community property, the husband alone was authorized to select the same as a homestead, and to execute a valid declaration of homestead thereon; and it was not necessary that the wife should join him in doing so. But the fact that she did join him in making the declaration could not, and did not, in any way impair or affect its validity. If, on the other hand, the premises were the separate property of the wife, then the homestead could not be selected therefrom without her consent, shown by her making, or joining in making, the declaration of homestead. The fact, therefore, that the parties joined in making the declaration, shows a full compliance with the requirements of the statutes, whether the premises are regarded as the community property of the spouses or the separate property of the wife. The statements that "we do now, at the time of making this declaration, actually reside on the land and premises herein-after described," and that "we do hereby claim the same as a homestead," are statements that each of the declarants is actually residing on the premises, and claims the same as a homestead. "The singular number includes the plural, and the plural the singular." Code Civ. Proc. § 17.

2. The facts set up in the answer as to the leasing of their homestead property by the plaintiffs, and the purchase of other property upon which they had erected a home in which they were then residing, did not show, or tend to show, an abandonment of the homestead. A homestead once created under the provisions of the Civil Code is not abandoned by the claimant's ceasing to reside upon the premises; and it can only be abandoned in the way pointed out in sections 1243 and 1244 of that Code. Porter v. Chapman, 65 Cal. 365, 4 Pac. 237; Tipton v. Martin, 71 Cal. 325, 12 Pac. 244; Lubbock v. McMann, 82 Cal., 229, 22 Pac. 1145.

3. Appellants argue with apparent earnestness that the attempt by respondents to create a homestead was fraudulent. They say the declaration of homestead was filed after Emery commenced the suit in which he obtained the judgment which he is now seeking to enforce, and claim that the purpose was to hinder and delay him in the collection of his debt. It does not appear from the record when Emery commenced his suit against Mrs. Simonson, and there are no allegations of fraud in the pleadings. But, if fraud had been pleaded, this ground of objection to plaintiffs' judgment could not be sustained. In Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 477, 14 Pac. 198, it is said, on page 483, 72 Cal., and page 200, 14 Pac.: "The homestead is exempt from forced sale, except as provided in the Civil Code (section 1240). The very purpose of the homestead law is to give to one—except as against an indebtedness already merged in a judgment, and as against a judgment of peculiar character subsequently entered—the right to preserve and protect a homestead from forced sale. It has never been held that a homestead was invalid because the declarant was in debt, or declared the homestead to protect it from existing debts. It is not invalid because made during the progress of litigation, which subsequently results in an ordinary money judgment against the homesteader, or because made at any time before the entry and docketing of such judgment. The law authorizes a debtor to erect a barrier around the home, over which the sheriff, although armed with final process under such judgment, cannot pass. With the policy of the law, or the abstract morality of a particular transaction, we have nothing to do. The doctrine bearing upon conveyances made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors has no application to the creation of a homestead." And see Beaton v. Reid, 111 Cal. 484, 44 Pac. 167. We conclude that the court properly sustained the demurrer to the defendants' answer, and that there is no merit in the appeal. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

KERRY v. PACIFIC MARINE CO.
(S. F. 818.)<sup>1</sup>

SHIPPING—CHARTERS—CONSTRUCTION—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—MANAGERS—OWNERS—DAMAGES—APPEAL—FINDINGS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. The owner of a vessel entered into a charter party to carry goods in it to a certain place, agreeing to keep the vessel, during the voyage, tight, staunch, and well fitted, that all the vessel should be at the sole use of plaintiff, and that he would receive on board during the voyage the goods specified for a stipulated consideration. Held, that there was an implied obligation that loading and unloading should be so done by the vessel owner as not to cause unnecessary injury to the goods, under Civ. Code, § 2114, requiring ordinary care and diligence of a carrier for reward.

2. Civ. Code, § 2071, making it the duty of a ship's manager to provide for its seaworthiness, and to furnish a proper master, mate, and crew, and supplies, does not fully define the duties and liabilities of a manager who is part owner; and a managing owner, who makes a charter party, as such, without disclosing the other part owners, is personally liable thereon.

3. In an action against the managing owner of a vessel on a charter party on which he is personally liable, a finding that he is a part owner of the vessel is immaterial.

4. 1 Supp. U. S. Rev. St. 1874-91, p. 443, § 18, limiting the individual liability of ship owners to the proportion of the ship owned by them, restricts the liability imposed on them by law as the result of such ownership, and does not limit their liability on contracts made by them.

5. The court will not, on appeal, pass on the relative weight of conflicting evidence.

6. Where the damages to certain lumber, for breach of contract, were specially alleged as being a certain sum per foot, it was error to award an amount exceeding that sum, though they were by the general ad damnum clause laid as amounting to a lump sum, which exceeded the sum awarded.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by A. S. Kerry against the Pacific Marine Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for appellant. W. H. Fowler and D. H. Whittemore, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action on a charter party by which defendant undertook to carry for plaintiff, in the bark Templar, a cargo of piles from Seattle to San Francisco. Damages are claimed as resulting from the careless and negligent handling of the piles while being loaded and unloaded, whereby the bark on them became peeled off, thus diminishing their value. Plaintiff had judgment for $2,390, from which, and from the order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

The pleadings are verified. The complaint alleges that defendant is a corporation, and, "as managing owner of the bark Templar, of San Francisco, * * * entered into a contract of charter party with plaintiff, * * * whereby it was covenanted and agreed that the said bark Templar should be chartered, etc.; * * * that defendant agreed to keep said vessel, during said voyage, tight, staunch, and well fitted; that she was to receive the said piles and short storage as aforesaid, carry the same, and deliver them at the port of San Francisco in good, marketable condition, and in as good order and condition as they received the same," etc. The charter party purports to be "between the Pacific Marine Supply Company of San Francisco, Cal., party of the first part, managing owner of the bark Templar, of San Francisco, * * * and A. S. Kerry, of Seattle, Wash., of the second part." By the terms of the charter party the first party agreed "on the freighting and chartering of the said vessel unto the said party of the second part from a voyage from the port of Seattle, Washington, to San Francisco, California, on the terms" following: (1) That the vessel should be kept tight and staunch, etc., and well supplied with men and provisions; (2) that all the vessel, except certain portions for the use of the crew, should be at the sole use of plaintiff; and defendant agreed (3) "to take and receive on board the same vessel during the voyage [then follow the agreements entered into by plaintiff as to cargo to be furnished, the size of piles at the butt, rate of payment per lineal foot, regulations as to discharging cargo, etc.]" The contract is signed as follows: "Pacific Marine Supply Company, Alfred Greenebaum, Manager. D. M. Kennedy, Agent for A. S. Kerry."

1. It is contended by defendant that the action is based upon the breach of the written contract, which nowhere in terms provides that defendant agreed to deliver the piles in good order and condition as received, and unless there was such implied promise plaintiff cannot recover; that allegations and proofs must agree, and the proofs must disclose the cause of action which is alleged in the complaint (citing Barrere v. Soms, 113 Cal. 97, 45 Pac. 177); and it is claimed that there is a total failure of proofs upon this point. The contract does not provide in terms for the safe delivery of the cargo; but the court found that "defendant agreed that the said vessel should receive the said piles, and carry the same, and deliver them at the port of San Francisco, in good, marketable condition, and in as good condition as it received the same." The court also found that the piles, when received, were in good and marketable condition. These findings are challenged as not supported by the evidence. The court also found that the "defendant was the owner of nine-sixteenths of said vessel, and was the manager thereof; that as such owner, and as agent of the owners of the other seven-sixteenths, said defendant made said charter." It appears in evidence that a receipt for the cargo was signed by John Lee, master (who was also a part owner), which reads: "Seattle, Wash., August 29, 1893. Received from A. S. Kerry, on board the bark Templar, the following packages, contents unknown, to be delivered at San Francisco, Cal., * * * and with privilege of reshipping on steamboats or barges." Then follows description of cargo. Defendant, by the contract itself, let not only the vessel in proper condition "and provided with every requisite" for the service, but it also agreed to furnish "men and provisions necessary for the voyage"; and defendant engaged "to take and receive on board the same vessel during the afore-said voyage," the entire vessel (except cabin, deck, and room for the crew and stowage for sails, cables, and provisions), "to be at the sole use and disposal of" plaintiff. The compensation was fixed by a rate to be charged per lineal foot of the piles and a certain rate for other lumber. Lay days were provided for in loading and unloading, beyond which plaintiff was to pay $40 per day for detention. Defendant agreed to receive cargo "delivered alongside the vessel, within reach of her tackles," and the charter was to commence "when the vessel is ready to receive cargo at her place of loading and notice thereof is given," and not at San Francisco, where she was when chartered. The receipt given shows that the cargo was received on board ship by the master, "to be delivered at San Francisco." The evidence showed that the loading and unloading was done by the crew of the vessel under the direction of the master, who had entire charge and command of the ship. It is evident, we think, that the entire control and management of the vessel, and the loading and unloading of the cargo, were in the hands of defendant. Plaintiff was to pay freight at fixed rates on the cargo when delivered. In such contract as this there is, we think, an implied obligation that, in loading and unloading cargo, it shall be so done as not to cause unnecessary injury to the merchandise; and for injury resulting from the negligence of the carrier there is an implied liability. Civ. Code, § 2114. It was not necessary, therefore, for plaintiff to prove an express stipulation in the written contract that the freight was to be delivered in good condition.

The question as to who is to be considered as owner for the voyage, in cases of charter party, so as to create a liability for repairs or breaches of duty, has been often litigated in England and America. The principles upon which the cases rest will be found discussed in Abb. Shipp. pt. 1, c. 1, § 8. In a question of construction it is not possible to lay down any rule of universal application, but Mr. Abbott says: "It seems to result, from the cases decided upon this subject, that when, by the terms of the charter party, the master and mariners are to continue subject to the orders of the ship owner, he retaining through them the possession, management, and control of the vessel, it is to be considered a contract to carry the freighter's goods; but where the merchant engages to pay a stipulated price to the ship owner for the use of his ship, for the voyage, by the month or year,—takes it and them into his service,—receiving the freight actually earned by it to his own use, the master and mariners becoming subject to his orders, and the general management and control of them and the vessel being given up to him, it is a demise of the vessel with her crew for the voyage, or the term specified. The charterer becomes owner pro hac vice, entitled to the rights and subject to the responsibilities which attach to the charter." In the case of Marcadier v. Insurance Co., 8 Cranch, 39, it was said: "Where the general owner retains the possession, command, and navigation of the ship, and contracts to carry a cargo on freight for the voyage, the charter party is considered a mere affreightment, sounding in covenant, and the freighter is not clothed with the character or legal responsibility of ownership." It certainly would not be for one moment contended in the case at bar that the plaintiff would have been liable, under the charter party here, for damages resulting from collision through the negligence of the master or crew in navigating the chartered vessel. We are unable to see, in the contract entered into, as understood and acted upon by all the parties, any element of ownership pro hac vice in plaintiff; nor can we see in it such demise of the vessel and crew as would subject the plaintiff to the responsibilities which attach to the character of owner pro tempore.

But it is contended that the action is against defendant as managing owner of the vessel, and that there is an entire failure of proof that it was such owner. As we understand defendant's contention, it is that defendant was the manager of the vessel, and as such was the general agent for the owners, and incurred no other liability than to provide for the ship's seaworthiness, to take care of her in port, to see that she was provided with necessary papers, with proper master, mate, crew, and supplies of provisions, and that this relation and this limited liability were not changed by the fact that defendant was part owner or managing owner. Section 2071 of the Civil Code makes it "the duty of the manager of a ship, unless otherwise directed," to provide for the ship's seaworthiness, etc., as claimed by defendant; but this section does not attempt to define the full extent of the duties and liabilities of the manager, who is also part owner, and who, by section 2070, is called "the managing owner." Without attempting to define the meaning of this section of the Civil Code in respect of any difference between the powers and duties of a "manager" and a "managing owner," when they act as "general agent for the owners," it seems to us quite clear that, when either the manager or managing owner assumes to act as agent, he should disclose his agency in some unmistakable manner if he desires to escape liability as principal. The charter party was signed by defendant in its corporate capacity, describing itself in the body of the instrument as managing owner, and the evidence was that it owned nine-sixteenths of the vessel and the master two-sixteenths; but plaintiff did not know, when he signed the charter party, who were the owners. Defendant admitted in its answer that it made the contract as managing owner, but denied that it "had any other connection with said vessel than as managing owner thereof and agent for the owners." Neither in the body of the instrument nor in the signature of defendant does defendant appear or assume to act as agent; and defendant offered no evidence that it was agent or acting as agent. The custom-house certificate of registration shows other part ownership, but that alone affords no sufficient evidence that defendant did not intend to be bound as principal; for, having possession and control of the vessel, and having employed her master, the plaintiff might well assume that defendant was contracting for itself in respect of the vessel. The most that can be claimed, under section 2070, supra, for defendant as managing owner, is that the contract indicated that defendant was negotiating for third parties, as well as for itself as part owner; but defendant did not disclose the identity of these other parties, nor their interest in the ship, nor did it attempt to bind any one but itself. It was stated by Mr. Story that "when, upon the face of the instrument, the agent signs his own name only, without referring to any principal, then he will be held personally bound, although he is known to be or avowedly acts as agent." Story, Prom. Notes, § 68. And it is only where the true object and intent to bind the principal, and not the agent, can be collected upon the whole instrument, that courts of justice will adopt that construction. Id. § 69. It was said in Murphy v. Helmrich, 66 Cal. 71, 4 Pac. 959: "Where an agent does not attempt, in an instrument, to bind his principal, and in terms imposes the obligation on himself, the rule is that he incurs by such act a personal liability, even though he described himself as an agent." See, also, Hobson v. Hassett, 76 Cal. 203, 18 Pac. 320.

2. The court found that defendant "was the owner of nine-sixteenths of said vessel, and was the manager thereof; that as such owner, and as agent of the owners of the other seven-sixteenths, said defendant made said charter." Appellant claims that this finding is outside the issues in the case, and that defendant cannot be made liable in this case as part owner. Defendant was sued as liable under the contract because it signed the contract in its individual and corporate capacity. It was, perhaps, unnecessary to inquire into the ownership of the vessel. But the finding that defendant was part owner was not prejudicial to defendant, for it is liable under this contract, when regarded as part owner and acting as agent for the other owners, even though the other part owners may also be liable. Mr. Story, in his work on Agency (section 278), says: "Nothing is more common than for a contract to be made by which the agent is personally bound, and which yet is, ex consequenti, binding on the principal also, although the latter is not a direct and immediate party to the instrument. * * * The more correct and satisfactory doctrine would seem to be that where the agent is a direct party of the instrument, and the principal is not, so that the latter is not, ex directo, suable thereon, there the agent, although he describes himself as agent, is suable upon the covenants and agreements contained therein as his own personal contract." And the doctrine is extended to the master contracting within the ordinary scope of his powers and duties, and the rule "is said to have been introduced in favor of commerce, so that merchants may not be compelled to seek after the owners to sue them, but that they may have a two-fold remedy against the owners and against the master." Id. § 294. Mr. Abbott says: "If an action is to be brought against the part owner upon a contract relating to the ship, although regularly such action should be brought against all jointly, yet, if all are not sued, the defendants can only avail themselves of the objection by a plea in abatement; and if they omit to plead such a plea the plaintiff will recover his whole demand, and the defendants must afterwards call upon the others for contribution." Abb. Shipp. pt. 1, p. *116, c. 3, § 7; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 433, 434.

3. It is claimed that defendant's liability is limited by section 18 of the act of congress of June 26, 1884, to nine-sixteenths of plaintiff's damage. 1 Supp. Rev. St. 1874-91, p. 443. This section provides "that the individual liability of a ship-owner shall be limited to the proportion of any and all debts and liabilities that his individual share of the vessel bears to the whole." Respondent claims that this act does not apply, and that, if it does, defendant has not taken the required steps to limit its liability, and, furthermore, that defendant cannot have relief in this action and this forum, but must resort to a court of admiralty jurisdiction. There is nothing in the act of congress prohibiting part owners to so contract as to become liable for the entire damage, whatever it may be; and, as we think defendant made such contract in this case, the act of congress is not available to defendant to limit its liability, and need not be considered. In the Amos D. Carver Case, 35 Fed. 665, it was held that the act of 1884 "does not restrict the liability of the owners upon their own personal contracts, but only their liability 'on account of the vessel'; that is, the liability that is imposed on them by law in consequence of their ownership of the vessel, viz. for the contract or acts of the ship or her master without the owner's express intervention." Gokey v. Fort, 44 Fed. 364.

4. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to show that the piles were barked through defendant's fault or carelessness in loading or unloading. There was much evidence tending to show that the damage to the piles was the direct result of their being handled in a careless and negligent manner. Other evidence tended to show that the piles were in bad condition when delivered to the vessel, and had been previously injured. The evidence was conflicting upon the point, and we cannot, under the settled rule, pass upon its relative weight.

5. The court found that plaintiff delivered to the vessel 47,800 lineal feet of piles, which were delivered in San Francisco, and were worth when received at the vessel 14 cents per lineal foot, but were worth only 9 cents per lineal foot as delivered at San Francisco, and plaintiff was compelled to sell at that price. The damage found was this difference in value. It is claimed that, because the complaint alleged that plaintiff was obliged to dispose of the piles at 9½ cents per lineal foot, the finding by the court is in excess of the amount of damage claimed by plaintiff in his pleadings. In his verified complaint plaintiff alleged "that, owing to the careless and negligent manner in which defendant handled the said cargo, the said plaintiff was obliged to dispose of the said piles at the rate of nine and one-half cents per lineal foot"; again, that the piles were worth 14 cents per lineal foot in San Francisco if they had been delivered as received, "but that nine and one-half cents was all that plaintiff could procure for them in San Francisco, and all that they were worth in the condition in which they were delivered," etc. There is a general averment of damages, to the effect that by reason of the careless and negligent manner in which the defendant handled the piles plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $3,000. From these allegations it appears that plaintiff not only has alleged that his direct loss by reason of the injury to the piles was the difference between 14 cents per foot and 9½ cents, but, additionally, he has alleged the fact that he sold them for 9½ cents. This being so, his damages from this cause could not have exceeded 4½ cents per foot. He is allowed damages, however, at the rate of 5 cents per foot. It is said that the evidence supports this finding. However that may be, the finding is at variance with the allegation of the complaint. It is fundamental that in such an action a man may not recover in damages an amount greater than that which he pleads will compensate him for his injuries. The finding is not saved by the general ab damnum clause above referred to. That averment is not inconsistent with the idea that the direct damage was the difference between 9½ cents and 14 cents, and that other consequential damages for which defendants are responsible raised the amount to $3,000. It is quite apparent that plaintiff has been allowed for the injury to the piles a sum for damages one-tenth greater than that for which he asks in his complaint. If it were permissible, this court might order that the judgment be lessened in this amount. Under the facts, however, this may not be done, as it would involve the making by this court, in the first instance, of a finding of fact.

For the reason indicated, the judgment and order must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

BREEDLOVE v. NORWICH UNION FIRE INS. SOC. (L. A. 360.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1898.)

INSURANCE—INTEREST OF INSURED—MORTGAGES.

The purchaser of mortgaged property did not record her deed until after suit brought to foreclose the mortgage. Before expiration of time for redemption, an insurance policy was issued to her, which stated her interest in the premises as being her building, and provided that, unless her interest was not truly stated therein, it should be void, and that it was to be void if such interest was not unconditional and sole ownership. Held that, in view of Civ. Code, § 2888, which provides that a lien on property transfers no title, the policy correctly stated insured's interest, her failure to record the conveyance only affecting her title as against a purchaser at the foreclosure sale, if there should be no redemption.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Mary Breedlove against the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John G. North, for appellant. Collier & Evans, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action on an insurance policy. George L. Bush was the owner of the property on the 10th day of March, 1894, and on that day conveyed it to the plaintiff. At that time it was subject to a mortgage that had been made by him April 24, 1893, to one Cowgill. An action to foreclose this mortgage was commenced against the mortgagors October 3, 1894, and judgment therein was rendered December 22, 1894, and under this judgment the property was sold to Cowgill January 31, 1895. The plaintiff did not record her conveyance from Bush until October 13, 1894, and she was not made a party to the foreclosure suit. After the sale under the judgment, and before the time for the execution of the sheriff's deed, viz. July 13, 1895, the policy sued on was issued to the plaintiff, and the insured property was destroyed by fire July 23, 1895. There was no written application for the insurance. The policy contained the following clause: "This entire policy shall be void if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated herein. * * * This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void * * * if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership." The only statement in the policy relating to the character of the plaintiff's interest was as follows: "Mary Breedlove, $2,500 on her two-story frame, metal-roof building." The court found that the defendant issued this policy to the plaintiff "by and through its duly and legally authorized agents, Jarvis & Bush (composed of B. B. Bush and John T. Jarvis), of Riverside, Cal.," and that these agents had full knowledge, at the time the policy was issued and the premium paid, of the foreclosure proceedings and of the deed to plaintiff by Bush. It is admitted that Bush & Jarvis were the agents of defendant, and no question is made as to the loss, or of the value of the property, or of the service of due notice of the fire and making proofs of loss.

The point that the findings do not support the judgment presents the principal question involved. The finding is "that on the 13th day of July, 1895, plaintiff was the owner of the two-story frame, metal-roof building, situate, etc., * * * and was such owner at the time of its insurance and destruction by fire, as hereinafter mentioned." Appellant contends that the facts as found show that the plaintiff was not the unconditional and sole owner, because she held title from the mortgagor, whose mortgage was foreclosed, and only an equity of redemption remained to her, and therefore she violated her warranty when she represented herself to be the unconditional and sole owner. There is no dispute as to the title or estate in the property held by the plaintiff. She was the purchaser from the mortgagor and former owner of the property before the right of redemption had expired. No evidence of fraud appears, and the rights of the mortgagee are in no wise involved. As a purchaser from the mortgagor, she stood in his shoes, and with the same right to take out an insurance policy. A mortgage in this state only creates a lien upon the mortgaged property, and transfers no title to the property. Civ. Code, § 2888; McGurran v. Garrity, 68 Cal. 566, 9 Pac. 839. Bush did not cease to be the sole and unconditional owner of the property after the execution of his mortgage to Cowgill, and by his transfer to the plaintiff she became its sole and unconditional owner. Her ownership is not subject to any condition, nor did any other person own an interest in the property. While her failure to record her conveyance until after the proceedings for the foreclosure of the mortgage had been commenced would prevent her from claiming title as against the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, if there should be no redemption, it did not impair her title. She was not a party to the foreclosure proceedings, and her title to the land would not be directly affected thereby, except that, by reason of her failure to file her conveyance, she would be estopped from claiming the premises, as against the purchaser, in case a deed should be executed to him. When she became the purchaser from Bush, she had a clear right to take out a policy of insurance, and when she represented in the policy that she was the "unconditional and sole owner" it was true, notwithstanding the proceedings in foreclosure.

In this view of the matter it is unnecessary to determine whether the agents of defendant knew the facts relating to the mortgage and the foreclosure proceedings, and therefore waived any warranty of plaintiff, for there was no question of waiver necessarily involved. Her warranty was not violated. Nor is it necessary to discuss the point as to whether all the conditions of the policy were performed, for the contention that they were not is based solely upon the claim that the evidence shows her title to be conditional by reason of the mortgage. And so, also, it becomes immaterial whether the court did or did not find that she truly stated her interest in the property, as it fully appears what that interest was, and that it was the unconditional and sole ownership. The judgment and order are affirmed.

DODGE v. KIMPLE. (L. A. 492.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1898.)

APPEAL—UNDERTAKING—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY —CONTRIBUTION—PLEADING.

1. Where an undertaking on appeal refers only to an appeal from the judgment, it will not sustain an appeal from an order denying a new trial.

2. Where a complaint for contribution alleges a liability on the part of a co-surety to plaintiff for a certain sum, it is necessary to allege its nonpayment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by S. C. Dodge against P. S. Kimple for contribution. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appealed. Judgment affirmed, and appeal from order dismissed.

C. K. Holloway, for appellant. C. A. Miller, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. Respondent moved in this court to dismiss the appeal from the order denying a new trial, and counsel stipulated that the case and the motion should be submitted upon the transcript, briefs, and other papers on file. There is no undertaking on the appeal from the order. The undertaking refers only to the appeal from the judgment, and therefore will not operate to sustain the appeal from the order. Granger v. Robinson, 114 Cal. 631, 46 Pac. 604, and cases there cited. The complaint alleges that E. D. Brown contracted to erect a dwelling house for one F. T. Bicknell, and executed a bond to said Bicknell in the sum of $2,500, conditioned for the full and proper completion and performance of the contract, upon which bond the plaintiff and defendant became sureties; that Brown commenced and partly performed his contract, but abandoned it before completion, and upon notice from the architect, requiring the sureties to do so, plaintiff completed it at a cost of $1,220 over and above the balance of the contract price remaining in the hands of the owner, and brings this action to recover from the defendant one-half of said sum. The defendant demurred to the complaint for want of facts. The demurrer was overruled, and an answer filed. The cause was tried, and findings and judgment were for the defendant.

Respondent contends that the judgment must be affirmed for the reason that the complaint does not state a cause of action. The plaintiff alleges that he expended $1,220 in completing the building, and that defendant became liable to him for one-half of said sum, but nowhere alleges in any manner that he has not been paid; and hence no breach of defendant's obligation to pay is alleged. In all cases it is necessary not only to allege the contract, agreement, or other facts out of which the obligation to pay money arose, but the breach of such obligation, which is that defendant has not paid, must also be alleged. It has been so held in numerous cases upon promissory notes, from Frisch v. Caler, 21 Cal. 71, down to Ryan v. Holliday, 110 Cal. 335, 42 Pac. 891; in action upon insurance policy (Richards v. Insurance Co., 80 Cal. 506, 22 Pac. 939); upon bonds (Curtiss v. Bachman, 84 Cal. 216, 24 Pac. 379); and in other cases, not necessary to be cited, this well-established rule of pleading has been enforced.

As the complaint would not sustain any judgment in favor of the plaintiff, other questions raised by appellant need not be noticed. I advise that the appeal from the order denying a new trial be dismissed, and that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed, and the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MAYBERRY v. COOK et al. (L. A. 402.)
 (Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1898.)
 ACCOUNT STATED — EVIDENCE — INSOLVENCY — PROOF OF CLAIMS—NECESSITY—DEBTS CRE-ATED BY ONE IN FIDUCIARY CAPACITY.

1. Where consignor and consignee reside in different places, and one sends an account to the other, who makes no objection to it within a reasonable time, a stated account may be implied.

2. Under Insolvent Act 1880, § 52, providing that no debt created by one while acting in a fiduciary character shall be discharged because not filed under that act, such a debt is created where a factor fails to transmit the net proceeds of commission sales to his consignor.

3. The fact that an account has been stated does not change the character of the indebtedness, within Insolvent Act 1880, § 52, providing that no debt created by one in a fiduciary capacity shall be discharged because not filed under the act.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by E. L. Mayberry against J. E. Cook and T. E. Langley, co-partners as Cook & Langley. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Davis, Hanna & Davis, A. B. McCutchen, and W. R. Bacon, for appellants. Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The action was tried by the court without a jury. The complaint alleged that the defendants were co-partners doing business as factors and commission merchants at the city of Los Angeles; that plaintiff from time to time consigned to defendants oranges belonging to him, to be sold by defendants as factors and commission merchants, on account of the plaintiff, and that on September 7, 1893, an account was stated between plaintiff and defendants, upon which there was found to be due to the plaintiff from the defendants a balance of $1,300.18 on account of said sales of plaintiff's oranges so consigned by plaintiff to defendants, and by them sold as plaintiff's factors and commission merchants; that defendants agreed to pay said balance, but have not paid the same or any part thereof. The defendants answered separately, and specifically denied each of the allegations of the complaint, and pleaded that the action was barred by each of the sections 339 and 344 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Defendant Langley also pleaded that defendants had been adjudged insolvent debtors after plaintiff's cause of action arose, and that his claim was provable in said proceedings, and was included in the schedule of their liabilities; and defendant Cook pleaded his final discharge in said insolvency proceedings, in which discharge were excepted such debts, if any, as are by said insolvent laws excepted from the operation of a discharge in insolvency. The court found that all the allegations of the complaint are true; that his cause of action was not barred by either of said sections; that said defendants had been adjudged insolvent debtors in a proceeding commenced since plaintiff's cause of action accrued; that Cook had been duly discharged, and the proceedings therein were still pending as to Langley; that plaintiff's claim was included in the schedule of liabilities, and was provable against defendants in insolvency. As conclusions of law, the court found that the debt or liability set out in the complaint arose while defendants were acting in a fiduciary capacity, and was not affected by said proceedings in insolvency, nor barred by the discharge granted to Cook, and that plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

1. Appellants' first point is that "the account sued on is not a stated account." A copy of the account is set out in the statement, giving the items of debits and credits, the first item being May 11, 1893, and the last September 7, 1893, and showing a balance due plaintiff of $1,300.18. No express acknowledgment of the correctness of the account was made by the plaintiff, nor did he make any objection to it at any time. It is contended by appellants that "a stated account is an agreement, and an account does not become stated until that agreement is had," and that "the evidence affirmatively shows that there was no agreement whatever"; and counsel quote from Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, 15 Pac. 372, as follows: "A stated account is an agreement between the parties thereto that all the items therein are true." No one questions that proposition; but counsel seem to understand that an actual, express agreement is necessary. The above quotation was evidently taken from the syllabus. If counsel had turned to the opinion of the court, they would have seen that those words constituted but part of a sentence, the remainder of which is as follows: "But this agreement may be implied from circumstances, as where merchants reside in different places, and one sends an account to the other, who makes no objection to it within a reasonable time." That this is the well-settled rule there can be no question. See Terry v. Sickles, 13 Cal. 427; Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 566, 17 Pac. 702; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 526; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 126.

2. It is also contended that plaintiff's claim is barred by the statute of limitations. The last item in the account rendered by defendants is dated September 7, 1893, and this action was commenced September 3, 1895. The account could not have been stated earlier than September 7th, and therefore could not be barred. But, if it were treated as an open account, the evidence does not show that the last item charged against defendants became a charge before September 7th.

3. Appellants' third and last point is that "the debt sued on did not arise while defendants were acting in a fiduciary capacity," and that, therefore, the discharge in insolvency is a defense. Section 52 of the insolvent act of 1880 provides, among other things, that no debt created by a debtor while acting in a fiduciary character shall be discharged under that act, but the debt may be proved thereunder. It is not disputed that the transactions involved in said account were had and made by the defendants as factors and commission merchants for the plaintiff, but it is said that in these transactions the defendants were not acting in a fiduciary character, within the meaning of the insolvent act, as they received a commission on sales, but that, if it were otherwise, the action here is upon an account stated, which is a new agreement, based upon the balance assented to by the parties, and is not upon the original transaction; and cite Coffee v. Williams, 103 Cal. 550, 37 Pac. 506, where it is said: "When an account stated is assented to, either expressly or impliedly, it becomes a new contract, and an action upon it is not founded upon the original items, but upon the balance agreed to by the parties." In Treadwell v. Holloway, 46 Cal. 547, it was held that "one who receives goods consigned to him on commission to be sold, and the proceeds, less commission, to be transmitted to the consignor, if he sells the goods, and fails to transmit the money, creates a debt in a fiduciary capacity." This decision construed that clause of section 33 of the bankrupt act of 1867 (14 Stat. 517), which reads, "or while acting in a fiduciary capacity," and is therefore in point here. The same rule was expressed (obiter) in Herrlich v. McDonald, 80 Cal. 482, 22 Pac. 299, citing Treadwell v. Holloway, supra.

It only remains to consider whether the statement of the account changed the quality or character of the indebtedness so as to take it out of the exception declared in the insolvent act. That it changes the mode of pleading and proof is clear, but that does not prevent an inquiry into the origin and character of the indebtedness for the purpose of determining whether the liability is barred or affected by the provisions of the insolvent act. It was clearly the duty of the defendants to make out and deliver to plaintiff a just and correct account of all these fiduciary transactions, and it is clear that up to that time, at least, their character was not changed. If it was changed at any time it must have been by the implied agreement on the part of the plaintiff that all its items were correct. Defendants still held in their hands $1,300.18 of plaintiff's money which they had received from the sale of plaintiff's property, and how their admission that they had that amount of plaintiff's money in their hands, the account itself showing that it was the proceeds of the sale of plaintiff's property, could strip the transaction of its fiduciary character is beyond my comprehension. If defendants had made a mistake, or a willful error, in the account, so that the plaintiff could not accept it, and had brought his action for an accounting, or upon the open account, the fiduciary character of the transactions involved, it is conceded, would have remained; but, according to appellants' theory, that characteristic was eliminated by the simple process of rendering a true account, since, as they say, "when an action is brought on an original account, a plea of an account stated will bar a recovery thereon,"—citing Driggs v. Garretson, 25 N. J. Eq. 178. Counsel also cites McClelland v. West, 70 Pa. St. 183, to the proposition that "the balance due on an account stated becomes the principal debt. It cannot be re-examined or reopened, except for fraud or mistake, as set forth above, either to ascertain the items themselves or to inquire into their character." There was in that case, however, no question made as to the character of the transactions between the parties, or of any of the items in the account, so that remark can have no weight as authority upon the question before us. A direct authority against appellants' contention is Dunbar v. Johnson, 108 Mass. 519, cited by respondent. That action was upon an account stated. Upon the trial the court, against plaintiff's objection, admitted evidence to show upon what transaction the account arose, and found that the plaintiff sold intoxicating liquors to the defendant in violation of law, and that the account stated was upon such sales, and was the balance due therefor. The plaintiff contended that said illegality did not affect the action upon an account stated, which stood upon a new consideration, to wit, the accounting together. The defendant had judgment, and upon appeal it was affirmed, Gray, J., writing the opinion, and citing several English cases. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BELCHER, C.

ANGUS et al. v. PLUM et al. (S. F. 1,135.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1898.)

COURTS—DECISION—STARE DECISIS.

A decision construing a clause of the constitution will not be overruled in an action between parties who have acted on the same.

Temple, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by one Angus and others against one Plum and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Aylett R. Cotton, W. C. Burnett, and L. G. Burnett, for appellants. Pierson & Mitchell and Garrett W. McEnerney, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The judgment in this case must be affirmed on the authority of San Gabriel Valley Land & Water Co. v. Witmer Bros. Co., 96 Cal. 623, 29 Pac. 500, and 31 Pac. 588. The clause of the constitution upon which the rights of the parties depend was construed in that case, and the court was very evenly divided. We are now asked to overrule the decision then made, but, whether that decision was right or wrong, it has been since acted upon, and was acted upon by the parties to this controversy, and we consider that it is protected by the rule of stare decisis. Judgment affirmed.

In re MORE'S ESTATE. (S. F. 1,020.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1898.)

ANIMALS—LEASE—EXECUTORS—ACCOUNTING—EXPENSES—EVIDENCE—EXPERTS—HEARSAY—RELEVANCY—TRIAL—WITHDRAWAL OF EVIDENCE.

1. Under a lease giving lessee the increase of a flock of animals, requiring the flock, however, to be grown to a certain number, which lessee was to turn over to lessor at the end of the term, a delivery of the specified number was required, and not merely a delivery of such number as he was able to raise by the exercise of reasonable care and prudent husbandry.

2. The question whether an administrator is entitled to employ a bookkeeper depends on the circumstances of the estate, and should be left to the discretion of the court.

3. On an issue of the correctness of a count made with a machine, it was not error to permit a duplicate of the machine used, which had been received in evidence, to be withdrawn, where the offer was to prove the original unreliable, and no request was made for a test of the duplicate, and where the correctness of the count was proved by other testimony.

4. One who had been in the sheep business for 26 years, and was familiar with sheep husbandry, was competent to testify as to the probable average annual increase in a certain flock of sheep.

5. On an issue whether an administrator was entitled to credit for the expenses of a bookkeeper employed by him, testimony that the bookkeeper employed had filed an exorbitant claim against the estate, and on its disallowance had commenced suit thereon, is irrelevant.

6. Where witness sent another person on an errand, statements by such person to witness as to the result of such errand are hearsay and inadmissible.

7. An executor was chargeable in his annual account with property which he, as lessee under a lease with intestate, had agreed to deliver to him at a certain time, where he failed to make such delivery to himself as administrator.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceedings for the settlement of the annual account of John F. More, an administrator of the estate of Alexander P. More, deceased. From a decree sustaining exceptions filed by certain heirs, said More, as administrator and individually as an heir at law, appeals. Reversed in part.

Rodgers & Paterson, for appellant. John B. Mhoon, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal by John F. More, as administrator of the estate of Alexander P. More, deceased, and individually as an heir at law of said deceased, from a decree settling the second annual account of said John F. More, as administrator of said estate. Alexander P. More died October 21, 1893, and John F. More was appointed administrator of his estate, February 12, 1894. The second annual account of the administrator was filed March 5, 1896, and accompanying it was a lengthy report as to the property of the estate and what had been done with portions thereof. To the account so filed certain heirs of the decedent filed exceptions in writing and contested numerous items thereof. When the matter came on for hearing it was stipulated by all parties in interest that all testimony introduced by any one contestant should be considered as introduced on behalf of all the contestants, and that all testimony introduced by the administrator should also be considered as introduced on behalf of John F. More individually. After the hearing the court filed its "Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law," and made an order thereon, in which some of the objections made by the contestants were sustained, some overruled, and others reserved for future considerations, with directions that the items reserved be included in the next account.

The bill of exceptions contains numerous specifications of the particulars in which it is claimed the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings of fact, and also numerous exceptions to the conclusions of law drawn from the facts; but, as only a few points are discussed by the learned counsel for appellant, we shall not consider those not noticed in their brief.

1. It appears from the record that on October 1, 1891, the decedent leased to John F.

More the property known as "Santa Rosa Island," "together with the cattle, horses, flocks, and herds of live stock of all kinds on said island," for the term of three years, to wit, from October 1, 1891, to October 1, 1894, for the annual rent of $10,000, payable on the 1st day of June of each year. The lease provided that the lessee "shall and will, at his own proper costs and charges, bear, pay, and discharge all such taxes, duties, and assessments whatsoever as shall or may, during the said term, be charged, levied, or imposed upon the said premises or property," and also that the said lessee shall have "all the increase of the stock, flocks, and herds on said island, and the proceeds thereof, during the term of this lease, upon the express understanding and condition, however, and it is hereby expressly agreed by the parties hereto, that the cattle on said island shall be increased and kept up to fifteen hundred (1,500) head, and that flock of sheep shall be grown up to forty thousand (40,000) head of sheep, and that the said lessees shall, at the end of said term, turn over and deliver to said lessor, or his assigns, that number, to wit, forty thousand head of sheep in good quality and condition, and that the said lessor shall have the fall clip of wool of the year 1894." As the lessor was dead, and the lessee was the administrator of his estate, when the lease expired, it became the duty of the lessee to turn over to himself, as administrator, the said cattle and sheep. In the report accompanying his account the administrator states that he has on hand on the island 1,500 head of cattle, of the appraised value of $18,000, and 40,000 head of sheep, of the appraised value of $60,000, and "the increase of the flocks and herds of said estate on said island." The court found that under the said lease John F. More "covenanted and agreed on his part to deliver to said A. P. More, his administrators or assigns, on the 1st of October, 1894, forty thousand head of sheep, on Santa Rosa Island; that said John F. More, as said lessee, did not and has not at any time delivered to himself, as said administrator, or to any one for said estate, a greater number of sheep than twenty-five thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and there was on the 1st of October, 1894, due from said John F. More to said estate, and there is still due from said John F. More to said estate, fourteen thousand two hundred and eleven (14,211) head of sheep; that said sheep on said 1st day of October, 1894, were of the value of $1.50 per head." The court further found "that during the months of October, November, and December, 1895, said administrator, John F. More, sold to the Western Meat Company, in San Francisco, four hundred and eighty head of cattle, for the sum of $14,270.94; that four hundred and thirty-two head of said cattle were the property of, and belonged to, the estate of A. P. More, deceased, and forty-eight head of said cattle were the individual property of the said John F. More; that the expense of marketing said cattle cannot be determined from the evidence now before the court; that of said $14,270.94, the gross proceeds of said sale, the estate of A. P. More was entitled to the sum of $12,843.85, and John F. More was entitled individually to the sum of $1,427.09." And, as conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the court found "that the administrator should charge himself with the sum of $21,316.50, the appraised value of fourteen thousand two hundred and eleven sheep, and interest thereon from the 1st day of October, 1894, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum." "Also that he should charge himself with the sum of $12,843.85, being the gross proceeds of the sale of four hundred and thirty-two head of cattle made as aforesaid by him in October, November, and December, 1895, and interest on the same from the 17th day of December, 1895, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and that said administrator be allowed the expense of marketing said cattle in his next account."

These findings are assailed by the appellant as not justified by the evidence. As to the sheep it is claimed (1) that the lease, when properly construed, in effect provided only that the lessee should increase the flock of sheep to the number of 40,000 head, if he could do so by the exercise of reasonable care and proper husbandry, and in that event he should turn over that number at the expiration of the lease, but if, by the exercise of such care and husbandry, he should be unable to increase the flock to 40,000 head, then he should turn over only such number as he might have, and that the burden was upon respondents to show that he had not exercised such care and husbandry, which they wholly failed to do, and hence that appellant was properly chargeable only with such number of sheep as he had at the time the lease expired and actually turned over; (2) that he did, in fact, turn over to himself, as administrator, the full number of 40,000 head; and (3) that the value of the sheep was only 50 cents per head, and not $1.50, as found by the court. And as to the cattle it is claimed that appellant had on the island 1,500 head which belonged to the estate, and that the 480 head which he sold were increase which belonged to him, and which he had a right to sell on his own account.

As we read the lease, it is not subject to the construction claimed for it. On the contrary, it provides, in plain and unambiguous language, that the lessee shall, at the end of the term, turn over and deliver to the lessor, or his assigns, 40,000 head of sheep, in good quality and condition. And that this expressed the meaning and intention of the parties to the instrument is shown by the evidence given by appellant himself. He testified that the lease gave him the surplus of the sheep over 40,000 head, and that in September, 1894, he sold and shipped from the island 4,957 head of them, the last shipment of 1,040 head being made on the 30th day of that month, the last day of his lease. He further said: "It is my understanding that under the lease I was to account for 40,000 head of sheep at the expiration of the lease. I have always held myself out as accountable for that number as of that date."

The question, then, is, did appellant, as lessee, turn over and deliver to himself, as administrator, 40,000 head of sheep on the 1st day of October, 1894? The testimony in the case is quite voluminous, covering, in a partly-condensed form, a little more than 200 pages of the printed transcript. We have carefully read all testimony found in the record, and, while there is some conflict, we are of the opinion that it is quite sufficient to show that no greater number than that found by the court was ever turned over or delivered by appellant to himself, as administrator, or to any one for said estate. The sheep were appraised as of the value of $1.50 per head, and the court found that to be their value on October 1, 1894. There was evidence that they were of the value of $2 per head, and we find nothing in the record tending to support the claim that their actual value was only 50 cents per head, or that it was less than that found by the court. As to the cattle, there is no dispute that at the time the lease expired the estate owned and was entitled to the proceeds of 1,500 head of cattle that were then being herded and fed on the island. Nor is there any dispute that during the last three months of 1895 appellant sold and shipped away 480 head of the cattle on the island. But the claim is that on October 1, 1894, there were on the island at least 1,980 head of cattle, and that the estate was therefore not deprived of any of its property by the sale subsequently made. The court found, in effect, that there were only 1,548 head of cattle on the island on October 1, 1894, and that of the animals sold 432 head were the property of the estate, and must be accounted for by appellant. The question is, was this finding justified by the evidence? We think it clearly was. It is true that there was some apparent conflict, but, when fairly considered, a clear preponderance of the evidence tended strongly to show that the whole number on the island was not greater than the number found by the court. It follows, therefore, that the findings as to both the sheep and cattle cannot be disturbed for want of evidence to justify and support them.

2. The court found "that the said administrator, during the whole period since his qualification as such administrator, has grazed and used for his own personal benefit and gain the island of Mescalitan, or Little Island, and the tide lands adjacent thereto, being part and parcel of the property belonging to said estate held by him as said administrator; that the reasonable value of such use, and the rents, issues, and profits of said island, during the period so used by him, is the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, and there is due from said John F. More to said estate, for the use of said island, said sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars;" and, as a conclusion of law, "that he should further charge himself with the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, being the rent for the island of Mescalitan during the period of his administration to date." This finding is complained of as not justified by the evidence, "in that the evidence shows that the rental value of said Mescalitan during said period was less than seven hundred and fifty dollars, and not to exceed one hundred and fifty dollars." There were about 60 acres in the island of Mescalitan, and about 300 acres of tide lands surrounding it which were valuable for pasturage. And it was proved, without contradiction, that the rental value of the island proper per annum, during all the times named, was at least $4 per acre, and that in 1894 the use of the tide lands surrounding the island was very valuable, worth perhaps $300 or $400 and in any year worth $50. Obviously this evidence was quite sufficient to justify the finding.

3. The account presented for settlement contained three items for sums of money, aggregating $3,000, claimed to have been paid by the administrator to P. W. Watson, as monthly wages, at the rate of $125 per month, for his services as bookkeeper for the estate. The court rejected each of the items, and held that Watson had rendered no services for which the estate was liable, and that "the administrator should not be allowed anything on account thereof." It is claimed for appellant that this decision was not justified by the evidence; that, on the contrary, it appears from the evidence that the estate was one of great value, and many important transactions required the services of an expert accountant and bookkeeper; and hence "that the court erred in not allowing a reasonable amount to the administrator for the services of Mr. Watson." It is true it cannot be said that in no case should an administrator be allowed to employ a bookkeeper. But whether an administrator should be allowed for payments made for the services of a bookkeeper depends upon the circumstances of the estate, and is a matter properly left to the discretion of the probate judge. "If the services were such as, under the circumstances, the administrator ought to have performed, and for which his commissions are intended to compensate him, such charge should be disallowed." In re Moore's Estate, 72 Cal. 335, 13 Pac. 880.

4. Appellant calls attention to four rulings of the court, and claims that each one of them was erroneous. They were as follows:

First, Mr. C. E. Sherman was appointed by the court to count and report the number of sheep on the island. He undertook the work, and in making the count used a registering machine to check off the numbers. He testified that the machine worked correctly, and that he had used it for three or four years, and never found any mistake in it; that he had not then the machine which he used in counting the sheep,—having made a present of it to a gentleman at Bakersfield,—but had one just like it, which he exhibited, and pointed out the way it worked. Counsel for appellant then stated, "We would like this machine," and that they expected to show, and were advised they could show, "that these machines are entirely unreliable. The Court: This is not the machine that he used. Mr. Mhoon: We will strike out the subject of the machine. * * * I will withdraw it. The Court: It is withdrawn. Whatever way you made it, you made a count, and the count was correct? Witness: Yes, sir; I made a correct one. Mr. Whitworth: We note an exception to the withdrawing of that testimony at this stage of the case."

Second. The same witness, Sherman, was asked: "What is the average percentage of the increase of lambs of a flock of forty thousand, in the spring, for instance?" The question was objected to upon the ground that the witness was not shown to be an expert on the question, and the objection was overruled. The witness had testified that he had been dealing with sheep about 26 years, and that he was familiar with the sheep husbandry.

Third. It appeared that during the time Watson was employed by appellant as bookkeeper for the estate, and was receiving $125 per month for his services, he made out a claim against the estate for $30,000 for services claimed to have been rendered by him to decedent in his lifetime. One of the items of this claim was as follows: "July 5 to Sept. 8, 1893. Advising him not to purchase two millions pounds of wool, in which matter he was very anxious to speculate, and hold the same for a rise in the market, in which there would have been a heavy loss; also not to purchase five thousand tons of wheat, in which he was also anxious to speculate,—eighteen thousand dollars." It was admitted that the said claim was presented for allowance, and rejected, and that suit upon it was thereafter brought by Watson, and was then pending in court and being defended by the administrator. Appellant was examined as a witness quite fully as to the relations that existed between Watson and A. P. More in his lifetime, and also in regard to the services of Watson as bookkeeper for the estate; and in connection therewith the said claim for $30,000 was offered in evidence by the contestants, and, over the objection of appellant that it was entirely immaterial and irrelevant, it was admitted.

Fourth. While Mr. Sherman was making the count of the sheep, in the fall of 1894, he left the island, and was taken over in a schooner to Santa Barbara, with the understanding that he was to be sent for and brought back in a few days. Appellant testified that the schooner was sent over to the mainland about a week after Sherman left. "I told the captain to see Mr. Sherman, and see if he wanted to come over. Some remark of that kind I said to Captain Thompson. Q. Did the captain bring back any word from him at that time? A. Yes; he did. The captain said he reported at Mr. Sherman's shop or business, I disremember which, in Santa Barbara. They told him there he was out of town at Lompoc,—that was the word he brought back,—and would be gone several days." On motion of counsel for contestants this answer was stricken out, upon the ground that it was simply hearsay.

We see no prejudicial error in the ruling complained of as to the registering machine. Counsel say: "The court erred in allowing the contestants to withdraw the register used by the witness Sherman in making the count, and in refusing to compel him to produce it. * * * The administrator desired to inspect the machine that the witness had used in making the count, and to exhibit it to others, for the purpose of showing that it was entirely unreliable." But the witness did not have the registering machine that he used in making the count, and could not produce it, as was clearly shown. And no point seems to be made on the refusal of the court to require the duplicate machine which the witness then had to be handed over for inspection. Besides, there was evidence, aside from that given by Sherman, sufficient to justify a finding that the whole number was not greater than the number found by the court. And, if the count was in fact correct, then the case should not be reversed because the duplicate machine which was there was allowed to be withdrawn and not handed over for inspection, even if it ought to have been.

The question whether Sherman was an expert, and as such competent to testify as to what would probably be the average increase of lambs in a flock of 40,000 sheep in the spring of the year, was for the court to decide, in view of the evidence; and the uncontradicted evidence that he had been in the sheep business for 26 years, and was familiar with sheep husbandry, would seem sufficient to justify the court in deciding the question as it did.

The time during which appellant claimed to have paid Watson for his services as bookkeeper for the estate covered the whole period between his appointment as administrator and the making out of his second annual account, and the $30,000 claim of Watson against the estate was evidently offered in evidence for the purpose of showing that one who would make out and present such a claim could not have been honestly and properly employed by appellant in the interest of the estate. But, conceding that the claim was obnoxious to all the objections urged against it by respondents, still we fail to see how it was relevant to the question whether all the services rendered by Watson as bookkeeper were such as under the circumstances the administrator ought to have performed, and for which his commissions were intended to compensate him. We think, therefore, that the court erred in admitting the said claim in evidence. The answer of appellant as to the report brought back by the captain was not responsive to the question propounded to him, and was clearly hearsay, and on that ground properly stricken out.

5. Finally it is said: "Whatever may be the evidence as to the number of sheep at the time of the expiration of the lease, the court erred in charging the administrator with the value of the deficiency in number. If, upon a final accounting, it should be found that the administrator is unable to turn over to these entitled to the same the number of sheep which ought to be turned over, it will be time enough then to charge him with the value thereof. The court cannot during the course of the administration, and before the time when he should turn over the specific property to those entitled to the same, charge the administrator with the value of any property supposed to have been lost or destroyed through the fault of the administrator." No authority is cited in support of this proposition, and we know of no rule of law or public policy which can be said to sustain it. Appellant was obligated, as lessee of the island, to turn over to himself, as administrator, on the 1st day of October, 1894, 40,000 head of sheep. This, it appears, he failed to do, but about a year and a half later falsely reported to the court that, as administrator, he had that number of sheep on hand and the increase thereof. From the date of the expiration of the lease the estate was entitled to the full number of sheep named, and all the increase thereof, and all the wool clipped from the whole band; and if it be true that appellant cannot be charged with the value of the deficiency in the number turned over until all litigation in regard to the estate has been ended, and he has presented his final account for settlement and is ready to turn over all the property to the heirs, then it is apparent that the matter may possibly be delayed for many years, and until important witnesses in the case are dead, and that the heirs might thereby be deprived of valuable property to which they were entitled. We conclude, therefore, that the court was authorized to hear and determine the matter, as it did, on the settlement of the second annual account.

We advise that the judgment or order appealed from be reversed, in so far as it relates to the three items embraced in the account for moneys claimed to have been paid to Watson for his services as bookkeeper, and that the administrator be permitted to include the said items in his next annual account for further consideration by the court below, and that in all other respects the said judgment or order be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment or order appealed from is reversed, in so far as it relates to the three items embraced in the account for moneys claimed to have been paid to Watson for his services as bookkeeper, and that the administrator be permitted to include the said items in his next annual account for further consideration by the court below, and that in all other respects the said judgment or order is affirmed.

PEERLESS GLASS CO. v. PACIFIC
CROCKERY & TINWARE
CO. (L. A. 422.)

SALES — CONTRACT — MEETING OF MINDS — CONDITIONS.

1. A seller, in giving terms, stated that the "freight allowance" was 74 cents, believing he was answering an inquiry simply as to the freight rate. The buyer understood the term to mean an allowance of 74 cents per hundred pounds from the invoice price, such allowance being known as a discount among merchants. The goods were sold by the gross, and there was no evidence as to how the discount was to be computed. Held, that the buyer was not entitled to any deduction, there having been no contract, because of the failure of the minds of the parties to meet.

2. An agreement to sell goods at a future time, if the seller should then have them on hand for sale, is conditional, and the buyer cannot recover for its breach without showing that the seller had them to sell.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by the Peerless Glass Company against the Pacific Crockery & Tinware Company to recover for goods sold and delivered. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McKinley & Graff, for appellant. Welles Whitmore, E. M. Gibson, and F. M. Porter, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Both parties to this case are corporations. Plaintiff alleges a sale of merchandise to defendant of the agreed value of $4,862.62, and admits a payment of $1,972.81, leaving a balance of $2,889.81, for which the suit was brought. Defendant denies that it purchased goods of the value charged in the complaint, but avers that it purchased, or contracted to purchase, from plaintiff, 1,500 gross of Mason jars, and 76 gross of extra caps, of the total value of $7,640.12, and that as part of the contract of sale plaintiff agreed to a rebate of 74 cents per hundred pounds, as an allowance upon the freight charges to be paid thereon. Defendant admits that plaintiff delivered 946 gross of jars and 76 gross of caps, worth $4,862.62, and alleges that upon these goods defendant paid $1,525.14 freight, which plaintiff agreed to pay; also that 167 gross of jars delivered were defective, and were worth $1 per gross less than the agreed price; also that plaintiff failed to deliver 554 gross of jars, which failure obliged defendant to purchase in the market 164 gross at an increased price, to its damage in the sum of $600.49. Defendant demands judgment against plaintiff in the sum of $1,425.57.

The parties agree as to the issues submitted to the trial court. They were: (1) Was defendant entitled to a rebate as freight allowance, and, if so, how much? (2) Is defendant entitled to damages for the failure of plaintiff to deliver all the goods it had contracted to deliver, and, if so, the amount of the damage? And (3) was defendant entitled to recover damage for 167 defective jars?

There is no controversy as to the invoice price, nor as to the quantity of goods delivered. The main controversy relates to the rebate and to the number of jars plaintiff was bound to deliver. The negotiations were by letter, as follows: December 26, 1894, plaintiff, a manufacturer of glassware at Converse, Ind., addressed a letter to defendant, a dealer in crockery and tinware, at Los Angeles, soliciting orders for Mason fruit jars. January 11, 1895, defendant replied, asking a description of ware and terms, closing its letter thus: "State terms, freight allowance, etc., and oblige." On the 18th plaintiff replied, describing goods and packages, and then as follows: "Freight allowance to Los Angeles from Converse is seventy-four cents. We would be pleased to sell you five to ten car loads as follows: Pints, complete, $4.00; quarts, $4.25; half gallons, $6.00,—f. o. b. factory, Converse. Packed in regular packing, regular terms; if packed one dozen in a box, twenty-five cents per gross extra. Extra caps, $1.75. Or we would sell bodies only, pints, $2.25; quarts, $2.50; half gallons, $4.25,—in regular packing; special packing, twenty-five cents per gross extra. This for early acceptance and shipment not later than June 1st. Our terms are sixty days from date of shipment, or two per cent. off for cash in ten days. We hope these prices and terms will be sufficiently attractive to secure your order. We would be very much pleased to make consignment of jars to your place. Very truly," etc.

On the 28th of that month defendant sent its order for jars and caps, with some directions as to shipment, and the following inquiry: "Please state, also, by return of mail, if you will give us the refusal of an additional five car loads at present prices and terms, provided we place our definite order for the same before May 1, 1895. We are not in position at this writing to safely judge as to our fuller wants for the coming season, which ordinarily run from twelve to twenty car loads, but will be able to do so intelligently by May first, and probably sooner. Respectfully," etc.

February 5th plaintiff replied, accepting order, and to the special inquiry as follows: "We have, so far, declined to give any option or refusal as to future sale, as we look for better prices. We have decided in your case to sell you another five hundred gross upon same terms and prices if notified on or before May first, conditional if we have the ware to sell at that time. Yours, very truly, The Peerless Glass Co. J. A. Gauntt, President."

February 28th the first car load was shipped to defendant, with the following invoice:

"Converse, Ind., Feb. 18, 1895. Pacific Crockery & Tinware Co., Los Angeles, Cal., Bought of the Peerless Stamping and Glass Co., Incorporated. Fruit Jars and All Kinds of Glass Vessels. Plant, Converse, Ind.; office, Marion, Ind. Terms: Sixty days; two per cent. off, ten days. Terms: Cash.

"F. o. b. Converse, Indiana."

Other shipments were made as follows: March 5th, March 20th, April 29th, and May 2d. With each an invoice was sent similar to that above set out. All were f. o. b. Converse, which means delivered on the cars at Converse without expense to the buyer. In none was there any mention of freight allowance, or any discount, except the statement, "two per cent. off ten days," which was part of the heading of each invoice. Heimann testified that he conducted the correspondence for the defendant; that the invoices were all received by defendant about 10 days after their date; that the defendant rendered no statement to plaintiff, and did not mention or refer to the subject of freight allowance, until its letter of May 29, 1895. Defendant never paid the amount of any bill, but made remittances on account, without explanation.

May 9, 1895, plaintiff drew upon defendant for the full balance due on goods, according to invoice price, making no rebate. Helmann testified that the order was presented, "but the company did not pay the same, but allowed the draft to go to protest. The Pacific Crockery Company never wrote to the Peerless Glass Company in regard to said protested draft, and in no way ever mentioned it to plaintiff, or made any explanation why it was not paid, or why it was allowed to go to protest." This draft must have made it clear to defendant—if before it had been doubtful—that plaintiff did not understand that there was any discount on the goods. Still it continued to insist upon the shipment of more goods. Plaintiff had notified defendant that it could not furnish the additional 500 gross, claiming that its acceptance was conditional upon its having the goods, and it did not have them. Even after this positive knowledge that plaintiff did not expect to make a discount, defendant strenuously insisted upon its right to the "option," as it terms this part of the contract, and finally, on the 27th of May, sent the following dispatch to plaintiff: "Los Angeles, May 27, 1895. To the Peerless Glass Co., Converse, Indiana: To end controversy about option, will you ship quick one more car as specified, April 22d, at former terms, and fifty-four gross due on original contract, the latter in cases?" The next day defendant received a telegram accepting the offer, and then on the following day wrote a letter to plaintiff, for the first time explaining its construction of the contract. The letter of the 29th clearly shows that defendant supposed all the goods would be shipped before the letter would arrive, but apparently they were not, and plaintiff then refused to ship more until those already sent were paid for. Hence the proposed compromise fell through, and plaintiff failed to deliver 54 gross of the jars included in the first order.

Defendant proved by many witnesses that the term "freight allowance" was a term well understood by merchants who buy goods in the East, and when goods are delivered f. o. b. the purchaser pays the freight, and deducts the amount of the allowance from the invoice price. The allowance has nothing to do with the freight actually paid. It may be greater or less. In other words, it is a discount sometimes made by merchants to induce dealers at a distance to trade with them. Plaintiff claims to have understood that defendant was inquiring for the freight rates from Converse. If so, the inquiry naturally is, why its agents did not give the freight rates, instead of using the phrase "freight allowance,"—a phrase never used to convey such meaning. If this were all, the case would be easily resolved against plaintiff, so far as concerns goods delivered before the order and letter of May 9th are concerned. At that time defendant well knew how plaintiff understood the contract, and further receipts of merchandise would be without freight allowance. From that time the managers of the defendant were not acting in good faith, but were lying in wait for plaintiff, intending to spring the point they thought they had when they got all the goods they could. And such was the course they pursued.

But what is the natural meaning of the sentence, "The freight allowance to Los Angeles from Converse is seventy-four cents." The form of the expression is inapt as applied to a rebate, and quite appropriate as applied to a charge for freight. It is true, on the other hand, that the word "allowance" by itself does suggest an idea the opposite of a charge. But if an allowance or a rebate was meant, what is the amount of the rebate? Defendant's managers say the allowance is 74 cents per hundred pounds. The only reason for this conclusion that I can see is that it is very near the freight rate. Plaintiff contends that this fact shows that freight rate is what was meant, especially as in the same letter defendant was told upon what terms it could have a discount. Taken literally, it means a rebate of 74 cents upon the whole purchase; as merchants would probably understand the phrase, it would mean 74 per cent. upon the invoice. Neither interpretation is admissible, for each is unreasonable. But we are not at liberty to interpolate in the letter the words "per cental" or their equivalents. That is certainly an unusual mode of determining a discount. It may as well have meant per car load, per shipment, or per gross. The contract of purchase was not by weight, but per gross. If the phrase had no ascertainable meaning, and it was in fact differently understood by the parties, it must be a case in which there was no agreement, which in this case means that no rebate was allowed. If there was no meeting of the minds of the parties, since defendant has received and sold the goods it would be liable on quantum valebat, which the evidence shows would be the contract price. Defendant was allowed the damage for inferior goods. The sale of the additional 500 gross was conditional, and the defendant did not show that the condition upon which plaintiff agreed to deliver them existed. The contrary was shown without conflict. The fact that the terms of the sale were never really agreed upon would be a sufficient answer to this claim on the part of the defendant. The judgment and order are affirmed.

WILSON v. CALIFORNIA BANK.

MORTGAGES — PRIORITY OVER STREET ASSESSMENTS — FORECLOSURE — LIS PENDENS.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that no person having an unrecorded lien on mortgaged property need be made a party to proceedings to foreclose the mortgage, and that the judgment rendered therein is conclusive against him, refers only to those holding from the mortgagor, and not to a purchaser at a sale under a street assessment.

2. The title acquired under the sale following a judgment based on a street assessment is not subject to a mortgage on the property, and cannot be litigated in an action to foreclose it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by Henry P. Wilson against the California Bank. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jones & Weller, for appellant. Finlayson & Finlayson, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to quiet title to a certain lot of land. Judgment went in the court below for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff claims title to the lot through a sale made pursuant to a judgment enforcing a lien for an assessment for street improvements upon the lot. On November 22, 1887, one Burlingame was the owner of the lot in question, and on that day executed a deed conveying the lot to the present defendant, the California Bank, which deed was on said day duly recorded. Afterwards, and while the record title thus stood in the defendant, there was an assessment duly made upon the lot for street improvements, and one Brearly brought suit to foreclose the same, making the defendant the California Bank a party defendant thereto. Such proceedings were had that a judgment enforcing the lien was entered, and the lot was sold by the sheriff to said Brearly to satisfy the assessment. A certificate of sale was issued to him, which, on November 3, 1890, was duly recorded; and thereafter, on February 14, 1891, he assigned the certificate to one M. C. Marsh. This assignment Marsh did not cause to be recorded. No redemption having been made, and the time for redemption having expired on May 1, 1891, the sheriff, on February 20, 1892, executed a deed conveying the lot to the said Marsh, which was recorded March 26, 1892, at 2:47 p. m. Marsh afterwards conveyed the property to the plaintiff. No objection is made by appellant to the regularity and validity of the assessment, or to the judgment and sale made under it; and plaintiff has full title to the lot under said proceedings, unless the title was cut off by the matters hereinafter mentioned. The deed of conveyance hereinbefore mentioned by Burlingame to the defendant, the California Bank, while apparently conveying the legal title, was in fact intended as a mortgage; and on May 8, 1891, after the expiration of the time for redemption under the sale on the assessment judgment, the defendant brought suit to foreclose the said intended mortgage. Said Brearly was made a party defendant, and filed an answer disclaiming all interest. Marsh was not made a party defendant. The suit proceeded to a decree of foreclosure, which was entered on January 22, 1892. On March 26, 1892, at 12 o'clock m., the lot was sold by the sheriff, under said decree, to the defendant; and on September 29, 1892, a sheriff's deed issued to the defendant therefor. The defendant claims title under the last-mentioned deed; and the contention of defendant is that the title of the plaintiff acquired under the said assessment judgment was cut off and defeated by the decree in the foreclosure of the mortgage, upon the ground that, as Marsh's assignment of the certificate of sale had not been recorded at the time the mortgage foreclosure suit was commenced, therefore all his interest was foreclosed under the provisions of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides that "no person holding a conveyance from or under the mortgagor of the property mortgaged, or having a lien thereon, which conveyance or lien does not appear of record in the proper office at the time of the commencement of the action, need be made a party to such action, and the judgment therein rendered and the proceedings therein had are as conclusive against the party holding such unrecorded conveyance or lien as if he had been made a party to the action." The section refers, however, only to those holding from or under the mortgagor, and a purchaser at a sale for street assessment or tax is not within that class. At the time of the commencement of the action to enforce the assessment the California Bank held the apparent record title, and was properly made defendant under the street law (Stat. 1885, p. 159); and if plaintiff could be considered as holding under either Burlingame or the bank it would be more proper to say that he holds under the latter than the former. But he does not hold under either. The title acquired under the sale following the assessment judgment was not subject to the asserted mortgage, but was superior and hostile thereto, and could not have been litigated in the action to foreclose the mortgage. Odell v. Wilson, 63 Cal. 159, and cases there cited. And the rights of the parties are not affected by the fact that at the commencement of the action to foreclose the mortgage the bank filed a lis pendens. The lis pendens merely gave notice to certain persons that the action was pending; but the plaintiff herein was not a proper party to that action, and his title could not have been litigated or foreclosed thereby. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Section 79½ provides that the provisions as to solemnization of marriage do not apply to members of religious denominations having any peculiar mode of entering into the marriage relation, and that as to them a written declaration of marriage should be filed. Held, that where the solemnization was performed by the master of a vessel on the high seas, and there was no such marriage as is contemplated by section 79½, the marriage was invalid.

Action by Homer Norman against Janette Thomson Norman. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walter Haas and A. M. Stephens, for appellant. Davis & Rush, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to have a certain marriage between plaintiff and defendant declared valid and binding upon the parties. A second amended complaint alleged: That on August 2, 1897, defendant was a minor of the age of 15 years and 10 months, and that her father, one A. C. Thomson, was her natural and only guardian. Plaintiff was of the age of 21 years and 10 months, and both plaintiff and defendant were citizens and residents of Los Angeles county, Cal. On said day plaintiff and defendant, at Long Beach, on the coast of California, boarded a certain fishing and pleasure schooner, of 17 tons burden, called the "J. Willey," duly licensed under the laws of the United States, of which W. L. Pierson was captain, and was enrolled as master thereof, and had full charge of said vessel. Said vessel proceeded to a point on the high seas about nine miles from the nearest point from the boundary of the state and of the United States. The parties then and there agreed, in the presence of said Pierson, to become husband and wife, and the said Pierson performed the ceremony of marriage; and, among other things, they promised in his presence to take each other for husband and wife, and he pronounced them husband and wife. Neither party had the consent of the father or mother or guardian of defendant to said marriage. On the same day, and immediately after said ceremony, the parties returned to the county of Los Angeles, and have ever since resided there, and they then and there immediately began to live and cohabit together as such husband and wife, and continued so to do until the 10th day of August, 1897. Said marriage has never been dissolved. Defendant denies the validity of

NORMAN v. NORMAN. (L. A. 469.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 9, 1898.)

MARRIAGE—VALIDITY—EVASION OF STATE LAWS—SOLEMNIZATION—CONFLICT OF LAWS.

1. Rev. St. U. S. § 722, providing that the United States courts, in the vindication of the civil rights of all persons in the United States, where the laws of the United States do not apply or are deficient, shall be guided by the common law, as modified in the state wherein the court is held, and section 4290, providing that the master of a vessel shall enter in his log book every marriage taking place on board, do not declare the common law, as to marriage, to be in force on the high seas on board American vessels.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 63, providing that marriages without the state, valid under the laws of the place where contracted, are valid within the state, the fact that parties to a marriage go on the high seas to be married solely to evade the laws of the state wherein they are domiciled does not invalidate the marriage, if otherwise valid.

3. Where parties go on the high seas, where no law exists, to be married, so as to evade the said marriage, and refuses to join in a declaration thereof. Defendant, by her guardian ad litem, admits the allegations of the complaint, and alleges that, in having the ceremony performed as alleged, plaintiff and defendant did so with the intent and for the purpose of evading the statutes of the state prescribing the manner in which marriages shall be contracted and solemnized. She prays that the said pretended marriage be declared illegal and void, and that plaintiff be precluded and estopped from ever setting up or asserting or claiming to be the husband of defendant. The court found all the allegations of the complaint and answer to be true, and, as conclusion of law, found that plaintiff was not entitled to the relief claimed, but that the said pretended marriage was illegal and void, and judgment was entered accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment. The action is brought under section 78, Civ. Code. It must be conceded that the question presented by this appeal is one of much importance, whether viewed in its relation to society, or to the parties only.

Appellant contends (1) that the marriage is valid because performed upon the high seas; and (2) that it would have been valid if performed within this state, because there is no law expressly declaring it to be void. Respondent presents the case upon two propositions, claiming (1) that no valid marriage can be contracted in this state, except in compliance with the prescribed forms of the laws of this state; and (2) that citizens and domiciled residents cannot go upon the high seas for the avowed purpose of evading the law of this state, and contract a valid marriage.

Sections 4082, 4290, 722, Rev. St. U. S., are cited by appellant as recognizing marriages at sea and before foreign consuls, and that section 722 declares the common law as to marriage to be in force on the high seas on board American vessels. We have carefully examined the statutes referred to, and do not find that they give the slightest support to appellant's claim. The law of the sea, as it may relate to the marriage of citizens of the United States domiciled in California, cannot be referred to the common law of England, any more than it can to the law of France or Spain, or any other foreign country. We can find no law of congress, and none has been pointed out by appellant, in which the general government has undertaken or assumed to legislate generally upon the subject of marriage on the sea. Nor, indeed, can we find in the grant of powers to the general government by the several states, as expressed in the national constitution, any provision by which congress is empowered to declare what shall constitute a valid marriage between citizens of the several states upon the sea, either within or without the conventional three-mile limit of the shore of any state; and clearly does no such power rest in congress to regulate marriages on land, except in the District of Columbia and the territories of the United States, or where it possesses the power of exclusive jurisdiction. We must look elsewhere than to the acts of congress for the law governing the case in hand. Section 63 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "All marriages without this state, which would be valid by the laws of the country in which the same were contracted, are valid in this state." The parties in the present case were residents of, and domiciled in, this state, and went upon the high seas to be married, with the avowed purpose of evading our laws relating to marriage. It seems to be well settled that the motive in the minds of the parties will not change the operation of the rule. Chief Justice Gray, in Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, said: "A marriage which is prohibited here by statute, because contrary to the policy of our laws, is yet valid if celebrated elsewhere according to the law of the place, even if the parties are citizens and residents of this commonwealth, and have gone abroad for the purpose of evading our laws, unless the legislature has clearly enacted that such marriages out of the state shall have no validity here." This has been repeatedly affirmed by well-considered decisions. The authorities are found fully reviewed in that case, as they also will be found in support of the general rule in Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, by the same learned jurist. See, also, as to marriages in evasion of the law of the domicile of the parties, Bish. Mar. & Div. § 880 et seq. If the marriage in question can find support by the laws of any country having jurisdiction of the parties at the place where the marriage ceremony was performed, we should feel constrained by our code rule and well-considered decisions to declare it valid here, even though the parties were here domiciled at the time, and went to the place where they attempted to be married for the purpose of evading our laws, which they believed forbade the banns. But the parties did not go to any other state or country to be married. They went upon the high seas, where no written law, of which we have any knowledge, existed by which marriage could be solemnized. The rule, therefore, that the law of the place must govern, does not operate, because there was no law of the place, unless we may hold that the law of the domicile applies. The question presented is res integra, so far as we have been able to discover; and no case in England or the United States or elsewhere has been found by counsel (and their briefs disclose much research and industry) holding that the code rule supra applies to such a marriage as this. In the case of Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 525, Fed. Cas. No. 6,638, the question was whether a marriage had been contracted under the laws of California or Oregon. It seems that the parties, who were domiciled in Oregon, met in San Francisco, and there took passage on the steamer for Portland. It was at the trial suggested that the marriage might have taken place on board this vessel when on the high seas. There was no evidence that the parties ever met elsewhere, except in Calfornia and Oregon. In the opinion by Deady, J., it was said, after showing that there was no valid marriage under the laws of either of these states: "Nor do I think that citizens of this state [Oregon], as the complainant and deceased were, can purposely go beyond its jurisdiction, and not within the jurisdiction of another state,—as at sea,—and there contract marriage contrary to its laws. Such an attempt to be joined in marriage is a fraudulent evasion of the laws to which the citizen of the state is subject and owes obedience, and ought not to be held valid by them." It is said by appellant that this expression of opinion is but dictum, inasmuch as the question did not necessarily arise. This may be true, but it commends itself to our judgment as wise and sound upon reason and principle. We find no case holding that parties domiciled in a state may, for the avowed purpose of evading its laws, go where no law exists, and there consummate marriage in violation of the laws of their domicile, and immediately return and claim a valid marriage. In all the cases where the statutes have been thus circumvented, it was accomplished by a marriage valid in the place where celebrated. The Gretna Green marriages of Scotland between citizens of England are notable examples, and they were upheld by the ecclesiastical courts. But these marriages were solemnized in accordance with the laws of Scotland, and therefore had legal sanction; and so, also, marriages in this country of citizens of one state going into another to avoid some disqualification prescribed in the law of their domicile.

It has been properly held that as marriage is a natural right, of which no government will allow its subjects, wherever abiding, to be deprived, if the parties happen to be sojourning in a foreign country, and under the local law there is no way by which they can enter into valid marriage, they may marry in their own forms, and it will be recognized at home as good. Bish. Mar. & Div. § 890 et seq. But this author says: "In reason,—for we have probably no adjudications of the question,—a marriage void by the law of the place of its celebration, in a case where such law provides no valid method, would not be made good by the rule we are considering, if the parties went there simply to avoid compliance with the law of their domicile. There was no necessity; for their own law was open to them at home, and it would not assist them in eluding its inhibitions." And he refers to the case of Holmes v. Holmes, supra, remarking, "It would perhaps be the same, also, where the resort was, for the like purpose, to an uninhabited region or the high seas." In the case before us the parties not only went where there was no law authorizing the marriage, but they went with the intention of immediately returning to their domicile, where they supposed the law would not admit of their marriage, to enjoy the fruits of their contract. There was no necessity upon the parties to do this, suddenly arising, or arising from unexpected surrounding circumstances; but the circumstances were of their own creation, and for a purpose to evade the law of their home. There is, we conceive, no ground of expediency, sound policy, or good morals upon which the transaction can be given legal sanction. In summing up the doctrine, Mr. Bishop says (Id. § 920): "Therefore the rule necessarily is that whenever a marriage is entered into, so that the laws of one country take cognizance of it, it will be accepted as a marriage in every other country, also. On the other hand, no forms matrimonial which come short of constituting valid marriage in the one country will so bring it within the cognizance of international law as to make it valid elsewhere." We think it results from considerations of reason and principle that, unless it appears that this marriage was consummated under some recognized law, the courts of this state should not declare it valid; and we think the burden is upon appellant to show such a law, failing in which his suit must fail. The authorities are many to the point that the party who relies upon the foreign law, or law of another state, must prove the law by its production. Cases cited at section 119, Stew. Mar. & Div.

Respondent cites the case of Crapo v. Kelly, 16 Wall. 610, where it was held that, in the case of an assignment in insolvency in the state of Massachusetts, it carried with it a vessel then in the Pacific Ocean; and, in an elaborate opinion, it was shown that, except for the purposes and to the extent that certain attributes have been transferred to the United States by the several states of the Union, each possesses all the rights and powers of a sovereign state, and that the vessel in question was a part of the territory of the state of Massachusetts, although at the time in the Pacific Ocean, and that the laws of Massachusetts would govern the assignment. It is hence argued by respondent that the law of the domicile in the present case should govern. There is much force in this position, but we do not deem it necessary to place our decision on that ground. We think the law of the domicile of the parties must be the law by which to judge the validity or invalidity of this marriage, upon the grounds already stated.

We are thus brought to the only remaining question: Was the marriage valid tested by the laws of California? If this marriage can be upheld, it must be upon the sole ground that there was mutual consent, solemnization by a sea captain, and subsequent cohabitation as husband and wife for the space of eight days. What constituted marriage in this state, prior to the amendments of the Code in 1895 and 1897, was pretty well settled, and need not be restated here. In the light of the history of past litigation, it ought not to be difficult to determine what is a valid marriage under existing law. Section 55, Civ. Code, as amended in 1895, provided as follows: "Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of the parties capable of making that contract is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization authorized by this Code." No particular form of solemnization is required, "but the parties must declare, in the presence of the person solemnizing the marriage, that they take each other as husband and wife." Id. § 71. Section 70, Id., provides as follows: "Marriage may be solemnized by either a justice of the supreme court, judge of the superior court, justice of the peace, priest, or minister of the gospel of any denomination." Prior to the amendment of 1895 the consent to marriage was required to be followed either by "a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties or obligations." Section 55. The amendment added the words "authorized by this Code" after the word "solemnization," and struck out the words above in italics. It seems to me that the intention of the legislature is plainly declared, that consent must be followed by such solemnization as is authorized by the Code, or there can be no valid marriage, and that this solemnization can only be performed by the persons mentioned in section 70, supra, for no other persons are so authorized. Prior to 1895, section 75, Id., provided for marriages by declaration, without the solemnization required by section 70; but the act of March 26, 1895, swept away that easy process of marriage. Section 68, Id., was also amended in 1895 in an important particular. It now reads: "Marriage must be licensed, solemnized, authenticated, and recorded as provided in this article; but non-compliance with its provisions by other than the parties to a marriage does not invalidate that marriage." The words in italics were added to the section as it formerly stood, and would seem to imply that, while there may be non-compliance with the law by parties other than those seeking marriage, there cannot be by the latter. Section 76, Id., now, as heretofore, makes provision for supplying the evidence of marriage where no record of the solemnization is known to exist, and a form of written declaration is prescribed. A new section (79½) was added to the Civil Code in 1897, which provides that "the provisions of this chapter, so far as they relate to procuring licenses and the solemnizing of marriage, are not applicable to members of any particular religious denomination having, as such, any peculiar mode of entering the marriage relation; but such marriages shall be declared as provided in section seventy-six of the Civil Code of this state, and shall be acknowledged and recorded as provided in section seventy-seven of said Civil Code." Section 69, Id., provides that "all persons about to be joined in marriage must first obtain a license therefor from the county clerk of the county in which the marriage is to be celebrated, showing: [Then follow certain facts which must appear, such as names, identity, and ages of the parties, etc.]" When a marriage may not be invalidated, although there has been noncompliance with the provisions of article 2, §§ 68-79½, "by other than the parties to the marriage," need not now be determined. In this case there was no license; there was no solemnization by any person authorized by law to perform the ceremony; there was no marriage, under section 79½. To recognize such a marriage, we think, would grossly violate the spirit and letter of our statute, and be a blot upon the civilization we profess. To give the law any just interpretation, we must hold that, subject to the exception mentioned in section 79½, section 55 requires, not only the consent of parties capable of making a contract of marriage, but that that consent must be followed by a solemnization authorized by the Code; and this solemnization can only be performed by the persons named in section 70. We do not think it necessary to decide whether it is mandatory to obtain a license; nor whether the minority of the defendant, and want of consent of her parents or guardian, would invalidate the marriage. Our conclusion rests upon the want of any authorized solemnization, and would be the same if the parties were both of full age. We recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SILVA. (Cr. 370.)

IMPEACHING WITNESS—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—ACCOMPLICE TESTIMONY.

1. Error in limiting a question as to reputation of witness "for truth, honesty, and integrity" to his reputation for truth and veracity is harmless, witness having given evidence of his dishonesty by testifying that with defendant he committed the larceny in question.

2. Evidence that witness was confined in a jail is not admissible to impeach him, Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, not allowing for such purpose evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that conviction of a felony may be shown.

3. The rule of court that instructions requested must be presented before argument does not apply to the instruction that "the testimony of an accomplice is to be viewed with distrust," which Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, declares is to be given on all proper occasions.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Adolph Silva was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

J. E. McElrath, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appellant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny,—cattle stealing,—and appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

1. The prosecution called as a witness one Firmain Vallenzuela, against whom an information had been filed, and was still pending, charging him with the larceny of the same cattle, and he testified that he and this appellant had committed the larceny for which appellant was being tried. For the purpose of impeaching Vallenzuela, appellant called a witness, and asked him the following question: "Are you acquainted with the general reputation of Firmain Vallenzuela for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community in which he lives?" Upon objection being made to the question, the court ruled that it could only be answered as to "his general reputation for truth and veracity." In Heath v. Scott, 65 Cal. 548, 4 Pac. 557, it was held that, for the purpose of impeaching a witness, the inquiry is not confined to his reputation for truth and veracity, but may extend to his general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity. See, also, Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1847, 2051, and People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 86, 87, 45 Pac. 175. The error of the court in limiting this question to the reputation of the witness for truth and veracity did not, under the circumstances, prejudice the defendant, as the witness had given the jury direct evidence of his dishonesty by testifying that he and the defendant had stolen the cattle.

2. The question put by defendant to Marcos Vallenzuela upon cross-examination, for the purpose "of laying before the jury the character of the witness," viz. "Were you not confined in the county jail in Oakland for a period of about eight months, continuously, charged with cattle stealing?" was properly disallowed. Evidence of particular wrongful acts cannot be shown for the purpose of impeachment, "except that it may be shown by the examination of the witness, or the record of the judgment, that he had been convicted of a felony." Code Civ. Proc. § 2051.

3. During the argument before the jury, counsel for the defendant orally requested the court, when it came to charge the jury, to instruct them that "the evidence of an accomplice is to be viewed with distrust"; and again, before the court had finished its instructions to the jury, counsel repeated the request. The court refused to give said instruction, on the ground that counsel had not handed up to the court, before the argument, the charge in writing, as required by the rules of the court. Section 2061, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "The jury, subject to the control of the court, in the cases specified in this code, are the judges of the effect and value of evidence addressed to them, except when it is declared to be conclusive. They are, however, to be instructed by the court on all proper occasions: * * * (4) That the testimony of an accomplice ought to be viewed with distrust." The rule of court that instructions requested by a party must be given to the court, in writing, before the argument begins, is eminently proper. Its purpose is to give to the court an opportunity to determine the correctness and propriety of the instructions, and thus prevent errors and promote justice; but when the strict observance of the rule would operate to defeat or impede justice, it is always within the power of the court to suspend the rule, and it is its duty to do so. The request here made did not come within the reason or the spirit of the rule, and should have been granted. It was in the language of the Code, and the occasion was proper. See Pickett v. Wallace, 54 Cal. 148, and People v. Demasters, 105 Cal. 669, 39 Pac. 35. The judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. CLARK. (Cr. 447.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—RECORD.

Refusal of instructions as to insanity as a defense, unobjectionable in form, will be presumed proper, the record not showing that such a defense was made, or that there was any such question in the case.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

George W. Clark was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. J. Beerstecher, Henry Hogan, and E. L. Webb for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. This appeal is by the defendant from a judgment convicting him of murder in the first degree, and adjudging him to suffer death. Apparently, the appeal has been practically abandoned, since appellant's counsel have filed no brief in its support, nor did they appear on the day the cause was set for argument, to make an oral presentation, or offer any reason or suggestion against the affirmance of the judgment. By reason of this fact, the cause was, on motion of the attorney general, ordered submitted on the transcript, and that alone is presented for our consideration. It is not an agreeable task for the court, in undertaking to review a case involving the gravity of capital punishment, to be compelled to resort to the naked record, wholly unaided by counsel, in the effort to determine whether a defendant has been accorded in all respects that fair and impartial hearing, and protection in all his rights, guaranteed him by the constitution and the law. Nevertheless, we have never been willing, as in cases of lesser felonies, to affirm a judgment of death without looking into the record, by reason of the absence of such aid. We may safely assume, however, that the failure of counsel to appear in this case arises solely from their conviction that the appeal involves no question of merit which they could conscientiously urge upon the court; and this view is in accord with the results of our own investigation of the record.

The appeal, being from the judgment alone, without a bill of exceptions, brings up simply the judgment roll, and presents for review only the sufficiency of the information, any errors disclosed in the minutes, and the propriety of the instructions given and refused. The information is a model of simplicity, and wholly free from objection; and the minutes disclose nothing violative of the defendant's rights. The only matter in the record calculated to arrest attention is the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. Several of these bear upon the subject of insanity as a defense, and would appear, as abstract statements of the law, to be unobjectionable in form. As such, the defendant in a proper case would be entitled to have them submitted to the jury; but, unfortunately for the defendant, we cannot say upon the record before us that there was error in their refusal. The evidence is not in the record, and there is therefore nothing to show that such a defense was made, or that there was any such question in the case. In the absence of such showing, we must and will presume that these instructions were rejected by the trial court as not pertinent to any question of fact before the jury. The same is true of one or two requests upon other subjects. It cannot be determined from the record that their refusal was improper, or in any way prejudicial to the defendant's rights. It results that the record discloses no error justifying a disturbance of the judgment, and the judgment must therefore be affirmed. It is so ordered.

WALSH v. HYLAND, Judge. (S. F. 1,396.) (Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1898.)

JUDGMENT OF REVERSAL—CONSTRUCTION.

A judgment of the supreme court reversing a judgment in a mortgage foreclosure for $1,200 and costs and attorney's fees, and directing a judgment for the principal and interest stipulated in a note, less interest paid,—defendant to have costs of appeal,—does not deny plaintiff the counsel fees and costs of the trial court; no question of such counsel fees or costs being considered on the appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Petition by Margaret E. Walsh for a writ of mandamus to M. H. Hyland, judge of the superior court of the county of Santa Clara. Granted.

John H. Yoell, for petitioner. Wm. P. Veuve, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is a petition for an original writ of mandate. It arises upon the following facts: Upon appeal to this court in the case of Walsh v. Hunt (S. F. 710) 52 Pac. 115, the judgment of the trial court was reversed, with directions to that court to enter a different judgment upon the findings, all of which will be found set forth in the opinion rendered in that case. Upon the going down of the remittitur, plaintiff in that action, who is petitioner herein, made application to the trial court to enter its judgment in her favor for the sum of $500, for $100 counsel fees, and for $60.15 costs in the trial court, with interest upon these sums, together with her costs upon the appeal to this court. The item of counsel fees was stipulated in the mortgage, and the amount had been awarded in the former judgment. The costs which were prayed for were the costs which were incidental to the former trial, and were also embraced within the judgment appealed from. The trial judge refused to grant the application. By his interpretation of the decision of this court, the only judgment permissible to be entered in plaintiff's favor was a judgment for $500, principal of the mortgage debt, with interest and costs upon the appeal to this court; thus holding that by the judgment of this court respondent upon that appeal was denied counsel fees and costs in the trial court. This construction of our judgment is erroneous. No question upon counsel fees or costs was considered upon the appeal. The sole modification of the judgment was that elaborately considered. The judgment by this court entered was, in substance and effect, a direction to reduce the principal sum of the mortgage debt from $1,200, the amount found due by the trial court, to $500, the amount which this court decreed was chargeable against the defendant. In all other respects the original judgment was to stand unmodified. For this reason the mandate applied for should be issued, and it is ordered accordingly.

ADMINISTRATORS—SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNT—EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT.

1. On hearing of proceedings to settle account of administrator, judgment obtained by him on personal claim against the estate, in an action pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1510, is admissible as prima facie evidence of the correctness of the claim, subject to be contested by a person interested in the estate, as other allowed claims might be; section 1504 providing that a judgment against an administrator on a claim against the estate only establishes the claim as if it had been allowed by him and the judge, and the judgment must be that he pay, in due course of administration, the amount ascertained to be due; and section 1510 providing, if the administrator is a creditor of decedent, his claim shall be presented to a judge, and its allowance by him is sufficient evidence of its correctness, and must be paid as other claims in due course of administration; but, if the judge reject it, action thereon may be had against the estate, summons being served on the judge, who may appoint an attorney to defend.

2. It is ground for reversing the settlement of an administrator's account that relevant and material evidence, no valid objection to which appears, was rejected on objection that it was irrelevant and immaterial.

3. Though, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1633, 1635, 1636, a person wishing to contest an administrator's account must file exceptions thereto, the court should, though no exceptions are filed, examine and be satisfied of the correctness of the account before settling it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceeding to settle account of John F. More, administrator of Alexander P. More, deceased. From part of the order settling the same, Eliza M. Miller and another appeal. Reversed.

J. B. Mhoon and C. A. Storke, for appellants. Rodgers & Paterson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from so much of an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, dated June 1, 1896, as settled and allowed as correct an item of the administrator's second annual account, setting forth the payment by the administrator, John F. More, to himself as an individual, of the sum of $28,414.72. That item, represented by voucher No. 13, was the amount, with interest and costs, of a judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, rendered in an action entitled "John F. More, Plaintiff, vs. Estate of Alexander P. More, Defendant." The judgment roll in that case is set out in the transcript here. By that judgment it was decided and adjudged that the said plaintiff have and recover of and from the said defendant estate the sum of $26,026.33, with interest thereon from the 6th day of March, 1894, together with his costs and disbursements, taxed at $520.50, to be paid in due course of administration. From the said judgment roll it appears that John F. More, being the general administrator of the estate of Alexander P. More, and claiming to be a creditor of the estate, presented his claim for allowance to the judge of the court in which the estate was being administered, as required by section 1510, Code Civ. Proc. The judge rejected the claim, and thereupon the claimant brought his action against the said estate to establish his claim. The summons and complaint were served on the judge, who appointed Oliver P. Evans, an attorney of the court, at the expense of the estate, to defend the action. Evans answered the complaint, denying all of its principal averments, and the case was thereafter tried before the court without a jury, and findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed, upon which judgment was entered as above stated. The amount of this judgment, with interest, having been paid by the administrator to himself as an individual, and having been included in his second annual account, the appellants here filed exceptions and amended exceptions thereto. In the original exceptions they contest the item, "on the ground that said judgment was procured by collusion between the said J. F. More, administrator, and one P. W. Watson, and that the said J. F. More did not defend said suit in good faith, but exerted himself to obtain said judgment against these contestants and the other heirs, contrary to his duty as administrator." And in the amendment to the exceptions they repeat the same objection, making the charges of fraud and conspiracy more specific. At the hearing of the proceeding for the settlement of the said account, the administrator introduced in evidence voucher No. 13, showing the payment to himself of the amount in question, and the judgment roll in said case of John F. More against the estate of Alexander P. More, deceased. The foregoing was all the evidence offered by the administrator to support the said item represented by voucher No. 13; and to the admission of the said judgment roll the appellants objected, upon the ground that the same was incompetent, because appellants were not parties or privies thereto, and was irrelevant and immaterial and not binding on appellants here. The objection was overruled, and an exception reserved. The appellants then, to support their exceptions to the said item, offered in evidence (1) the deposition of John F. More, taken in the case of Watson against the estate of A. P. More; (2) the testimony of John F. More given in his suit against the estate of A. P. More, as reported in the transcript in that case; (3) the testimony of P. W. Watson, given upon the hearing of the petition by John F. More for letters of administration upon the estate of A. P. More, as shown by the transcript in that proceeding; and (4) the testimony of P. W. Watson, given in the said case of More against the estate of More, as shown in the transcript of that case. To each of these offers counsel for the administrator objected, upon the ground that the offered evidence was irrelevant and immaterial, as it had no bearing upon the item of the account in question, and the objections were sustained and exceptions reserved. The evidence objected to and excluded is set out in the transcript in full.

1. There was clearly no error in admitting in evidence the said judgment roll. Section 1504 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "A judgment rendered against an executor or administrator, upon any claim for money against the estate of his testator or intestate, only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and the judge; and the judgment must be that the executor or administrator pay, in due course of administration, the amount ascertained to be due." And section 1510 of the same Code provides: "If the executor or administrator is a creditor of the decedent, his claim duly authenticated by affidavit must be presented for allowance or rejection to a judge of the superior court, and its allowance by the judge is sufficient evidence of its correctness, and must be paid as other claims in due course of administration. If, however, the judge reject the claim, action thereon may be had against the estate by the claimant, and summons must be served upon the judge, who may appoint an attorney, at the expense of the estate, to defend the action." The action of More against the estate of More was brought, and the judgment recovered, under the last-named section; but we do not consider that the judgment had any greater force or effect than would a judgment recovered under the section first named. It did, however, establish the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the judge, and was prima facie evidence of its correctness. The judgment was, however, subject to be afterwards contested by any person interested in the estate, in the same manner and to the same extent as other allowed claims might be contested. But in all such cases the burden is upon the party contesting to show that the claim was not properly allowed. In re Loshe's Estate, 62 Cal. 413; In re Swain's Estate, 67 Cal. 637, 8 Pac. 94.

2. The Code of Civil Procedure contains also the following provisions:

"Sec. 1633. When any account is rendered for settlement the court, or a judge thereof, must appoint a day for the settlement thereof," etc.

"Sec. 1635. On the day appointed, or any subsequent day to which the hearing may be postponed by the court, any person interested in the estate may appear and file his exceptions in writing to the account, and contest the same."

"Sec. 1636. All matters, including allowed claims not passed upon on the settlement of any former account, * * * may be contested by the heirs for cause shown."

Under these provisions, if a person interested in an estate wishes to contest an account presented for settlement by the executor or administrator, he must file his exceptions in writing to the account, setting out specifically the grounds of his objections; and at the hearing he should be held limited to the exceptions so presented. But, whether exceptions are filed or not, the court should carefully examine every account presented for settlement, and be satisfied that it is in every respect practically correct before entering an order settling it. "The probate court is the guardian of the estates of deceased persons, and has control of the person appointed by it to administer the estate, subject to review as provided by law." Hirschfield v. Cross, 67 Cal. 661, 8 Pac. 507. And "it is the duty of the court carefully to scrutinize the account, and to reject all claims of the executor illegal in themselves or unjust in fact." In re Sanderson's Estate, 74 Cal. 190, 15 Pac. 753.

It is suggested by counsel for appellants that the court must have rejected the offered evidence upon the erroneous theory that the judgment in More against the estate of More was an estoppel against these contesting heirs. By respondent it is answered that there is nothing in the record to show upon what ground or for what reason the evidence was rejected. The only light thrown upon this point is derived from the grounds of objection, urged when the evidence was offered, that it was "irrelevant and immaterial, and had no bearing on any item in the account of the administrator." These grounds of objection were untenable. The evidence offered was certainly material, and directly relevant to the questions put in issue by the contestants. Whether it was of sufficient weight, if considered by the trial court, to have led to the making of an order other than that here presented, it is not within our province to say; but certainly the contestants were entitled to demand that the judge should consider all proper evidence bearing upon the question of the disputed claim before giving his determination against them. The claim, in amount over $26,000, was made up of various small items. As to one of these items the rejected evidence tended to show that it was paid by the administrator without the presentation and allowance of any claim. Upon another proposition it was urged that the rejected evidence would disclose that, by the testimony of the administrator himself, his claim should have been reduced over $16,000. As we have said, it is not within our province to consider how much weight the court should give to the rejected evidence; but it is plain that that evidence should have been before the court and under its consideration when it made the order complained of. For this reason the order is reversed.

KENNEY v. PARKS et al. (L. A. 405.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 6, 1898.)

DEED—REFORMATION—PARTIES—COMPLAINT—
TESTAMENTARY INSTRUMENT.

1. The attorney who is alleged to have committed the fraud of making a deed conveying only a life estate, instead of a fee, is not a necessary party to an action to reform it.

2. The executors in possession of the property of deceased, as well as the legatees and devisees claiming it under his will, are properly parties to an action to reform his deed to make it convey a fee, instead of a life estate.

3. There is no ambiguity prejudicial to defendants in a complaint to reform a deed so as to convey a fee, instead of a life estate, in that in one place a mutual mistake is alleged, as though both parties were misled by the reading of the deed by the attorney, while in another place it is charged that the attorney and grantor, knowing that the grantee believed the deed to convey a fee, did not disclose the fact that it did not.

4. Deeds executed by husband and wife, conveying each to the other their separate properties, and delivered to a third person, with direction to record that of the person dying first, are not testamentary or revocable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by Sarah J. Kenney against W. S. Parks and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Boyce, Taggart & Kellogg, for appellants.
B. F. Thomas, for respondents'

HAYNES, C. Action to reform a deed, to quiet title, and for other relief. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendants appeal upon the judgment roll. The defendants W. S. Parks and J. C. Kenney are the executors of the will of Joseph A. Kenney, deceased, and the other defendants are heirs at law of said decedent, and devisees under said will. A jury was called, to whom certain special issues were submitted, and the findings of the jury thereon were adopted by the court, who added other findings covering all the issues, and ordered judgment thereon for the plaintiff, which was duly entered. Joseph A. Kenney, deceased, and the plaintiff, were husband and wife, and resided in the county of Santa Barbara, where each owned a considerable quantity of both real and personal property. The complaint alleges that in May, 1892, the plaintiff being then of the age of 48 years, and said Joseph A. then of the age of 73 years, and there being no living children of their said marriage, mutually agreed to execute deeds each to the other conveying absolutely in fee simple all of their respective estates, both real and personal, situate in said county, and agreed that said deeds should be placed as escrows in the hands of the cashier of the First National Bank in Santa Barbara, with directions to said cashier that, if the plaintiff should die during the lifetime of said Joseph A. Kenney, he, the said cashier, should, on request of said Joseph A., or his agent, file the deed of the plaintiff to said Joseph A. for record in the county recorder's office of said county, and, if said Joseph A. should die during the lifetime of the plaintiff, said cashier should, at the request of plaintiff or her agent, file said deed of Joseph A. to her in said recorder's office; that, pursuant to said agreement, said Joseph A. employed one S. W. Bouton, an attorney, to prepare said deeds. They were prepared, and were each duly executed and acknowledged on June 1, 1892. Both deeds are set out in full in the complaint. The deed executed by Joseph A. to the plaintiff is as follows:

"For and in consideration of my love and affection for my wife, Sarah J. Kenney, I, Joseph A. Kenney, of the county of Santa Barbara, in the state of California, do hereby grant, bargain, and sell unto my said wife, Sarah J. Kenney, to have and to hold the same during the term of her natural life, with remainder in fee to my lawful heirs according to the laws of the state of California, all that real property situated in the county of Santa Barbara, state of California, bounded and described as follows, viz.: All my real property, and all interests therein belonging to me, situated in the said county of Santa Barbara; also all my personal property, of whatsoever kind and description, moneys, notes, bonds, and all other evidences of debt belonging to me; and this deed shall be an assignment to said grantee of all mortgages and other securities owned by me. This deed is intended to convey all my estate situate in said Santa Barbara county in the event of my decease during the lifetime of my said wife, and is to be deposited in escrow with the cashier of the First National Bank of Santa Barbara to be filed for record by him in case of my decease as aforesaid; and I do hereby declare, as part of this conveyance and my act and deed, that the filing this deed for record by said cashier shall constitute and be a good and sufficient delivery of this deed to the grantee therein named. Witness my hand and seal, this first day of June, A. D. 1892. Joseph A. Kenney. [Seal.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of S. W. Bouton."

The deed executed by the plaintiff to her husband was in all respects the same, except that it purported to convey a fee simple absolute, instead of a life estate. These deeds were each inclosed in a separate sealed envelope; and upon that inclosing the deed of the husband was the following indorsement:

"The inclosed deed, dated the first day of June, 1892, is herewith deposited in escrow with the cashier of the First National Bank of Santa Barbara, and the said cashier who may be such cashier at my decease, if I should die during the lifetime of my wife, is hereby instructed and commanded at my decease, on request of my said wife, or her agent, to open this envelope at once, and to file the inclosed deed for record with the recorder of Santa Barbara county. Santa Barbara, Cal., June first, 1892. Joseph A. Kenney.

"In the presence of S. W. Bouton."

The envelope inclosing the deed executed by the plaintiff bore the like indorsement.

Joseph A. Kenney died, testate, July 5, 1894; and on July 13, 1894, plaintiff demanded of said cashier that he deliver the said deed executed by Joseph A. to her, or place the same on record at her expense; but he declined to do either, but delivered to her the deed she had executed. The amended complaint was demurred to upon several grounds.

1. It is claimed that there is a defect of parties defendant, in that S. W. Bouton, who is alleged to be the party who committed the fraud, is not made a defendant. He is not interested in the subject of the action, and no judgment could have been rendered for or against him, and therefore could not have been a proper party.

2. There was no misjoinder of parties defendant. The executors of the will, who were in possession of the property, were properly joined with the heirs and the legatees and devisees under the will who claimed to be entitled to the property.

3. Another ground of demurrer is that the complaint is ambiguous and uncertain in its attempted statement of a cause of action to reform said deed. This ground of demurrer refers to the allegations concerning the insertion of a clause in the deed of the husband limiting the estate conveyed to the plaintiff to an estate for life, instead of an estate in fee, as they had agreed, and plaintiff did not discover that said deed contained said clause until April, 1895, which was nearly a year after her husband's death. It is alleged that the deeds were read to plaintiff and her husband by Bouton, and that in the reading of the deed executed by her husband said clause was omitted; that, at the time of preparing said deeds, she had the utmost confidence both in her husband and Bouton, and this was known to her husband, who also knew that she was unable to read said deeds, and believed that her husband's deed conformed to their agreement, and conveyed to her an absolute title in fee simple, and that otherwise she would not have executed her said deed. This is, in substance, the allegation of the complaint upon which the reformation of the deed was prayed for, and was all that was essential to be alleged. It is true, the complaint alleged a mutual mistake in the execution of said deed, as it would be if both parties were misled by the reading of the deeds, and Bouton is thereby, in effect, charged with a fraud upon both, though in another paragraph it is charged, in substance, that Bouton and Joseph A. Kenney, knowing that plaintiff believed the said deeds were alike, did not disclose the fact that they were not. Whether the fraud was perpetrated solely by Bouton, by which both parties to the deed were misled and deceived, or whether Bouton and the husband both participated in it, could make no difference as to the relief to which the plaintiff is entitled, for in either case she was misled, deceived, and defrauded. I see no ambiguity or uncertainty which could mislead or prejudice defendants.

The general demurrer is not specially presented in appellants' brief. It was doubtless based upon the conclusion of counsel that the facts stated showed the instrument in question to be of a testamentary character, and which could not for that reason operate as a deed of conveyance,—a question here raised upon the findings, which, it is claimed, do not support the judgment. That it was not intended that the grantee should enter upon the enjoyment of the property described in the deed until the death of the grantor is clear; but, if a future interest was presently and irrevocably given, then it is equally clear that it was valid as a conveyance; and whether it was or not must be determined from the deeds, the instructions to the depositary, and the acts and intentions of the parties. The complaint alleges and the court found that these deeds were made and deposited with the cashier in pursuance of the agreement made between the plaintiff and her husband in reference to the property of each. The consideration for the promise of each to make and deposit the deed was the promise of the other, and, when the deeds were made and deposited in compliance with the terms of that agreement, the agreement itself was executed, and could not be annulled except by mutual consent. The deeds, as well as the indorsements made upon the envelopes, call the deposit of the deeds with the cashier of the bank an escrow. Under many authorities, the cashier became a trustee, and not a simple depositary of an escrow, though in either case the deposit was not revocable. It was so held, as to an escrow, in McDonald v. Huff, 77 Cal. 279, 19 Pac. 499. The distinction is that, where the instrument is deposited to await the performance of some condition by the grantee, it is an escrow; while, if it is simply to await the lapse of time or the happening of some contingency, it will be deemed the grantor's deed presently. Foster v. Mansfield, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 415. So, in Wheelwright v. Wheelwright, 2 Mass. 452 (margin): "If a grantor deliver any writing as his deed to a third party, to be delivered over by him to the grantee on some future event, it is the grantor's deed presently, and the third person is a trustee of it for the grantee; and, if the grantee obtain the writing from the trustee before the event happen, it is the deed of the grantor, and he cannot avoid it by a plea of non est factum, whether generally or specially pleaded." But, without multiplying cases from other jurisdictions, I think the case of Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, is conclusive of this case. In that case, Hinkson, being ill, sent for his attorney, to advise as to the disposition of his property, and, acting upon the advice of his attorney, signed and acknowledged a deed purporting to convey his real estate to his two daughters, and gave the deed to his attorney, with instructions not to record it, but to deliver it to the grantees upon his death. He recovered from his illness, and demanded possession of his deed from his attorney, who refused to surrender it. At a later date he made a will devising all his real estate to one of said daughters, and afterwards died, and the attorney delivered the deed to the other daughter, the plaintiff in that action. Upon appeal, Mr. Justice Garoutte, speaking for the court, after quoting from many authorities, said (page 451, 98 Cal., and page 340, 33 Pac.): "Section 767 of the Civil Code provides that a freehold may commence in futuro, and for that reason we are inclined to recognize the views of Dixon, C. J., in Pruitsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 650, as the true rule applicable to this class of cases in this state. We know of nothing in the Codes forbidding the doctrine announced in that case, to wit, that the grantor, upon the irrevocable delivery of the deed to the depositary, thereupon constitutes such depositary the trustee of the grantee, and creates in himself a tenancy for life." The case of Bury v. Young, supra, is cited and followed in Wittenbrock v. Cass, 110 Cal. 1, 6, 42 Pac. 300, and in Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 496, 45 Pac. 867. That the delivery of these deeds to the cashier was an irrevocable transaction follows not only from the fact that it was done in pursuance of a mutual agreement between the plaintiff and her husband, but from the declarations in the body of the instruments and the express and unqualified direction to the cashier indorsed upon the envelopes; and this irrevocability constitutes the distinguishing characteristic between a grant and a testamentary disposition, which is always revocable and passes no present interest; or, as stated in Habergham v. Vincent, 2 Ves. Jr. 231, the true test of the character of an instrument is not the testator's realization that it is a will, but his intention to create a revocable disposition of his property to accrue and take effect only upon his death, and passing no present interest. The making of a will long after he had executed and delivered the deed to the plaintiff could have no effect upon it.

Appellant attempts to distinguish this case from Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 494, 495, 45 Pac. 867, because the deed in that case declared that the filing for record after the death of the grantor should be a good delivery of the deed, "as of the date of the execution thereof." But the legal effect of the delivery of that deed to the bank, under the circumstances, would have been the same if the words above quoted had been omitted; and therefore those words served only as the expression of an intention which would have been inferred without them. The question here involved having been expressly adjudicated in this court, a review of the many cases cited by appellant is unnecessary, many of which expressly support our conclusions, while none that we have examined conflict therewith. We advise that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WEINREICH v. HENSLEY et al.<sup>1</sup>
(Sac. 277, 334, 335, 336.)

HOMESTEAD—DURATION—SEPARATE PROPERTY OF SPOUSE—DRAINAGE ASSESSMENTS—VALIDITY—ENFORCEMENT—JUDGMENTS—PARTIES—MORTGAGES—PROTECTION OF LIEN—ATTACHMENT—LIEN.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, provides that if a homestead is selected from the separate property of a spouse, without his assent, it shall vest in his heirs on his death, "subject to the power of the superior court to assign it for a limited period to the family of the decedent." Section 1465 provides that when a homestead has been selected by one spouse out of the separate property of the other, since deceased, who did not join therein, the court must select and set apart "a" homestead for the use of the family of decedent out of the common property, or, if there be none, then out of the separate property of decedent. Section 1468 declares what shall be the ownership when property is set aside under the previous sections, and provides that, when the homestead is selected from the separate property of decedent, the court can set it apart only for a limited period, and that the title vests in the heirs "subject to such order." Held, that separate property of a husband, on which the wife had filed a declaration of homestead, without his joining therein, ceased to be a homestead on his death.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 2876, declaring that when the holder of a special lien is compelled to satisfy a prior lien for his protection, he may enforce payment as part of his claim, an assessment by a reclamation district creates a lien which a mortgagee had a right to remove for his protection, notwithstanding the assessment was invalid, where the mortgagor, who was an executrix, requested the mortgagee to pay the assessment.

3. The mortgagee might assume that such request was made by the executrix in her representative capacity, although she was a residuary legatee.

4. A residuary legatee is estopped from objecting to an allowance for money advanced by a mortgagee of property belonging to the estate, at her request, in payment of an assessment against mortgaged property, although the assessment was invalid.

5. One who made no issue on a cross complaint is precluded from questioning a judgment thereon.

6. One who was not made a party to a cross complaint cannot be bound by a judgment thereon.

7. Under Pol. Code, § 3461, requiring reclamation assessment lists to contain "the names of the owners of each tract, if known, and, if unknown, that fact," and section 3466, authorizing suits for the collection of such assessments to be commenced "against the person to whom the same is assessed, and, if assessed to unknown owners, then against the real owners," where the assessment was made against only one of two owners, the judgment for enforcement thereof was not binding on the other owner.

8. Pol. Code, § 3628, relating to tax assessments in general, and providing that no mistake in the name of the owner or supposed owner of real property shall render the assessment thereof invalid, has no application to an assessment by a reclamation district.

9. The fact that a judgment in an action aided by attachment was not docketed does not invalidate the lien of the attachment, inasmuch as an attachment lien is not merged in the judgment until the judgment becomes a lien.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by H. Weinreich against Mary A. Hensley, individually and as executrix of the will of Calvin P. Hensley, deceased, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and one of the defendants, who asserted a lien, defendants Mary A. Hensley, individually and as executrix, Marion Turner, and Mebius and Drescher appeal on separate records. Modified.

W. A. Gett, Jr., L. T. Hatfield, Driver & Sims, and Stearns & Elliott, for appellants. A. M. Johnson, H. W. Johnson, and A. P. Catlin, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff seeks by this action the foreclosure of a mortgage upon 229 acres of land belonging to the estate of Calvin P. Hensley, deceased, executed to him by the defendant Mary A. Hensley, as executrix of the last will and testament of said decedent, under an order of the superior court therefor, made by virtue of the provisions of sections 1577, 1578, Code Civ. Proc. The tract of land was the separate property of the deceased, and he and the said Mary A. Hensley were husband and wife, and resided thereon with their family up to the time of his death, and since his death the family has continued to reside upon the land. In the year 1881, and again in 1884, Mrs. Hensley filed and caused to be recorded a valid declaration of homestead upon the premises, but her husband did not join in either declaration, and never made any declaration of homestead. June 2, 1888, Mr. and Mrs. Hensley made their promissory note to the plaintiff herein for the sum of $6,000, and executed to him a mortgage upon said tract of land as security for its payment; and on August 22, 1888, they made to him another note for $2,000, which they secured by another mortgage upon the same land. Mr. Hensley died July 26, 1889, leaving a last will and testament, which was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary thereon issued to his widow, whom he had named as executrix. By his will he gave certain pecuniary legacies, and made other dispositions of property, and devised the residue of his estate to his wife, and son, Calvin P. Hensley, Jr. After letters testamentary had been issued upon his will, the executrix gave due notice to the creditors of the deceased for presentation and allowance of their claims, and the time for such presentation expired July 31, 1890. In September, 1889, she also filed an inventory of the property belonging to the estate, in which the land described in the mortgage herein was included, and was appraised at the sum of $38,930. The plaintiff made no presentation to the executrix of his claim against the estate of the deceased upon the aforesaid promissory notes and mortgages, but the executrix continued to pay the interest thereon until April 26, 1893. On that day she filed a petition in the superior court for an order authorizing her to execute a mortgage upon the above land for the purpose of meeting the notes and mortgages held by the plaintiff, and, after setting forth the fact of their execution, and that they had not been paid, stated "that it is necessary to mortgage the foregoing described real estate in order to raise funds to pay off the foregoing named mortgages, because, if they are not paid, the said Weinreich will foreclose the same at a great cost and expense and damage of and to said estate," and asked for an order authorizing her, as executrix, to execute her promissory note "to the said Weinreich, or to some other person, for the sum of $8,000, together with a mortgage on said real estate to secure the payment of the said promissory note for the period of two years, or more or less, as to the court may seem proper." Upon filing this petition the court fixed a day for its hearing, and on the day fixed, after proof that notice thereof had been given, made an order authorizing the executrix to execute her promissory note for $8,000, payable in two years, and to secure its payment by a mortgage upon the aforesaid land. The order makes no reference to the mortgages then held by the plaintiff herein, but recites that it duly appeared to the court that it would be for the best advantage and interest of the said estate, and of all persons interested therein, that the executrix should execute her note for the sum of $8,000, and borrow said sum of money thereon, and mortgage the real estate described in the petition to secure its payment. Thereupon the executrix executed to the plaintiff herein the mortgage upon which the present action was brought, and he surrendered and satisfied the mortgages then held by him. June 2, 1892, Mrs. Hensley mortgaged the tract of land to Mebius and Drescher, defendants herein, to secure her promissory note to them for the sum of $919. This mortgage is set up by them in a cross complaint herein, in which they seek its foreclosure, and the court finds that there was unpaid the sum of $832.92. August 20, 1894, the defendant John Elliott commenced an action against Mrs. Hensley upon a money demand, in which action he caused her interest in the land to be attached, and on October 8, 1894, judgment was entered therein against her for the sum of $782.30. This judgment Elliott prayed might be paid to him out of the proceeds coming to Mrs. Hensley from the sale of the premises, after satisfying the claim of the plaintiff. The superior court rendered its judgment directing a sale of the mortgaged premises, and that, after paying the claim of the reclamation district No. 556, hereinafter considered, the proceeds of the sale be applied to the payment of the plaintiff's claim upon the promissory note set forth in the complaint, and for certain moneys paid by him to the reclamation district upon an assessment levied upon the land; and that, after making such payments, any surplus proceeds of the sale be paid to the executrix of the will of Calvin P. Hensley, to be held by her subject to administration; and that, after the payment and discharge of all incidents of administration, the distributive share of Mary A. Hensley in such surplus proceeds shall be subject to the payment, first, of the claim of Mebius and Drescher, and then to the claim of John Elliott. From this judgment appeals have been taken by Mary A. Hensley individually, and also as executrix, Marion A. Turner, a legatee under the will of Calvin P. Hensley, and Mebius and Drescher. The appeals are presented in four separate records, but, as they involve the same questions, they have been considered together.

1. The validity of the mortgage sued upon is contested upon the ground that the land secured by the mortgages of 1888 was a homestead, and that, under the provisions of section 1475, Code Civ. Proc., by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to present a claim against the estate upon the notes which they were given to secure, he lost the right to enforce either the notes or the mortgages, and that, therefore, there was no consideration for the note and mortgage executed under the order of the court; citing Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20. One of the controlling questions in the case, therefore, is the effect of the death of Hensley upon the homestead which his wife had selected out of his separate estate without his assent. What was the status of the property after his death? Did the homestead cease with his death, or was the land still impressed with the characteristics of a homestead? The devolution of the title to the homestead premises in case of the death of one of the spouses is provided for in section 1265, Civ. Code, and also in section 1474, Code Civ. Proc. The latter section was amended 10 days later than the section of the Civil Code, and is to be regarded as the latest expression of the legislative will. By this section the legislature has declared: "If the homestead was selected from the separate property of either the husband or the wife, without his or her consent, it vests, on the death of the person from whose property it was selected, in his or her heirs, subject to the power of the superior court to assign it for a limited period to the family of the decedent." The power thus to limit the estate of the heirs is not given by this section, but is merely referred to as the source of the limitation which may be placed upon their estate. This section purports to deal merely with the descent of the property from which the homestead was selected, but the power of the court to assign the homestead, and upon whose exercise a limitation upon the estate of the heirs is created, is given in section 1465, Code Civ. Proc., and the provisions of this section are to be read in connection with the provisions of section 1474. The court is there directed to set aside the homestead that was selected in the lifetime of the decedent, provided such homestead was selected from the common property, or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, and the section then declares: "If none has been selected, designated and recorded, or in case the homestead was selected by the survivor out of the separate property of the decedent, the decedent not having joined therein, the court must select, designate and set apart and cause to be recorded a homestead for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children; or, if there be no surviving husband or wife, then for the use of the minor children, in the manner provided in article two of this chapter, out of the common property, or, if there be no common property, then out of the real estate belonging to the decedent." The power thus given to the court to set apart a homestead that has been selected from the separate estate of the decedent is the same as is its power to set apart a homestead when none has been selected in the lifetime of the decedent, and must be exercised in the same manner and under the same limitations and conditions. The provision in section 1474 making the estate of the heirs subject to the exercise by the court of its power to assign the homestead to the family for a limited period, does not confer upon the court the power to assign the homestead taken from the separate property of the decedent, unless by the conditions of section 1465 the separate estate may be so set apart. That section does not direct the court to set apart the homestead which had been selected by the survivor out of the separate property of the deceased spouse, but declares that in such case the court must "select," designate, and set apart "a" homestead, and limits the property out of which it is to be selected to the common property, if there be any. It is only in the case where there is no common property that it may select, designate, and set apart a homestead out of the separate estate of the decedent. Lord v. Lord, 65 Cal. 81, 3 Pac. 96. It is very evident that, if there be any common property, the homestead which may have been selected by the survivor from the separate property of the decedent, without his assent, would cease to be such upon his death; but the effect of his death upon the homestead selected from his separate estate, without his assent, is the same whether there be common property or not. The provision in section 1468, Code Civ. Proc., declaring what shall be the ownership "when property is set apart to the use of the family in accordance with the provisions of this chapter," implies that until it is so set apart the property belongs to the estate of the decedent; and the subsequent provision in the same section, "if the property set apart be a homestead selected from the separate property of the deceased, the court can only set it apart for a limited period to be designated in the order, and the title vests in the heirs of the deceased, subject to such order," clearly indicates that the court must make an order designating the limited period for which the homestead is set apart, and that until such order is made there is no homestead, and that the property selected as a homestead out of the separate estate of the deceased in his lifetime, without his assent, ceases upon his death to be a homestead, and vests in his heirs, free from any such limitation, unless it is afterwards selected and set apart as a homestead by an order of the court. The court has a discretion to exercise in determining whether it will set aside a homestead from the separate property of the decedent, as well as the particular property which it will set aside, and also in determining the time during which it shall be held as a homestead. It is not required to set aside the property which was selected by the survivor, and is limited to selecting and designating property which is of no greater value than $5,000. "The court is not bound by the wishes of the applicant, but should exercise its own discretion and good judgment." In re Schmidt's Estate, 94 Cal. 334, 29 Pac. 714. "The right to have it assigned for a limited period is not absolute, but rests in the sound discretion of the court, to be exercised in view of all the facts appearing before it." In re Lamb's Estate, 95 Cal. 399, 30 Pac. 568. In the present case the land selected by the wife was appraised at $38,930, and was alleged by her, at the time the application was made for leave to execute the present mortgage, to be of the value of $31,000. As a homestead of only $5,000 in value could be set apart, and as there was no particular portion of the tract subject to the claim until it had been set apart, it was not impressed with the characteristics of a homestead. It must, therefore, be held that upon the death of Calvin P. Hensley the property ceased to have the incidents of a homestead, and that the property described in the complaint was subject to foreclosure, under the provisions of section 1500, Code Civ. Proc., without the presentation of a claim to the executrix. There was, therefore, at the date of the order authorizing the executrix to execute the note and mortgage sued on, and also at the date of their execution, a valid claim of lien in behalf of the plaintiff upon the property included in the mortgage; and the surrender and cancellation by him of the notes and mortgages of 1888, which was the basis of this claim, was a sufficient consideration for the execution to him of this note and mortgage.

2. The lands included in the mortgage are within the limits of reclamation district No. 556, and in May, 1894, the district levied an assessment upon all the lands within its boundaries. The amount of the assessment imposed upon these lands was $7,296.54, and was assessed to "Mrs. M. A. Hensley." After the assessment was levied, the district made a written demand upon her for its payment, and at her request the plaintiff paid portions thereof as they became due and payable, amounting to $3,283.46. These amounts and their payment are set forth in the complaint, and claimed by the plaintiff to be secured by the mortgage, and this claim was sustained by the court. The remainder of the assessment—$4,013.15—was not paid. Section 2876, Civ. Code, declares: "Where the holder of a special lien is compelled to satisfy a prior lien for his own protection, he may enforce payment of the amount so paid by him as a part of the claim for which his own lien exists." An assessment by a reclamation district, like any other tax levied under the sovereign authority of the state, creates a lien upon the land assessed paramount to the lien of the mortgage. Taxes upon the mortgaged premises are a charge upon the estate, and, if paid by the mortgagee for the purpose of preserving his security, may be added to the mortgage. Robinson v. Ryan, 25 N. Y. 323; Jones, Mortg. § 358. It is urged by the appellants, however, that the statute under which the assessment was levied required it to be made to the "owner" of the tract (Pol. Code, § 3461), and that, as Mrs. Hensley and Calvin P. Hensley, Jr., were the residuary devisees of the estate, she was not its "owner," and the assessment to her was such a failure to comply with this requirement of the statute as to render it illegal, and the plaintiff was therefore not required to pay it for the protection of his security. Whether the form of the assessment was such as would have defeated an action for its collection, or would have conferred no title upon the purchaser at a sale under a judgment for its foreclosure, is not the test of the plaintiff's right to recover the amount paid for its discharge. The assessment created at least an apparent cloud upon the title to the mortgaged premises, and to the extent of such cloud impaired the sufficiency of the security. Mrs. Hensley was not only one of the residuary legatees, but she was also the executrix of the testator's will, and was charged with the care and preservation of the estate during its administration. If, when the district made its demand upon her for the payment of the assessment, she had paid it out of the funds of the estate, the court would have been justified in allowing such payment in the settlement of her accounts. She was not required to contest its validity at the risk of having the payment disallowed, and its allowance by the court upon the settlement of her accounts would have been binding upon the heirs and devisees of the testator. In Windett v. Insurance Co., 144 U. S. 581, 12 Sup. Ct. 751, it was held that a mortgagee should be allowed for the moneys paid in purchasing some tax titles which were claimed by the defendant to be void, the court saying: "The mortgagee was not bound to take the risk of contesting the tax titles, and the sums paid to extinguish those titles were reasonable expenses, chargeable to the mortgagor by the terms of the mortgage." The mortgage to the plaintiff was made by Mrs. Hensley in her representative capacity alone, and when she requested him to pay this assessment he was justified in assuming that it was a request from her in this representative capacity in behalf of the estate, and for its preservation, rather than from her as the residuary legatee of a portion of the estate. His payment at her request must be considered with the same effect as if it had been made by her in her representative capacity. As one of the residuary legatees, Mrs. Hensley is estopped from disputing the plaintiff's right to make the payment under this request, and it may be noted, too, that the other residuary legatee makes no resistance to the plaintiff's right to be reimbursed therefor.

3. The reclamation district was made a defendant herein, and in its answer set forth its claim of lien by virtue of the said assessment, alleging that it is paramount to that of the plaintiff, and also filed a cross complaint, alleging its corporate existence and boundaries; that it had levied an assessment upon the lands within these boundaries, $7,296.64 having been assessed against the lands described in the complaint, of which amount $4,015.69 remained unpaid; that the defendant Mary A. Hensley is, and was at the date of the assessment, the owner of said lands; and asked judgment that said amount is a valid lien upon the lands, paramount to that of the plaintiff, and that it be paid out of the proceeds of any sale thereof. The plaintiff demurred to this cross complaint as constituting no defense to his cause of action, but no disposition was made of the demurrer, nor did the plaintiff answer the cross complaint. Mary A. Hensley, in her individual capacity, answered the cross complaint, and to this answer the reclamation district interposed a demurrer, which was sustained, and no further pleading was made on her behalf. The cross complaint did not name any particular defendants thereto, and was not served upon any of the defendants in the action other than Mrs. Hensley. The court rendered judgment in its favor for the amount of this claim, directing it to be paid from the proceeds of the sale as a first charge upon the land. As Mrs. Hensley made no issue at the trial herein upon the allegations in the cross complaint, she is precluded from questioning the judgment sustaining the validity of the assessment. It appears, also, from the bill of exceptions, that the district had brought an action (St. 1893, p. 208) in the superior court for the purpose of determining the validity of this assessment, wherein Mrs. Hensley was a defendant, and that the court rendered its judgment therein that the assessment was legal and valid. Mrs. Hensley was not, however, the sole owner of the land, and, while she is estopped by these judgments from questioning the right of the district to enforce the lien of the assessment against her interest in the land, or her personal liability for the assessment, if any exists, they are not available against the interests of any other person in the land assessed. Calvin P. Hensley, Jr., as one of the residuary legatees, has the same interest as herself in the land, and, while the estate is in the course of administration, the personal representative of the testator is entitled to be heard in any manner affecting the rights or interest of the estate in the land. Unless such personal representative is made a party to the proceeding, neither the estate nor any person claiming as legatee or devisee of the decedent, who is not himself a party, can be bound by the judgment therein. The court, therefore, was not authorized to determine as against these defendants that the assessment was a valid lien upon their interest in the land.

Section 3461 of the Political Code requires the assessment list to contain "the names of the owners of each tract, if known; and, if unknown, that fact." Under a long line of decisions in this state a failure to comply with this requirement renders the assessment invalid. Kelsey v. Abbott, 13 Cal. 609; People v. Sneath, 28 Cal. 612; Smith v. Davis, 30 Cal. 536; Taylor v. Donner, 31 Cal. 480; Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 444, 27 Pac. 356; Lake Co. v. Sulphur Bank Quicksilver Mining Co., 66 Cal. 17, 4 Pac. 876. In the case last cited the court said: "Tax proceedings are in invitum, and, to be valid, must be in strict accordance with the statute. Without an assessment, all subsequent proceedings are nullities; and in making the assessment the provisions of the statute under which it is to be made must be observed with particularity." Section 3466 of the Political Code authorizes the board of trustees to commence an action for the collection of the assessment and the enforcement of the lien on the land assessed "against the person to whom the same is assessed, and, if assessed to 'unknown' owners, then against the real owners." As the assessment in the present case was made to Mrs. M. A. Hensley, the latter clause in the above portion of the section is inapplicable, and an action for its enforcement must be brought against her alone, and the court cannot render judgment therefor against any other person. The statute does not authorize the assessment to be enforced against the real owners unless they are named in the assessment, or the assessment is made to "unknown" owners, and in an action for its enforcement against them they may question its validity, notwithstanding the admission of its validity by the person against whom the assessment is made. In Blatner v. Davis, 32 Cal. 328, the assessment was made to Schaffer, and in a suit for its enforcement brought against Davis and Schaffer under the allegation that both were owners of the lot assessed judgment was rendered against Davis alone, and the amount of the assessment decreed to be a lien against the entire lot. In reversing this judgment the court said: "If the property was properly assessed as belonging to Schaffer, there is no apparent reason for charging the appellant with the amount assessed. If the property belonged to the appellant and Schaffer as tenants in common, it should have been assessed to them jointly as owners. * * * The name of the appellant does not appear in the assessment as the owner, or one of the owners, of the lot assessed, nor does it appear that he was unknown to the superintendent of streets, and that his interest in the property was duly assessed, as required in such cases. The complaint states that the lot in question was assessed to Schaffer, which means that it was assessed to him as the owner. This statement, which is found to be true by the court, shows that the assessment did not affect the appellant, and, consequently, that the proceedings had, and upon which the plaintiff relies for compensation under his contract with the superintendent, were of no binding force upon the appellant, and created no legal obligation on his part to pay the sum for which judgment passed against him." The reason for this requirement is obvious. The assessment is a charge against the entire property, and under section 3466 the lien is to be enforced "against each tract for the amount assessed against the same." If the person assessed is not the entire owner, his interest in the land would be made to pay the entire assessment, while, if the entire land is made liable for the assessment, those who are not named in the assessment list would be deprived of their interest in the property without an opportunity of being heard in its defense. It follows that, as the assessment in the present case was made to "Mrs. M. A. Hensley," the district was not authorized to institute an action for its enforcement against any other person interested in the land, either as owner or otherwise; and that, although she is estopped by the judgment against her from questioning its validity, its illegality is available to the other defendants as a defense herein. The provision in section 3628 of the Political Code that "no mistake in the name of the owner or supposed owner of real property shall render the assessment thereof invalid" refers to the assessment provided for in that section, and has no application to an assessment by a reclamation district. See Lake Co. v. Sulphur Bank Quicksilver Mining Co., 66 Cal. 17, 4 Pac. 876; Gwynn v. Dierssen, 101 Cal. 563, 36 Pac. 103.

4. It is objected by Mrs. Hensley that the judgment in favor of Elliott did not constitute a lien upon the premises, for the reason that it does not appear that it was ever docketed. The lien of the attachment would not, however, be merged in the judgment until the latter became a lien, and, if the judgment has not been docketed so as to become a lien, the lien of the attachment still remains upon the land. Bagley v. Ward, 37 Cal. 121; Riley v. Nance, 97 Cal. 203, 31 Pac. 1126, and 32 Pac. 315. As we have seen that upon the death of Mr. Hensley the land ceased to be a homestead, the interest of Mrs. Hensley therein became subject to an attachment by her creditors. Each of these liens upon the interest of Mrs. Hensley in the lands was created before the judgment was rendered against her affirming the validity of the assessment, and, as the holders of these liens were neither of them a party to that proceeding, their liens are superior to that of the judgment, and are entitled to priority of satisfaction.

From the foregoing considerations it follows that out of the proceeds of the sale of the land described in the complaint the plaintiff is entitled to be paid as a first charge thereon the amount of his claim, as found by the court, including the amount due upon the promissory note, the amount paid by him for the assessment levied by the reclamation district, and his attorney's fees and costs; and that any surplus proceeds there may be after making these payments should be paid to the executrix of the last will of C. P. Hensley, deceased, to be held by her subject to the administration of said estate, and that at the close of said administration Mebius and Drescher, John Elliott, and reclamation district No. 556 should receive out of the distributive share coming to Mary A. Hensley the respective amounts found by the court in their favor, and in this order of priority. The cause is therefore remanded to the superior court, with directions to modify its judgment for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale after paying the claim of the plaintiff in accordance with the foregoing opinion. The costs of the appeals of Mary A. Hensley, as executrix, and Marion A. Turner, to be taxed against reclamation district No. 556; the costs of the appeals by Mary A. Hensley and Mebius and Drescher to be borne by them respectively.

In re STANFORD'S ESTATE. (S. F. 571.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 26, 1898.)

STATUTES — OPERATION — PARTIAL INVALIDITY — SPECIAL LAWS — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES — COLLATERAL INHERITANCE TAX.

1. Pending an appeal from an order requiring an executrix to pay a collateral inheritance tax as provided by Act March 23, 1893, the legislature (St. 1897, p. 77) amended the act by exempting certain classes, including appellants, from its operation, and provided that the exemptions should apply to all cases arising under the original act, except where taxes had already been paid. Held, that the appeal must be determined in accordance with the amendment.

2. Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 16, prohibiting the legislature from passing local or special laws releasing or extinguishing in whole or in part the liability of any corporation or person to the state, is not violated by an amendment to the collateral inheritance tax law (St. 1897, p. 77, amending Act March 23, 1893), exempting from its operation certain classes of corporations and relatives, and providing that the exemptions should apply to cases arising under the original act, except where taxes had already been paid.

3. Under Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, providing that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, and Rev. St. U. S. § 1978, providing that all citizens of the United States shall have the same right in every state as is enjoyed by the white citizens thereof to inherit property, the provision of the collateral inheritance tax law (Act March 23, 1893, as amended by St. 1897, p. 77), making a distinction between resident and nonresident relatives, and excluding nonresident relatives from its exceptions, is invalid.

4. The collateral inheritance tax law (Act March 23, 1893, as amended by St. 1897, p. 77) includes among those exempt from the tax "niece or nephew when a resident of this state." The position of this clause in the act shows that nieces and nephews were intended to be equally exempt with other enumerated relatives. Held, that the invalid limitation, "when a resident of this state," should be rejected, and the statute construed as if such part had not been enacted.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Leland Stanford, deceased, an order was made requiring the executrix to pay a collateral tax on legacies, and she and the legatees appeal. Reversed.

Wilson & Wilson, for executrix. Gordon & Young, for Jerome B. and Philip W. Stanford. Edward R. Taylor, for Agnes Stanford Taylor. A. N. Drown, for Josiah Stanford, Jr. F. E. Spencer, for Trustees of the Leland Stanford, Jr., University. Cotton & Cotton, for certain nonresident nephews and nieces. W. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty. (Elliott McAllister, of counsel), for treasurer.

HARRISON, J. Leland Stanford died June 21, 1893, leaving a last will and testament by which he gave the sum of $2,500,000 to certain trustees for the benefit of the Leland Stanford, Jr., University, and also legacies amounting to $2,200,000 to certain of his nephews and nieces. May 7, 1896, the superior court for San Francisco made an order requiring the executrix of his will to pay into the treasury of the city and county $235,750 as and for the collateral inheritance tax upon these and other bequests. From this order the present appeal was taken, May 18, 1896. After the appeal had been taken, the legislature, at its next session, passed an act, March 9, 1897 (St. 1897, p. 77), amending section 1 of the collateral inheritance act, approved March 23, 1893, by including among those who are exempt from the tax "niece or nephew when a resident of this state," together with certain classes of corporations, of which the above-named university is one, and provided that the exemption should apply to all cases arising subsequent to the passage of the original act, "except in those cases where the tax has been paid to the treasurer of the proper county."

1. The appeal herein must be determined in accordance with the law as it now exists, and not as it stood at the time the court made the order appealed from. Bank v. Henderson, 101 Cal. 307, 35 Pac. 899.
